

For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

✓ 250511

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California,
1915, Section 623.

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2012

<http://archive.org/details/nation207julnewy>

THE ATLANTIC

America's Leading Liberal Weekly Since 1865

INDEX TO VOLUME 207 JULY to DECEMBER, 1968

250511

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

- A Art
C Correspondence
D Drama
E Editorial Article
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article
T Television

Book reviews and television are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

2-31 July 8	354-383 Oct. 14
34-63 July 22	386-415 Oct. 21
66-95 Aug. 5	418-447 Oct. 28
98-127 Aug. 19	450-479 Nov. 4
130-159 Aug. 26	482-511 Nov. 11
162-191 Sep. 2	514-543 Nov. 18
194-223 Sep. 9	546-575 Nov. 25
226-255 Sep. 16	578-607 Dec. 2
258-287 Sep. 23	610-639 Dec. 9
290-319 Sep. 30	642-673 Dec. 23
322-351 Oct. 7	706-735 Dec. 30

A	PAGE
Abbot, William L.
Politics tomorrow in U.S.: the new coalitions; S	273
ACT. See American conservative theatre
Advocacy of cigarettes on TV may stop, thanks to efforts of lawyer J. F. Banzhaf III; E	644
Only segment of industry backs campaign for gun-control legislation, M. Christopher; S	115
Aerospace industry; marginal interest in solving social problems; E	676
Aerospace
More disclosures on looting, R. G. Sherrill; S	684
Africa; African-American labor center (AALC), backed by AFL-CIO and AID, combats Communist unions; E	485
Austerity as new focal issue in black nations' politics, J. Hatch; S	459
Agee, William; arranged Whitney museum exhibition
The 1930s: painting and sculpture in America	540
Agnew, Spiro T.
Discovering Spiro Agnew. By R. O. Mara; S	175
Politics of accommodation with South behind nomination; E	130
Surprise nomination as Republican vice-presidential candidate on TV may stop, thanks to efforts of lawyer J. F. Banzhaf III; E	103
Up to attract votes from Wallace	258
Agriculture
Cuba: urban farmers in green belts. T. F. Harding and D. W. Bray; S	107
Large subsidies to individual farmers retained in proposed program; E	291
Growing profit incentive in Soviet Union. Social breakthrough for California seasonal workers by CRLA. E. Cray; S	264
Airplanes and airports. See Aviation
Air pollution. See Pollution
Alaska; E. Gruening defeated by M. Gravel in Democratic senatorial primary; E	197
Write-in campaign for Gruening reactivates candidacy; E	389
Albany. See New York State
Alechinsky, Pierre. Reviewed by L. Alloway; A	573

PAGE	PAGE
Alcos, Roberto; rightist plotter in Guatemala	8
All day All night New York. S. Kaufman; P	699
Allen, James; New York State education commissioner's agreement with striking New York City teachers	648, 649-50
Alliance for labor; rival group to AFL-CIO organized by W. P. Reuther and teamsters	356
Alliance or progress; mistaken reliance on by U.S.	587 ff.
Alloway, Lawrence
Reviews of art
Metropolitan museum of art exhibition, The great age of fresco	378
Museum of modern art's exhibition, The machine as seen at the end of the mechanical age	733
Ossorio, A.	572
Poons, L.	572
Rauschenberg, R., at Museum of modern art	637
Rockwell, N.	573
Tapias, A.	573
Thiebaud, W.	572
Whitney museum of American art's F. Kline retrospective exhibition	412
Whitney exhibition The 1930s: painting and sculpture in America	540
Alt, Alice
H. Mears letter fails to show use of A-bomb acceptable to Johnson administration; C	546; see also C, 450
American, J. Haines; P	250
American bar association; rubber-stamp endorsement of Fortas and Thornberry appointments on Supreme court; E	101
American cancer society; following California ruling, is disbursing reserve funds for research; E	38
American civil liberties union. See Civil Liberties
American conservative theatre (ACT), San Francisco. Reviewed by J. Novick; D	125
American federation of labor-Conference of industrial organizations (AFL-CIO). See Labor - Union
American independent party; ticket headed by Wallace and LeMay	423, 454
American legion; agitation against H. Marx, cause, radical San Diego professor; E	421
American political science association. See Political science Amick, Daniel. See Gitlin, T.
Anglo. See Portugal
Antigone (Living theater production of B. Brecht play). Reviewed by H. Curman; D	446
Anti-Semitism. See Jews
APA. Production of The misanthrope reviewed by H. Curman; D	510
Appalachian volunteers; political action in eastern Kentucky includes agitation against strip coal mining. G. L. Mason; S	721
APRA; leftist political party feared by Peruvian military	433
Arab nations. See Middle East
Arabs; discrimination against in Israel	527, 528
Architecture. Aspen, Colo., conference on design reviewed by W. B. Rollins; A	59
Arkansas; Republican strength	77-78
Armament
Anti-personnel weapons developed with competition among services and suppliers; costly VFX plane project; E	196
Expensive post-Vietnam projects of Defense department; E	100
Missiles
Deployment of Sentinel against China voted by Congress despite scientists' opposition; E	6
Proposed reopening of U.S.-Soviet negotiations on	37
Proposed U.S.-Soviet talks on imperiled by Black Sea mission of U.S. destroyers; E	678
Soviet sites in Mongolia	177-8
Tests of MIRV, Minuteman, and Poseidon augur ill for mankind; E	196
U.S.-Soviet race in ostentatious stage; E	261
Art; Communist view of	620
Thrust of the hippie-yippie underculture. K. Widmer; S	716
For reviews, see Alloway, L.
See also Design, industrial and urban
Ascherson, Neal; on "dinosaur" Soviet Union's clumsiness in foreign relations	163
Ascoli, Max; on Johnson's withdrawal from presidential race	20
Aspen, Colo.; conference design reviewed by W. B. Rollins; A	59
Skating as big business. W. B. Rollins; S	591
Assassins; restraint urged on coverage by news media; E	133
At 7:00 P.M., watching the cars on the bridge. J. Moore; P	598
Atlanta. See Georgia
Atlanta Constitution; crisis at formerly hard-hitting newspaper. A. Schardt; S	679
Atomic energy; dangers in booming plant construction in U.S.; E	677
Proposed plant threatens pollution of Cayuga lake, N.Y.; E	709
Atomic weapons; A-bomb just another weapon to C. LeMay. By H. Mears; C	450; see also C, 546
Nuclear nonproliferation treaty sabotaged by Senate obstruction; E	324
Aumente, Jerome
Detroit's year without news during long newspaper strike; S	363
Austerity; new focal issue in African politics. J. Hatch; S	458
Automobile industry; welcomes Haddon report on drinking drivers, which implies cars not to blame for accidents; E	230
Autumn kitchen. C. Berge; P	374
Aviation; hijacking of planes to Cuba; E	197
No money for safe landings at U.S. airports. K. M. Ruppenthal; S	142
Axelbank, Albert
How Mongolia gets along; S	177

B

Bacon, Francis. Reviewed by L. Alloway; A	636
Bailey, John M.; Democratic national chairman accused of trying to "ramrod" Humphrey nomination. R. J. Walton; E	2
Ball, William; general director of American conservative theatre (ACT)	125, 126
Banham, Reynier; chairman of Aspen, Colo., conference on design	59
Banks, Harold C.; Seafarers official's immunity to extradition from Canada linked with union's contributions to Democratic party	644
Banks and banking; role in formation of conglomerates	435
Banzhaf, John F., III; lawyer's effective campaign against cigarette advertising on TV; E	644
Barker, Eric
Welsh Christmas; P	694

- Barnard, Dr. Christiaan; pioneer heart-transplant surgeon adulated 720
- Barnment, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 477
- Beates, the. Film Yellow submarine reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 638
- Beaufort. See South Carolina
- Bedford, Sybille
- A. Huxley memorabilia needed for biography; C 418
- Belaunde Terry, Fernando. See Peru
- Belitt, Ben
- The well-dwellers (Lomas de Atzingo); P 250
- Bevan, Mervin; C
- Congressmen could protect own lives by voting for gun-control law; C 20
- Benn, Anthony Wedgwood
- Back of technology in Britain: pressure for redistribution of political power; S 136
- Bennett, Barbara W.
- Johnson, backed by military establishment, deliberately throwing election to Nixon; C 354; see also 198
- Bennett, James V.; campaign to reform unequal sentences for crime in U.S.; E 708
- Berge, Carol
- Autumn kitchen; P 374
- Bergman, G. M.
- Mexico City: flags, tanks and student strike; S 296
- Berio, Luciano. Sinfonia reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 477
- Berlin, letter from on chronic crisis in A. Gross; S 408
- Bernard, Sidney
- Reviews of plays
- Hamlet (New York Shakespeare festival's open-air production) 93
- Bernard, Sydney E.
- Doubtful political victory of Michigan welfare mothers; C 642; see also 562
- Berry, Wendell
- American pox of insignificance; impressions of Wallace rally; S 457
- Rain; P 185
- Bertolucci, Bernardo. Film Partner reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 379
- Beyond the law. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 508
- Biafra. See Nigeria
- Birds on the morning of going, the. W. S. Merwin; P 27
- Birnch, Martin
- M. Harris unfair in article on Black panthers; C 130, with Harris reply; see also 15
- Birnam, Norman
- The staggering colossus; vulnerability of industrial societies; S 167
- Birth control: part of conservation for survival. R. and R. Kenow; S 138
- Pill as bringer of sterility in sexual relations. H. Carruth; C 354; see also E, 294
- Black panthers. See Negroes — Civil rights
- Black power. See Negroes — Civil rights
- Blackwell, Vera
- Czechs' optimism on liberalization of regime despite Soviet disfavor; S 145
- Boggo, G. James
- Vietnam enlistments extended, despite statement by S. Goodman in June 3 article; C 2
- Bonnet, Georges; discredited French deputy defeated 710
- Bonwit Teller; $1000 perfume ad; E 679
- Booth, Paul
- Patchwork quilt of protest; attempts to form national McCarthyite-based New party; S 264
- Boretz, Benjamin. Letters from Buffalo music center on June 17 column concerning foundation subsidies; C 34, with Boretz reply
- Bottomore, T. B.
- Blacks and students: critics of society in West; S 565
- Bowering, George
- The grate society; P 446
- Boyer, Leonard
- A. Moravia's action on significance of great wall of China; C 162; see also 103
- Braceros; illegal use of Mexican agricultural workers barred in California by CRLA 368-9
- Brannin, Carl
- W. G. Bryan's resignation as secretary of state over pacifist convictions; C 66
- Bray, Donald W. See Harding, T. F.
- Brecht, Bertolt. Play Antigone (Living theater production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 446
- Reception of plays in Poland. A. Wirth; D 117
- Bresson, Robert. Film Mouchette reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 348
- Breznev, Leonid I.; Soviet Communist chief opposed to consumer-goods orientation of Premier Kosygin 495 ff.
- Termed chief Soviet hawk 711 ff.
- Bride wore black, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; M 61
- Brooklyn. See New York City
- Brown, Edmund G.; former governor of California on "playing God" in capital-punishment cases; E 166; see also C, 418
- Brown, Rosellen
- A my music (seven are convicted at Meridian); P 374
- Bryan, William Jennings; pacifist convictions prompted resignation as secretary of state. C. Brannin; C 66
- Buchan, Anastasia; denial that Institute of strategic studies received CIA funds 676
- Buchwald, Art; columnist's popularity in Soviet Union 494
- Buckley, James; strong showing by Conservative in New York senatorial race 518
- Buffalo, N.Y. Letters on B. Boretz article of June 17 concerning foundation subsidies; C 34, with Boretz reply
- Bulgaria; national characteristics and link with Russia. Sir C. P. Snow; S 617
- Bullough, Vern L.
- Washed duplication in Defense department's nonmilitary studies; C 258; see also 46
- Buñuel, Luis. Film Nazarin reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 28
- Business; aerospace firms' marginal interest in working to solve social problems; E 676
- Conglomerates; the total corporation. H. L. Nieburg; S 434
- Pentagon loot: more disclosures. R. G. Sherrill; S 584
- Secrecy of broken by J. W. Finefrock, General Telephone Co. employee; E 648
- Business Week; on centrist tradition in U.S. politics; E 260
- C
- California
- "Cleaning up" of school texts and other trifling acts of board of education; E 294; see also C, 354
- Electoral results analyzed. P. Kerby; S 519
- EPIC campaign waged by U. Sinclair in 1934; E 613
- Forced charities to expend reserve funds for avowed purposes, such as cancer research; E 3
- Governor Reagan's starving of "sick campus" of state university system; E 6
- High wind created by M. L. Rafferty, superintendent of public instruction and senatorial candidate. P. Kerby; S 400
- Southern coast being spoiled by oil drilling and installations. T. Schoenman; C 226
- Stockton murder trial of middle-class Negro C. Watkins. By M. Smith; S 429
- Successful tactics of Black panthers in Oakland. M. Harris; S 15; see also C, 130, with Harris reply
- See also Los Angeles; San Francisco
- California rural legal assistance (CRLA); social-reform breakthrough for migratory farm workers. E. Gray; S 368
- Callaway, Howard (Ho); blundering Nixon campaign manager in South 75
- Camino Real (Cincinnati Playhouse in the park production). Reviewed by J. Novick; C 382
- Campbell, Angus
- How we voted — and why, in 1968 elections; S 550
- Campbell, John A.
- MACE and CHEMICAL MACE trademarks of General Ordnance Equipment Corp.; C 98
- Canada; hopes and fears in election of dashing P. Trudeau as prime minister. M. de Villiers; E 38; see also C, 98
- Cannibals, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 603
- Capital punishment; former Governor E. G. Brown of California on "playing God"; E 166; see also C, 418
- Capitalism; H. Belloc and J. M. Keynes on 654
- Caple, Horace; Negro and family harassed by white neighbors in Raleigh, N.C. by H. Capp, Al; cartoonist's fear of murder by pacifists groundless. J. Hughes; C 148
- Carruth, Hayden
- Pill as bringer of sterility to sexual relations; C 354; see also E, 294
- Casario, Archbishop Mario; kidnapped for three days by Guatemalan rightists 8
- Cassavetes, John. Film Faces reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 379
- Castro, Premier Fidel. See Cuba
- Catholic church; in Guatemala 8 ff.
- Caucus for a new political science; new professional group opposed to military-academic alliances 180-1
- Cayuga lake, N.Y.; threatened pollution by nuclear power plant; E 709
- Censorship; of Czech press as goal of Soviet invasion. A. Werth; S 230
- Smother's brothers' TV program and. P. Kerby; S 563
- Centre theatre group, Los Angeles. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 92
- Chaikin, Joseph, and J.-C. van Itallie. Play The serpent reviewed by R. Pasoli; D 157
- Chardet, Terrence
- Nationwide presidential primaries needed; C 226
- Charities; California ruling, as in American cancer society case, forces utilization of reserve funds; E 38
- Chekhov, Anton. Play The seagull (Stratford, Ont., festival production) reviewed by R. Hatch; D 190
- Chemmy circle, the (Shaw festival production). Reviewed by J. Novick; D 222
- Chicago
- Autopsy on August police riot; E 227
- City-sponsored TV program, What trees do they plant, on riots during Democratic convention. C. Horan; E 348
- Daley asks for trouble; bad publicity likely from police treatment of demonstrators during Democratic convention; E 131
- Dilemma of Negroes in 1968 presidential election. L. F. Palmer, Jr.; S 394
- Dossier on Mayor Daley. By R. S. Coffey; S 328
- Hilton hotel incident; blitzkrieg attack on pacifist crowd. T. W. Pew, Jr.; E 229
- Negro army unit's refusal to fight protesters during Democratic convention, with subsequent arrest; E 421; see also C, 578
- Police brutality preceded by same in Oakland, Cal. N. Narr; C 258
- Preserving disorder in, thanks to Mayor Daley. By R. Stern; E 292
- Proposed ACLU suit against for police riot; statements and photos wanted. J. Miller; C 258
- Regular army troops at ready during Democratic convention riots; E 452
- Shame of city; police provocations during Democratic convention. A. J. Mikva; E 229
- What Daley needs. Daley gets; political jobs essential for machine. R. Whitehead, Jr.; S 486
- Children; aid to dependents under fire 558 ff.
- Supplemental clothing funds won by mothers of dependents in Ann Arbor. Mich. N. C. Mills; S 562; see also C, 10
- Chilton, Robert E., III
- Plain talk with vodka; interviews with Soviet journalists; S 492
- Washington's old logistics; unmanned embassy in Moscow and projected consulate in Leningrad; E 593
- China, Communist
- Dedication of Mao 618-9
- In out of the cold; apparent approach to moderation and thaw in foreign policy. J. Gittings; S 686
- Intrusion of U.S. factor in improved U.S.-Soviet relations 38
- Lobster land; a traveler in China. A. Moravia; S 103; see also C, 162 and 277
- Minimal representation in Mongolia 177 ff.
- Motivations of proposal to resume Warsaw talks with U.S.; E 642; see also 687
- Target of Sentinel missile approved by Congress; E 6
- China, Nationalist; civil liberties suppressed; "trial" of Chen Yui-shi. By R. Merideth; C 578
- Stumbling block to détente between U.S. and Communist China 642
- Chisholm, Mrs. Shirley; first Negro congresswoman 517
- Christianity; gradual compromises with state power 657
- Christopher, Maurice
- Gun control, Congress and the TV networks; S 115
- Cigarettes. See Tobacco
- Cincinnati. See professional theater, Playhouse in the park. Reviewed by J. Novick; T 382
- Cities, U.S.
- Aspen, Colo., conference on design reviewed by W. B. Rollins; A 59
- Crisis in will affect foreign policy 590-1
- Election mosaic: reports from the great centers 518-22
- Ghetto housing by private enterprise through tax credits among Nixon campaign nostrums. C. Rabb; S 463

- Presidential candidates ambiguous on problems 425
- Short-changed in state aid to ghetto schools; lawsuit suit against Michigan, T. P. Wilbur; S 691
- Significance of rioting by Negroes 83
- Urban Riots: Violence and Social Change called to rebut radicals' revolutionary phrase convictions; E 228
- Civil liberties; American civil liberties union's compromise resolution on criteria for staff membership; E 69
- Proposed suit by ACLU against Chicago for police riot; statements and photos wanted; J. Miller; C 258
- Civil rights. See Negroes - Civil rights
- Clark, William; Illinois senatorial candidate not supported by Johnson or organized labor; E 325
- Not supported by Daley machine in Chicago 486
- Cleaver, Eldridge; Oakland, Cal., Black Panther indicted for assault 16-17
- Presidential candidate of peace and freedom party 265
- Scheduled participation in U. of California experimental course; E 294
- Clifford, Defense secretary Clark; speech advocating Pentagon attack on U.S. social life 357
- Cloward, Richard A., and Frances Fox Piven Finishing the poor: proposed flat-rant welfare payments in New York City; 332
- The poor against themselves: (white) workers vs. (black) welfare recipients; S 558; see also C, 674 and 706
- Clurman, Harold
- Reviews of motion pictures
- Faces 379
- Mochelet 349
- New York film festival 346 and 379
- Partner 379
- Weekend 379
- Review of plays
- Basement, the 477
- Antigone (Living theater production) 446
- Cannibals, the 603
- Cry of players, a 446
- Great white hope, the 665
- Huui, huui 573
- King Lear (Lincoln center production) 477
- Living theatre, the (Brooklyn academy of music) 412
- Lovers and other strangers 412
- Men in the glass booth, the 510
- Misthrope, the (AFA production) 665
- Morning, Noon and Night 665
- Sweet Eros 665
- Ten party 665
- Witness 665
- Zorba 604
- Coal mining; preventable disasters, as in Mannington, W. Va.; tragedy; E 610
- "Subversive" poor of eastern Kentucky or-ganize against strip mining. G. L. Mason; 721
- Coalitions; of future in U.S. politics. W. L. Abbott; S 273
- Coffey, Raymond R. Dossier on Mayor Daley of Chicago; S 328
- Coffin, Rev. William Sloane, Jr.; anti-draft conspiracy conviction in Boston; E 4
- Cohen, Carl The case for selective pacifism; S 11; see also C, 66
- Cohen, Stanley Politics of vandalism; more purposeful than vandals; S 497
- Cohn, Roy; inconsistent in protests against indictment based on criminals' and informers' testimony like that in Rosenberg case. A. Katz; C 642
- Coleman, Elliott Touch and go; P 310
- Colen, Michael; elected New York State Democratic national committeeman on frank anti-Vietnam platform; E 39
- Colitt, Leslie East and West German television compared; 508
- Colleges and universities. See Education
- Commonwealth university. See Education
- Comfort, J. Farley; P 157
- Communism Change of power characterized by palace revolutions; signs in Soviet Union. S. I. Ploss; S 494
- Czech liberals vs. Stalinists. J. Mucha; S 29; see also C, 290
- Czech-Soviet ideological rift. V. Blackwell; S 145
- Czechs united behind liberalizers. A. Werth; 323; see also C, 290
- Economic and social failure in Czechoslovakia. P. D. Hazard; S 201

- French party as only real force on Left. A. Werth; S 710
- Liberal Communism: the basic dogma, the source for freedom, the danger in optimism. Sir C. P. Snow; S 617
- Limits of power demonstrated in Eastern Europe 168 ff.
- Not in vanguard of May demonstrations in France 7, 295, 297
- Negro, Charlene Mitchell, presidential candidate of U.S. party 396
- Opposition to as Nixon's stock trade 99
- Party in many countries opposed to Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia 74, 162, 232
- Setbacks in French elections 8 f.
- Terrorism in Guatemala 232
- World federation of trade unions secretariat 8-1 against Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia; E 388
- Conglomerates. See Business
- Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report (periodical); on possible $10.8-billion cut in defense budget; 36
- Connecticut; Democratic convention rigged by bosses, with E. J. McCarthy forces under-represented. R. J. Walton; E 2
- Election results analyzed. J. L. Wilson; S 518
- Conscientious objectors. See Peace and pacifism
- Conservation; essential for survival of human race. R. and L. Rienow; S 138; see also C, 226
- Conservative party, New York State; strong showing of Senate candidate J. Buckley 518
- Conservatives; danger of broad rightist crack-down in U.S.; 322
- Consumer legislation; Nixon vs. the consumer. W. P. Rokes; S 583
- Consumers union; suit against government to release evaluations on consumer goods 485
- Couve de Murville, Maurice; appointed premier of France 73, 74
- Cowley, Malcolm Two memories of the Joe McCarthy era. Poem in a time of crisis: 1951; The enemy within: 1952; P 85
- Cox, Arthur; head of commission reporting on Columbia U. violence 420
- Cox enterprises, inc.; publisher of Atlanta Constitution and Journal 680 ff.
- Crawford, Robert; opponent of M. L. Rafferty in California senate race 400 ff.
- Victory of 519
- Crase, Douglas New memories for Democrats in Michigan; "walk-in" of McCarthy forces; S 461
- Cray, Ed Social reform through law: breakthrough for migratory farm workers by California rural legal assistance (CRLA); S 368
- Crime; in Chicago under Mayor Daley 329
- Increase in conviction as cure among Nixon campaign nostrums. F. Serbi; S 464
- Unequal punishment for; reform urged by J. V. Bennett; E 708
- Vandalism; political weapon as well as wanton destruction. S. Cohen; S 497
- CRLA. See California rural legal assistance
- Hooked carol. N. Farber; P 669
- Crossword puzzles. F. W. Lewis. See back pages
- Crow, John E. World House committee chairmen as bar to progress; E 706
- Crozier, Michel. Flaw in article The lonely frontier of reason, June 24 issue. E. S. Herman; C 52
- Cry of players, a. Reviewed by H. Clurman; 604
- Cuba Castro's defense of Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia; E 292
- Castro's lesson from U.S. intervention in Guatemala 290
- Plane hijackings and New York bombings may force "rediscovery" by U.S.; E 197
- Taylor report on Bay of Pigs invasion still withheld from U.S. public 485
- Urban farmers in green belts. T. F. Harding and D. W. Bray; S 107
- Culture; doubtful value in new technological society 585 ff.
- Obsolescence of progress, democracy, and socialism as bases. R. V. Sampson; S 653
- Currencies. See Money
- Czechoslovakia Backwash of Prague; power struggle in Soviet Union. A. Werth; S 710
- Brutal and stupid invasion by Soviet Union; E 162
- Dubcek-Svoboda regime's agreement in name only with Soviet Union; E 195
- Invasion news delayed in Soviet press 492
- People cool amid liberalization of regime; S 79; see also C, 243
- People's optimism on liberalization of regime despite Soviet disfavor. V. Blackwell; S 145
- Problems for liberal Communism 620, 621
- Represents hope for democratic world 297
- Schweik and the Russian bear: go-slow economy. P. D. Hazard; S 201
- Similar liberalization trend within Soviet Union may have precipitated invasion; 482
- Soviet intervention opposed by French and Italian Communists 74
- Soviet invasion condemned by secretariat of world federation of trade unions; E 388
- Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia by Castro; E 292
- Soviet invasion's relation to missile race with U.S.; 261
- Voices of Prague just before Soviet invasion. B. B. Page; S 203; see also C, 290
- Watcher in Prague; eyewitness account of Soviet invasion. J. Mucha; S 360
- What Moscow fears; liberalization as real reason for invasion; contrast with 1939. A. Werth; S 230; see also C, 290
- D
- Daley, Mayor Richard J. See Chicago
- Dana, Robert Passage (for Kim Merker); P 536
- Danaher, Matthew re-election of clerk of Cook Co. court essential for Daley machine 486
- Davidson, Gordon; artistic director of Center theatre group, Los Angeles 92
- Davis, William The hand is quicker than the eye - or nose; P 410
- Dayan, General Moshe; opposed to old-line Israeli politicians; able rule of occupied Arab territories; 526, 528 632
- Dead sailor, the. L. Turco; P 630
- Death. P. Dow; P 630
- Deedle deedle dumping, my son God. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 125
- de Gaulle, President Charles. See France
- Delivered without heat. C. Staloff; S 314
- Democracy; animating belief in challenged throughout world. R. V. Sampson; S 653
- Wide disillusionment with parliamentary government 170 ff.
- Democratic party Bitter legacy of LBJ; apparent throwing of election to Nixon at Chicago convention. C. McWilliams; S 198; see also C, 354
- Changes in House leadership predicted; E 579
- Chicago as unfortunate site for convention site; E 131; E, 227
- Control by Mayor Daley in Illinois. R. Whitehead, Jr.; 486
- Democrats for V.V. formation of New Democratic coalition to restructure party. T. Smekbakken; S 427; see also C, 514
- Election results in great centers analyzed 518-22
- Fallacious dogma that presidential nominee must justify record of incumbent administration; hopes for McCarthy; E 132
- In disarray because of Johnson's Vietnam stand; E 164
- New politics for in Michigan; "walk-in" of McCarthy forces. D. Crase; S 461
- No toleration of dissent; former committee-man won't vote for Humphrey. By J. F. Webb; C 162
- Reformist elements 276-7
- Revitalization slated 516
- Rival "loyal" and "regular" factions to send delegates from Mississippi to national convention. C. Wilkie; S 135
- Votes people of Pennsylvania by choosing Humphrey delegates. J. Higgins; S 109
- Withhold presidential vote to teach lesson to convention delegates. L. W. Naness; C 386
- Wooing Negro vote - ineffectively? R. Maynard; S 392
- See also Elections, U.S., 1968
- Dempsey, John T. Michigan election results analyzed; S 520
- The November watershed in U.S. politics: new issues, new coalitions; S 425
- Departures. L. Pastan; P 374
- Design, industrial and urban. Aspen, Colo., conference reviewed by W. B. Rollins; A. Desmond, James; tribute to late Nation contributor; E 109
- Despres, Leon; liberal Chicago alderman on Mayor Daley 331
- On low voter turnout in Chicago 396
- Detroit; suit against Michigan for financial aid to ghetto and suburban schools. T. P. Wilbur; S 691
- Year without news during long newspaper strike. J. Aumente; S 363

- de Villiers, Marq
Prime minister P. Trudeau of Canada as flying young man of destiny; E 38;
see also C 98
- Dionysius in 69. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 29
- Dirksen, Senator Everett M.; alleged deal with Johnson to secure A. Fortas appointment as chief justice; E 325
- Not actively opposed by Daley machine in Chicago 486
- Disarmament. See Peace and pacifism
- Distances. L. Pastan; P 374
- DMZ, New York political café reviewed by R. Hatch; D 510
- Dollar, U.S.; vulnerability in international currency system 578
- Dow, Philip 630
- Death P. 630
- Dratt, See United States — Defense, national Dreher, Carl
Rigged vote in Physics Today on C. Schwartz amendment for inclusion of letters of social opinion; C 386; see also
E 294
- Drinking. See Automobile industry
- Drinnon, Richard
E. G. Brown hypocritical on capital-punishment cases; C 418; see also E 166
- Drugs; proposed "dangerous drugs" legislation, against LSD, pep pills, etc., remission of prohibition. E. J. Shoben, Jr.;
S 306
- Reform bill passed in 1962 after thalide
mide scandal 584
- Dubcek, Alexander; liberal Czech premier opposed by old-guard Communists
See also Czechoslovakia
- Duffy. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 318
- Dumas, Alexandre père. Play The three musketeers (Stratford festival production) reviewed by Hatch; D 190
- Play The three musketeers (Théâtre de la Cité production) reviewed by R. Pasolli;
D 62
- Dumon, René; book False start in Africa as bubble of austerity school of politicians 459-60
- Dunant, Jean Henri; inspired Geneva convention on neutral treatment of war prisoners 211, 212
- Dzhagarov, Georgi; liberal Bulgarian Communist's play The public prosecutor introduced by Sir C. P. Snow 617
- E
- Eakins, Thomas; material on work of artist
wanted. L. Goodrich; C 692
- Education
Blacks and students: critics of society.
T. B. Bottomore; S 565
- California board's trifling activities, including "cleaning up" of school texts; E
294; see also C 354
- Columbia U.; oust of April violence redistri-buted by Cox commission report. M.
Harris; E 420
- Ebb tide of school integration. B. Sellers;
S 426
- French university reforms sponsored by de Gaulle government. J. Frears; S 295
- High wind created in California by M. L.
Kaffery, superintendent of public instruction. P. Kerby; S 400
- Inequality in funding of ghetto and suburban schools; Detroit and Chicago suits against respective states. T. P. Wilbur;
S 691
- International student revolt 172 ff.
- Meguniversities not seen as civilizing influence. E. J. Mishan; S 466
- Mexico City strike of university students.
G. M. Bergman; S 208
- New university conference; organization to defend radical faculty members and to transform academic institutions. R.
Ross and J. Lemisch; C 130
- New York City school strike and Albany
politics. J. L. Wilson; S 648
- New York City teachers' strike; objective and complete reprinting of important Ocean Hill-Brownsville, Brooklyn. K.
G. Gross; S 522
- Nice little revolution of students of state university of New York at New Paltz.
W. Thompson; S 112
- North Carolina lagging in school integration.
H. Golden; S 692
- Ombudsman mediation gaining in popularity
at U.S. universities; E 611
- Pentagon crisis: the colleges are pulling out of research partnership with military. G.
Kolko; S 207
- Political scientists' battle for integrity amid military-academic alliance. M. Sur-kin; S 179
- Poorly planned school decentralization and teachers' strike in New York City; E 293
- Scholarships of eleven "black hired hands"
athletes canceled by U. of Texas at El Paso; E 68
- "Sick campuses" in California starved by Governor Reagan; E 7
- Socialist scholars' conference, Rutgers U.
By M. E. Gottelman; S 338
- Student demonstrations in West Berlin. A.
Gross; S 7
- Students in vanguard of May demonstrations. Frank; S 403
- Students invited to write papers in field of nonviolent political action. G. Sharp and
C. Luky; C 322
- Undemocratic features in Israel 526-7
- Wearers of mysterious insignia at Columbia graduation. E. Merriam; C 52
- Youngstown, Ohio, shuts its schools for lack of money. G. J. Macroff; S 713
- Yugoslav university students' grievances heeded by Tito regime. C. McWilliams;
S 48
- Ethim, Alex
Nonprofessional mental-hospital workers in Tokoda, Kansas, revolt; S 70
- Elections
Canada; significance of P. Trudeau as prime minister. M. de Villiers; E 38; see also C 98
- EPIC campaign waged in California by
U. Sinclair in 1934; E 613
- In riot-weary France as victory for de Gaulle; by A. Werth; S 4
- Nationwide presidential primaries needed.
T. Chandler; C 226
- 79 Elections, U.S., 1968
Ages, hacks and radicals; election of
M. Colen as New York State Democratic committeeman on frank anti-Vietnam platform; E 39
- Anti-election by New York beatniks and peacebats. K. G. Gross; S 594
- As The Nation sees them; no presidential elections; recommendations for Congress; E 418
- Attempts to form new party, McCarthyitebased national protest organization. P.
Singer; S 264
- Bitter legacy of LBJ; Democrats' apparent throwing of election to Nixon at Chicago convention. C. McWilliams; S 198;
see also C 354
- Campaign '68; poor presidential choices and gratifying congressional results; E 515
- Candidates' warm-up; E 258
- C. C. LeMay, vice-presidential candidate of Wallace ticket, as normal American killer.
R. G. Sherrill; S 422
- Center group of voters not cohesive; E 260
- Church-Hansen senatorial race in Idaho
M. McCrery; S 233
- Delicate Nixon-Humphrey balance, with Nixon not preferred. R. C. Stephenson;
C 290
- Democratic candidates and bosses; E. J.
McCarthy forces underrepresented on delegations, inspiring third-party movement. R. J. Walton; E 2
- Demonstrated tie against school integration
Dirksen-Clark senatorial contest in Illinois;
D 627
- Disillusioning support of hawkish candidates
by such doves as E. M. Kennedy, W.
Lippmann, and J. V. Lindsay. By N.
Seidita; C 514
- Double vacuum with party regulars Humphrey and Nixon; danger from Wallace;
E 66
- E. Gruening defeated by M. Gravel in Alaska Democratic senatorial primary;
D 197
- Election mosaic: reports from the great centers 518-22
- Fallacious dogma that Democratic nominee must justify record of incumbent administration; hopes for McCarthy; E 2
- G. C. Wallace campaign speech in Charlotte, N.C.; will draw many of state's majority voters. H. Golden; E 627
- Georgia primary contest between Senator H.
Talmadge and Negro lawyer M. Jackson;
E 165; 209-10
- How we voted and why. A. Campbell;
S 550
- Humphrey and Nixon as nominees by democrats compared; E 226
- Illusions of a waging 1948-type
Truman campaign; E 324
- Johnson's intransigence on Vietnam as burden on Humphrey; E 164
- Johnson's withdrawal gives him free hand in foreign policy. D. L. Robinson; S 18
- Kennedy backers should unite behind Mc-Carthy, who is not a "no chance" candidate; E 67; see also C 162
- Large, nonvoting groups of alienated and disaffected shown by poll surveys; E 708
- McCarthy, not Humphrey, worthy of Democrats' votes. J. Korshak; C 66
- McCarthy's victory in defying political mores and bringing Vietnam issue before country; E 194
- Most of Pennsylvania Democratic delegation to Humphrey; despite voters' choice of McCarthy. By J. Higgins; S 109
- Negro candidates in South; talent without campaign funds. R. G. Sherrill; S 209
- Negro candidates of three minor parties 396-7
- Negro vote in South encouraging; E 547
- Negroes more interested in local issues than in supporting Humphrey. R. Maynard;
S 392
- New game in South; Negroes' participation in politics. V. E. Jordan, Jr.; S 397
- November watershed in U.S. politics: new issues, new coalitions. J. T. Dempsey;
S 425
- Parties' finger pointing on campaign costs;
E 644
- Party-splitting by many candidates; E 450
- Peace and freedom party candidates in California 17
- Political candidates; negative mood among electorate. D. M. Muschore; S 40
- Rafferty vs. Cranston in California Senate race 400 ff.
- Republican gamble in nominating Nixon;
E 98; see also C 194
- Republican strategy backfires in South. R.
G. Sherrill; S 75
- Republicans comfortable with Nixon at Miami convention. K. Purnell; S 102
- Revolutionary age needs broader choice than Humphrey and McCarthy. H. Golden; S 226
- R. M. Scammon analysis pinpoints middle-class, middle-aged white voter as crucial factor; E 259
- Scandal of omission by all candidates in presidential campaign; E 354
- Scar of Wallace on. E. Schneier; S 454
- South will vote for Nixon and Wallace despite Democratic largesse. H. Golden; S 147
- Vote for Humphrey would betray memory of R. F. Kennedy. By A. Katz; C 2
- Wallace's appeal to white union members;
E 165
- Wallace's call for police state fails to evoke protest from other candidates. P. E.
State; C 386
- What Daley needs, Daley gets in Illinois contests. R. Whitehead, Jr.; S 486
- Wide interest in Negro vote; E 389
- Wide labor pressure for Wallace over
Humphrey. By B. J. Widick; C 358
- Electoral college; revision of law on slated 551-2
- Elegy for the poet Morgan Blum, an. J. S.
Wright; P 85
- Enemy within, the. M. Cowley; P 85
- Engels, John
Landlord; P 53
- Engineering. See Science
- Engineering News Record; spokesman for highway-construction interests 530 ff.
- Espionage; great West German spy farce;
E 448
- Euripides. Dionysius in 69, adaptation of drama The Bacchae, reviewed by J. Novick;
D 29
- Europe; defies U.S. dollar in international monetary struggle. M. Tanzer; S 268
- Vulnerability of industrial societies. N.
Birnbaum; S 167
- F
- Faces. Reviewed by H. Churman; MP 379
- Faiz, Faiz Ahmad
H. I. were certain; P 474
- Falange. See Spain
- FAR; Communist guerrillas in Guatemala 8 ff.
- Farber, Norma
Cried carol; P 669
- Farley, Jean
Comfort; P 157
- Fascism; changes of in U.S. through broad repression by police and military; E 322
- For the future in Spain. G. Jackson; S 326
- Faure, Edgar; French education minister's strategic sponsorship of university reforms
J. Frears; S 295
- Ferlinghetti, Lawrence
The secret meaning of things; P 251
- Ferre, Luis; senatorial candidate elected governor of Puerto Rico. T. Pugh; E 549
- Feydeau, Georges. Chemmy circle, the, adaptation of farce. La main passe, reviewed by J. Novick; D 222
- Figueiredo, António de
Portuguese African empire after Salazar;
S 399
- Film. See Motion pictures
- Findley, Representative Paul; effort to limit individual farm subsidies to $20,000; E 291

Finnefrock, Jerry W.; General Telephone Co. employee's testimony on firm's practices breaks business code; E 548
 Fischer-Dieskau, Dietrich; Schubert recital reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 476
 Fishing industry; salmon as world's most valuable fish; S 240
 Florence, Italy; loan exhibition of frescoes at Metropolitan Museum of Art 378
 Flute song, J. Moore; P 598
 Foundation; Moore; P 598
 Foreign aid; AID backing of African-American labor center 485
 Guatemala: U.S. arms used against guerrillas 10
 To Greece restored 42
 Fortas, Justice Abe; American bar association's rubber-stamp endorsement of nomination as chief justice of Supreme court; E 101
 Johnson-Dirks deal to secure confirmation alleged by W. Clark, Dirksen opponent in Illinois senatorial race; E 325
 Foster, John S., defense's director of research and engineering consultation toward disaffected grantees; E 356 Foundations; arm of philanthropy of the rich. G. G. Kirstein; S 235
 France
 Cleverness of de Gaulle in playing on people's fears following May riots. A. Werth; S 7
 Communist party only real force of Left. A. Werth; S 710
 Drive to slow down U.S. investment in Europe and pressure on dollar 269
 French under pressure 578
 Intellectuals rejected by quietist Communist party in May uprisings. J.-P. Sartre; S 297
 Military aid to Latin American fosters new junta crop, as in Peru and Panama; E 453
 New sobriety reflected in measures to protect France; unable to force upward revaluation of mark; E 643
 Post-race election as victory for de Gaulle. By A. Werth; S 7
 Rendezvous in October; economic situation at university reforms. J. Frears; S 295
 Franco, Francisco, Spain 295
 Frankenstein (Living theater production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 445
 French Union 445
 Rendezvous in October in France; economic situation and university reforms; S 295
 Freedom of speech; and O'Brien draft-card case. W. Martin; S 4
 Friedberg, Martha 118
 Night letter; P 118
 Franklin, Gen. 732
 Stanford Street poem: Albuquerque; P 261
 Funerals; drive-in mortuary in Atlanta; E 261
 Furness, Betty; as presidential assistant on consumer affairs 584
 G
 Gabree, John. Observations on June 24 article. Serious rock. B. F. Jones; C 642
 Gabrielson, Erik; voting age should be lowered to 18; C 642
 Gardner, Lawrence; anti-apartheid editor on trial by South African government; E 581
 Gardar, Isabella 730
 Knowing; P 76
 Gardner, Representative James C.; anti-Negro speech by North Carolina Republican 300
 Garry, Charles; defense attorney in trial of H. P. Newton 300
 Gault, President Charles de See France 300
 Gatch, Dr. Donald; driven out of Beaufort, S.C., for testimony on Negroes' living conditions. H. Golden; S 564
 General defense corps competition from Grumman for construction of VFX plane; E 196
 General Telephone Co.; employee J. W. Finnefrock's testimony on firm's business necessity code; E 548
 Genness, Eleanor 548
 M. Gordon letter of Nov. 18 not perceptive on black coalition; C 578; see also C. 514; 378
 Geneva convention; in eclipse in Vietnam as U.S. forces use medicine as weapon. L. J. Rafter; S 211
 Georgia; challenge of Negro lawyer M. Jackson to H. Talmadge in Democratic senatorial primary; E 165
 Significance of crisis at Atlanta Constitution, formerly hard-hitting newspaper. A. Schardt; S 679
 Summary arrest of robbery victim in Atlanta. B. Kiely; S 553; see also C. 674
 Germany
 Badly overgrown could learn from incident of G. Opperman, young mine-field victim; E 677

East and West German TV programs compared. L. Colitt; T 508
 Germany, West 508
 Flight to French funds 548
 Great spy force; E 548
 Refusal to revalue mark upward; E 643
 Wartime "innocents," including Chancellor Adenauer; E 643 Getting the picture. N. Price; P 502
 Gettelman, Marvin E. 502
 Search for relevance at socialist scholars' conference. Rutgers U.; S 338
 Geyer, George Anne 338
 The blood of Guatemala: left, right and center 8
 Ghana; K. Nkrumah's fall attributed to ostentatious and corrupt regime 458-9
 Gibson, William. Play A cry of players reviewed by H. Clurman; D 604
 Gitlin, Todd 604
 Defense funds needed for Privates D. Amick and K. Stolla, distributors of antiwar leaflets on army base; C 194
 Communist China in out of the cold; apparent foreign-policy thaw; S 686
 Glicksman, Abraham 686
 Japan is to U.S. as Czechoslovakia is to Soviet Union; C 516
 God; depicted as Santa Claus figure by Rev. J. Peale; E 643
 Godard, Jean-Luc. Film Weekend reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 379
 Gold 268 ff.
 Precarious role for international currency system 578
 Goldberg; Arthur J.; agreement with U Thant that U.S. should halt bombing of North Vietnam 324
 Golden, Harry 324
 Curtailed U.S. postal service compared with other countries 114
 Dr. D. Gatch driven out of Beaufort, S.C., for testimony on Negroes' living conditions; S 564
 G. D. Gatch presidential-campaign speech in Charlotte, N.C. against federal bigness and interference; S 51
 Harassment of H. H. family in Raleigh symptomatic of opposition to open housing in North Carolina; S 500
 Jews' apathy toward Negroes' problems nurtured by anti-Semitism 334
 North Carolina's unearned progressive reputation; lagging in school integration; S 692
 South will vote Republican or for Wallace case. Federal largesse; S 147
 Goldman, Eric; unhappy tenure as Johnson's intellectual in residence; B 517
 Goldwater, Barry; legacy of 1964 presidential campaign to Republican Party 75
 Good money after bad. W. Heyen; P 538
 Goodman, Sandy. June 3 article mistaken in stating that Vietnam enlistments have not been extended. G. J. Boggio; C 2
 Goodrich, Lloyd 692
 Gordon, M. 692
 Emancipating the mental wards; strike of mainly Negro nonprofessionals at New York State mental institutions 650
 B. J. Widick not perceptive on Wallace wave among union members; C 514; see also 358 and C. 578
 Gore, Jack; warning force behind New Democratic coalition 428
 Graffiti of Paris student uprising; P 84
 Grate society, the G. Bowring; S 446
 Gravel, Mike; victor over E. Gruening in Alaska Democratic senatorial primary; E 197
 Graves, Stewart 197
 Ireland's mass resistance to war prevented draft in World War I; C 148
 Great Britain 148
 Backing of Nigerian government in civil war 132
 Backlash of technology: pressure for redistribution of political power. A. W. Benn; S 136
 Devaluation of pound forced by speculation 272-3
 Evil consequences of progress and democracy 655-6
 National trust examines all proposals in light of history and environment 141
 Great wall of China; reflections on. A. Moravia; S 103; see also C. 162 and 277
 Great white hope, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 446
 Greener 446
 Illegitimately drafted constitution endorsed by junta-backed referendum; E 388
 Police state; torture of prisoners; E 644
 Pressure on Greek-language press abroad; E 581

U.S. military aid restored; obscure role of magnate A. Onassis 452
 Greene, Sheldon; crusading CRLA attorney 369 ff. 369
 Gregory, Dick; Negro candidate for presidency 265; 396
 Not allowed to campaign in Chicago 487 side 396
 Grenier, John; unsuccessful strategy for Republican party in South 77
 Grier, Henry; prosecution witness in trial of H. P. Newton 300
 Gross, Alfred 300
 Letter from (West) Berlin; chronic crisis in; S 408
 Gross, Kenneth G. 408
 The acid rock vigil; New York hippies' and peaceniks' anti-election demonstration; S 594
 Bad show for reporters; complete and objective coverage impossible in Ocean Hill-Brownsville phase of New York City school strike; S 522
 Grossman, Suzanne. Play The Chemmy circle reviewed by J. Novick; D 222
 Gruening, Senator Ernest; tribute to Alaskan defeated in Democratic primary; E 197
 Write-in campaign needs support. W. A. Price, M.D. 354
 Write-in campaign reactivates candidacy; E 389
 Grumman architectural engineering corp.; proposal to construct VFX plane despite link with General dynamics; E 196
 Guatemala; carnage in and U.S. meddling. G. A. Geyer; S 88-9
 Workings of Alliance for Progress 88-9
 Gulf & Western; fast-growing conglomerate 434-5
 Guns; booming sales in domestic arms race; E 580
 Congressmen could protect own lives by voting for control legislation. M. C. Gelpink; C 20
 National rifle association lobby retains tax-exempt status. K. Pagerin; C 148
 Spotty backing for advertising campaign for control legislation in Congress, among TV networks, and in advertising industry itself. M. Christopher; S 115
 Gusfield, Joseph; study of prohibition movement shows parallels with Wallace wave 456
 Gutman, Herbert; analysis of U.S. labor socialist scholars' conference 339
 H
 Haddon, Dr. William, Jr.; report on drinking drivers ignores unsafe cars; welcomed by auto industry; E 229
 Hahn, Fritz Gebhard von; ex-Nazi official's plea of ignorance of mass murder of Jews backed by Chancellor Kiesinger; E 36
 Haines, John 36
 America; 250
 Halleck, Representative Charles A.; tribute by colleague L. M. Rivers upon retirement 250
 Hamilton, Charles G. 250
 Vote for Nixon like bringing Hayes sellout of 1876, which ended first Reconstruction; S 418
 Hamilton, David 418
 Reviews of music 418
 Nine rivers from Jordan, opera by H. Weisgal, at New York City opera; Hunter college's New image of sound current; W. B. W. 542
 The politics of harmony 542
 Recordings of electronic music from International music congress in New York; D 476
 Fischer-Dieskau Schubert recital at Carnegie recital hall; L. Berio's Sinfonia 476
 Reviews of record of electronic music 476
 Bach, Handel, Ravel 476
 Records 1968 601
 Wagner opera: Das Rheingold and Die Walkure by H. von Karajan; Die fliegende Holländer by O. Klemperer 733
 Hamlet (American conservatory theatre production). Reviewed by J. Novick; D 126
 Hamlet (New York Shakespeare festival's open-air production). Reviewed by S. Bernard; D 93
 Hand, the, is quicker than the eye — or nose. W. V. Davis; P 410
 Hanrahan, Edward; election as Cook Co. prosecutor essential for Mayor Daley of Chicago 486, 487
 Hansen, George V.; racist opponent of Senator F. Church. By M. McCrery; S 233
 Harding, Timothy H. and Donald W. Brainerd 233
 Urban farmers in the green belt of Cuba; S 107
 Harris, Louis; analysis of new coalitions in U.S. politics 273-4
 Survey measures political disaffection in U.S.; E 708

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Harris, Marvin	420	Huff, Robert	280	In Soviet Union and Eastern Europe op-	483
Onus for April violence at Columbia U.		The ventriloquist (in memory of J. P.);	280	posed to invasion of Czechoslovakia; E
redistributed by Cox commission report;		Humphrey, Vice President Hubert H.		International association for cultural free-	676
E		Burden of Johnson and Vietnam policy;		dom conference, Princeton; E
Harris, Michael	420	LIB's hawkish speech to VFW just be-	164	Johnston's unhappy relations; Nith; J. P.	517
Black panthers: the cornered cats; probable		fore Democratic convention; E		Roche's message to intelligentsia; E	517
crushing of militant Negro movement in		Candidacy supported by supposed doves such		Overestimated staying power of modern sys-	168
California; S	15; see also C, 130,	as E. M. Kennedy and M. Harrington.	514	Role in social change discussed at socialist with Harris reply		By N. V. Seiditz; C	514	scholars' conference, Rutgers U.	340
Hatch, John	458	Choice of Pennsylvania Democratic bosses		Technicians' ambiguous relationship to cen-	170
Austerity as new focal issue in African		despite low primary vote; J. Higgins; S	109	ters of power politics; S		Contrast with McCarthy on Vietnam issue;	109	International association for cultural freedom;
Hatch, Robert		Contrast with McCarthy on Vietnam issue;	109	fruitful conference at Princeton imparts	676
Reviews of motion pictures		Cuts ludicrous figure; E	98	new image; E
Beyond the law	508	Disingenuous neutrality on blame for Chi-	227	International monetary fund (IMF); proposed	272
Bride wore black, the	61	cago police riot; E		special drawing rights to substitute for gold
Duffy	61	Endorsement by AFL-CIO leaders not ac-	356, 358-9	International petroleum company (Standard
Joanna	666	cepted by much of rank and file		oil); Belandine government's concessions to
Lady on the tracks	666	Expected to get Southern Negro vote. V. E.	397	as factor in military coup. S. L. Rozman;	432
Nazarin	508	Jordan, Jr.; S	397	S
Negatives	29	Game campaign fight	516	Plant expropriated by Peruvian junta; E	453
Petulia	637	Illusions of waging 1948-type Truman cam-	324	Interstate highway act. See Roads
Pretty poison	637	ignade on issues; possibility of election		Ireland; mass resistance to war prevented
Romeo and Juliet	60	by House of Representatives	425 ff.	draft in World War I. By S. Graves; C	148
Rosemary's baby	318	Induces apathy in revolutionary age; E	35	Israel; political stagnation following 1967
Warrendale	638	Negro apathy toward. R. Maynard; S	392	war. C. W. Gonick; S	525
Yellow submarine	510	New real-bias misapprehension on Latin		Wary exchange of memoranda with U.A.R.	582
Reviews of plays		America	587	See also Middle East
DMZ, New York political café		On government's setting up of own research	207
Stratford, Ontario, festival (Midsummer		laboratories	258
night's dream, Tarriffe, The seagull.		Poor start in campaign; E	354
The three musketeers	189	Scandalous failure to discuss real issues,
We bombed in New Haven	477	such as Vietnam, in presidential cam-	354
Hatchett, John F.; Negro activists' denunciation		paign; E	487
of Nixon and Humphrey as "racist		Spotty support by Daley machine	487
bastards," with genuflection to Wallace's		Suicidal tactics at Chicago convention. C.
honesty	390	McWilliams; S	198; see also C, 354
Hawkins, Reginald; North Carolina Negro's		Unway of Democrats' voters; J. Korshak;	66 campaign for governorship	20-11	Vote for would betray memory of R. F.
Hawes, President Rutherford Birchard; sell-out		Kennedy. By A. Katz; C	2 victory in 1876 analogous to Nixon victory.	418	Witnesses as Democratic standard-bearer;	66
C. G. Hamilton; C		Heart presidential nomination by default;	226
Hazard, Patrick D.	201	comparison with Nixon; E
Schweik and the Russian bear; Czechoslo-		Humphrey's Soviet intervention of 1956 con-
vakia in August; S	201	trasted with 1968 invasion of Czechoslo-
Heart transplants. See Medicine		vakia; E	195; see also 232
Heartbreak house (Shaw festival production).		Hunter college. New images of sound concert	542
Reviewed by J. Novick; D	221	reviewed by D. Hamilton; M
Heckert, Eleanor	366	Hutching, Phil; new head of CORE deprecates	36
Color blind from birth; racial integration in		riots; E	665
U.S. Virgin Islands; S	477	Huot, R. Renewed by H. Clurman; D
S. Heller, Joseph. Play We bombed in New		Huxley, Aldous; memorabilia needed for biog-	418
Haven reviewed by R. Hatch; D		raphy. S. Bedford; C
Herman, Edward S.	52
Flaw in M. Crozier article, The lonely frontier of reason, in May 27 issue; C	185
Hernandez, Miguel
Still fields (translated by T. Baland; P	185
Heyden, William	538
Good money after bad; P
Higgins, James	508
Democratic party in Pennsylvania vetoes
the people; choice of Humphrey over
McCarthy, landslide primaries victory;	109
S
Highways. See Roads
Hippies; thrust of underculture on U.S. society. K. Widmer; S	716
Histadrut; powerful Israeli labor organiza-	525 ff.
tion
Hitchcock, George	57
Home town (from a Thingit myth); P
Hofa, James R.; Justice department's improper payments to hostile witnesses in trial	164 of Teamsters leader; E
Hoffer, Eric; anti-intellectual philosopher. J.
Hughes; C	148; see also E, 517
Holt, Lee E.
Mason-Dixon Line complex on part of
Johnson and Rusk in Vietnam; C	194; see also E, 134
Home town (from a Thingit myth). G. Hitchcock; P	57
Honeywell, Inc.; Rockeye anti-personnel court bomb used in Vietnam; E	5
Horman, Charles
TV: Daley's hour; documentary, What trees
do they plant, on Chicago riots during	348
Democratic convention; T
Horton, Miles
Praise for article The New Mexican land war, by C. Knowlton, is June 17 issues;	2
C
Hospitals. See Medicine
Housing; built by private enterprise in ghettos through tax credits among Nixon campaign	463
nostriums. C. Rabb; S
Open housing for Negroes widely opposed in North Carolina. H. Golden; S	500
Hoving, Thomas P. F.; innovative director of
Metropolitan museum of art	378
Hop to close the great distance between people. J. Moore; P	598
Howarth, W. H.
Snow; P	570
Huberman, Leo (1903-1968); tribute to U.S.
Socialist-publisher; E	550

PAGE

L

PAGE

PAGE

- Kalikow, Theo. J. Progress of science and technology can't be suppressed; C 610; see also 468
- Kampelman, Max; political scientist's CIA 179-80
- Kano, G. Quotation from Rev. M. Niemöller on consequences of not speaking up; C 322
- Kansas; nonprofessional mental hospital workers in Topeka "revolt." A. Effthim; S 70
- Katz, Aaron R. Cohn inconsistent in condemning indictment based on criminals' and informers' testimony; C 642
- Vote for Humphrey would betray memory of R. F. Kennedy; E 2
- Kaunda, President Kenneth D.; see Zambia
- Kennedy, Senator Edward M.; support of Humphrey 514
- Kennedy, Robert F. Assassination discourages Negro voters 393, 398
- Backers should unite behind McCarthy; E 67; see also C, 162
- Exaggerated protection and news-media coverage of assassin, S. B. Sirhan; E 133
- Followers at Democratic convention 199 ff.
- Former adherents in New Democratic coalition
- Memory would be betrayed by vote for Humphrey; B. A. A.; C 2
- Kentucky; "subversive" poor of eastern counties organize against strip coal mining. G. L. Mason; S 721
- Kerwin, Eldon America abroad: our image of their problems; U.S. foreign policy based on misapprehensions; S 586
- Kenya; extravagance of officials criticized by opposition 458, 459, 460
- Kerby, Phil California election results analyzed; S 519
- Police riding shotgun in seething Watts section of Los Angeles; growing alliance between Negroes and Mexican Americans; S 166
- Priority of real-estate profits in proposed freeway atop Santa Monica Mountains in Los Angeles; E 68
- Rafferty high wind in California; state education superintendent's career and wild-swinging senatorial campaign against A. Cranston; S 400
- Smooth brothers and TV censors; S 563
- Kieley, Benedict Thanksgiving in Atlanta jail after being robbed; S 553; see also C, 674
- Kiesinger, Chancellor Kurt-Georg; See Germany, West
- Kilty, Jerome. Dramatic production Long live life reviewed by J. Novick; D 573
- King Lear (Lincoln center production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 573
- Kipphardt, Heiner. Play In the matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer reviewed by J. Novick; D 92
- Kirkpatrick, Evon; political scientist's CIA ties 179-80
- Kirstein, George G. Philanthropy: the golden crowbar; foundations, gifts, and tax savings; S 235
- Kirstein, Jane (Jane Stolle); tribute to late U.S. correspondent and wife of former publisher of The Nation; E 101
- Kisburg, Nicholas Teamsters' welfare proposals defended; C 70; see also 538
- Kline, Franz. Retrospective exhibition at Whitney Museum of American art reviewed by W. L. Alloway; A 412
- Knocking, L. Gardner; P 730
- Knowlton, Clark. Article The New Mexican land war, in June 17 issue, praised. M. Horton; C 2
- Kolb, Gabriel Pentagon crisis: the colleges are pulling out of research partnership with military; S 207
- Korshak, Jack Democrats; will vote for McCarthy, not Humphrey; C 66
- Kosygin, Alexei N.; Soviet premier's consumer orientation not shared by colleague 495 ff.
- Kress, Melville U. Sinclair as great novelist; C 674; see also E, 613
- Kucera, Sen. J. Thomas H.; lost bid for California Republican renomination to M. L. Rafferty 402-3
- Kuerst, G. B. Page's balanced view of Czechoslovakia contrasted with A. Werth's; C 290; see also 203 and 230
- Ku Klux Klan; severe sentences for Negro youths who set fire to North Carolina property; E 517
- Analyses of working class at socialist scholars' conference, Rutgers U. 339-40
- Resurgent working-class unrest in many countries 163-9, 174
- Union
- AFL-CIO's long record of opposition to Communist federations abroad; backing of African-American labor center (AALC); C 485
- Commitment to Humphrey 199-200, 227, 356, 521
- Factor in Youngstown, Ohio, school shutdown 714
- Histadrut, Israeli federation 525 ff.
- Labour pains; revolts against G. Meany's leadership; E 356
- Long newspaper strike in Detroit. J. Aumente; S 363
- Members divided between "change" and "no-change" coalitions in new U.S. politics 274-5
- New York City school strike and Albany politics. J. L. Wilson; S 648
- New York City teachers' strike; complete and objective reporting impossible in Ocean Hill-Brownsville, Brooklyn. K. G. Formis; S 522
- Racism; E 356
- Reasons for broad appeal of G. C. Wallace 165; E, 324; 45
- Rebels in the shops: why they like Wallace. By B. J. Widick; S 358; see also C, 514 and 578
- "Revolt" of Kansas health workers union in Topeka, Kansas, mental hospital. A. Effthim; S 70
- Setbacks on Atlanta papers 681-2
- Strike at New York State mental institutions emancipated largely Negro non-professional workers. M. Gordon; S 650
- Strike moratorium in France 295
- Suppression in Spain 327
- Workers vs. Negroes and welfare recipients; investigation of welfare urged by Teamsters. R. A. Cloward and P. F. Fiven; S 558; see also C, 674 and 706
- World federation of trade unions, Communist-controlled; 8-1 secretariat majority against Soviet interference in Czechoslovakia; E 388
- Lacoste, Robert; discredited French deputy defeat 710
- Lady on the tracks. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 666
- Laird, Representative Melvin R.; on underestimation of Vietnam war costs 290
- Lahey, George. See Sharp, G.
- Lamont, Corliss Millions of American boys worried over Vietnam war; C 98
- Lampman, Robert J. What we know about poverty; backward look at Johnson war on; S 623
- Landlord, J. Engels; P 63
- Lanoux, Armand; advocacy of cultural co-existence at 1967 Moscow writers' congress 711
- Larsen, Fred; clerk in Stockton, Cal., liquor store allegedly held up by C. and T. Watkins 429 ff.
- Lat autumn leaves. R. Peterson; P 574
- Latin America; military coups 434
- New junta crop, as in Peru and Panama, nurtured by U.S. military aid; E 453
- U.S. policies toward based on New Deal misapprehensions 586-7
- Lauer, Laurence; conclusions on Negro-Jewish relationships 334
- Lavis, John R., M.D. Monoclonous not epidemic, and incidence not related to water pollution; C 226; see also 141
- Law; in Communist countries and West compared 623
- Social reform through California rural legal assistance (CRLA). E. Cray; S 368
- Unsuccessful application in sentencing for former reform campaign of J. V. Bennett; E 708
- Lawyers. See American bar association
- Le, Nguyen Thanh; North Vietnamese Paris talk delegate per se terms 335-6
- Left. U.S. See Radicals
- LeMay, Curtis E.; A-bomb just another weapon. H. Meares; C 450; see also C, 546
- Bellicose views contrasted with former col. LeMay D. Shoup's; E 133
- Vice-presidential candidate on Wallace ticket as normal American killer. R. G. Sher-rill; S 422
- War's escalation of Vietnam war 452
- Lemisch, Jesse. See Ross, R.
- Lester, Richard. Film Petulia reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 29
- Lewis, Frank W. Crossword puzzles. See back pages
- Liberalism; limits of power demonstrated in West 168
- Life; killed C. Welles article on shale oil; E 679
- Life insurance. See Insurance
- Lincoln center repertory theater. Production of King Lear reviewed by H. Clurman; D 573
- Lindsay, Mayor John V.; support of Nixon 514
- See also New York City
- Liu Shao-chi; disgraced Chinese head of state seemingly vindicated by new turn in government's foreign policy 686, 687
- Living Theatre, L. Productions reviewed by H. Clurman; D 445
- Lockheed aircraft corp.; padded cost figures for building freight airship C-55 685
- Logan, John The search; P 246; see also correction, 308
- Long live life. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 125
- Lorenz, James; crusading director of California rural legal assistance (CRLA). E. Cray; S 368
- Los Angeles. Music center's Center theatre group reviewed by J. Novick; D 92
- Police riding shotgun in seething Watts district; growing alliance between Negroes and Mexican Americans. P. Kerby; S 166
- Priority of real-estate profits in proposed freeway atop Santa Monica Mountains. P. Kerby; E 618
- Lovers and other strangers. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 462
- Lovestone, Jay; architect of global AFL-CIO campaign against Communist unions; E 485
- ISD. See Drugs
- Luan, Nguyen Ven; Saigon police chief killed by misfired U.S. rocket 144
- Lu Hsiang; thoughts on great wall of China compared with A. Moravia's. By L. H. Ravlin; C 277; see also 103
- Luedke, Hermann; suicide or murder in West German spy scandal 548
- M
- McCarthy, Senator Eugene J. Adherents in New Democratic coalition 427-8
- at disadvantage in Chicago convention 199
- Convention delegates underrepresented through bosses' machinations, as in Connecticut. R. J. Walton; E 264
- Dissociate himself from new party candidate Favours cuts in military spending 101
- Few Pennsylvania delegates despite landslide primary victory. J. Higgins; S 109
- Followers in new Michigan Democratic party coalition 461
- Growing support among influential Democrats; E 332
- Hero of 1968 campaign; E 514
- May be helped by Johnson's intransigence; E 164
- Not a "no chance" candidate; Kennedy backers should unite behind him; E 67; see also C, 162
- Role of youth in movement 275-6
- Should receive Democrats' votes. J. Korshak; C 66
- Victory in bringing Vietnam issue before country; E 94
- Would be strong candidate against Nixon; E 198
- McCarthyism; narrower menace than threatened broad crackdown by police and military in U.S.; E 322
- McCormack, Representative John W.; aged House speaker slated for replacement 579
- McCoy, Rhody; former stand of Ocean Hill, Brooklyn, governing board's head during New York City teachers' strike 523-4, 648
- McCrery, Michael Gunning for Senator F. Church of Idaho by opponent, G. V. Hansen; S 233
- McDowell, Sophia Unrepeated message: Howard U. survey shows young Negroes willing to live in amity with whites; S 81
- MACE; trademark of General Ordnance Equipment Corp.; J. A. Campbell; C 98
- McGovern, Senator George S.; backed for Democratic presidential nomination by some former Kennedy supporters 199
- McKinney, Brian. Play Deadie deddie dumping, my son God reviewed by J. Novick; D 125
- McNally, Terrence. Plays Sweet Evil, Madness and Noon reviewed by H. Clurman; D 665
- McSurely, Alan; Appalachian volunteer harassed by Kentucky authorities 722-3
- McWilliams, Carey The bitter legacy of LBJ; S 198; see also C, 354
- Tito digs the students; Yugoslav regime's constructive response to Belgrade U. demonstrations; S 48

- Maeroff, Gene I.
Midwestern election results analyzed; S Youngstown, Ohio, shuts its schools for lack of money; S
- Mahon, Representative George; urged passage of whopping "austerity" defense budget
- Mahoney, George T.; racist Democrat defeated by S. T. Agnew in 1966 Maryland gubernatorial race
- Mailier, Norman. Film Beyond the law reviewed by R. Hatch; MP
- Man in the glass booth, the. Reviewed by H.
Clurman; D
- Mandel, Ernest; Belgian socialist on reassumption of revolutionary role by working class
- Mao Tse-tung. See China, Communist
- MAPAI and MAPAM; traditional Israeli political parties
- March, John; New York State senator's baking of teachers during New York City strike
- Marcuse, Herbert; radical professor target of San Diego Co. American league; E
- Marijuana; fallacies on dangers
- Marshall, Herbert
Not credited for translation of Voznesensky poem in D. Smith article; C
- Martin, Peter W.
The draft-card burners; constitutional implications of Supreme court's ruling in
D. O'Brien case; S
- Maryknoll fathers; four members expelled for organizing peasant opposition in Guatemala
- Maryland; political background of Governor
S. T. Agnew. By R. O'Mara; S
- Mason, Gene L.
"Subversive" poor of eastern Kentucky organize against strip coal mining; S
- Mayakovsky, Vladimir V.; homeland's revival of interest in early Soviet poet
- Maynard, Robert
The black vote: Negroes more interested in local issues than in supporting Humphrey;
- Meany, George. See Labor — Union
- Medak, Peter. Film Negatives reviewed by R.
Hatch; MP
- Medicine
Nonprofessional mental-hospital workers in Topeka, Kansas, "revolt". E. Eftim; S
- Someone playing God: heart-transplant ethics. D. Smith; S
- Strike at New York State mental institutions emancipated largely Negro nonprofessional workers. M. Gordon; S
- U.S. weapon in Vietnam; Geneva convention in eclipse. L. J. Rafter; S
- Wretched health conditions of Beaufort,
S.C., Negroes
- Meeraj
A woman there was; P
- Meisler, Stanley
Pomp or courage: Nigerian civil war must end. P
- Méndez Montenegro, President Julio César.
See Guatemala
- Mergers, through formation of conglomerate
firms. H. L. Nieburg; S
- Merideth, Robert
Suppression of civil liberties in Nationalist China: "trial" of Chen Yu-hsi; C
- Merriam, Eve
Wearers of mysterious insignia at Columbia graduation; C
- Merrin, W. S.
The birds on the morning of going; P
- Mexican Americans; growing alliance with Negroes in Watts ghetto of Los Angeles
- Mexico
Mexico City: flags, tanks and student strike.
G. M. Bergman; S
- Olympic games successful despite ill omens;
- Rapid economic growth after revolution
- Restricted export of braceros, seasonal farm workers, to U.S. southwest
- Meyer, Sylvan
Southern election results analyzed; S
- Michigan
New politics for Democrats; "walk-in" of McCarthy followers. D. Crase; S
- Sued by Detroit for unequal state school aid. T. P. Wilbur; S
- Washnetow Co. (Ann Arbor) welfare mothers win supplemental clothing fund.
N. C. Mills; S
- Middle East. U.N. peacekeeping efforts. A.
Tuckerman; S
- U.S.-Soviet moves for solution to regional problems
- Midsommer night's dream, a (Stratford, Ont. production). Reviewed by R. Hatch; D
- Midwest, U.S.; election results analyzed.
G. I. Maeroff; S
- Mikva, Abner J.
The shame of Chicago; police provocations during Democratic convention; E
- Miles, Josephine
You will; P
- Miller, J. J.
Proposed suit by ACLU against Chicago for police riot; statements and photos wanted;
- Miller, Margaret
Growing "private" sector in Soviet economy, with plants based on profit and material incentives; S
- Mills, C. Wright; on new sources of radicalism
- Pioneering analysis of weaknesses in western industrial societies
- Mills, Nicolas C.
The mothers said no: welfare mothers of Washnetow Co., Mich., win supplemental clothing funds; S
- Mills, Representative Wilbur D.; on "backdoor" spending for ghetto housing through tax credits to private enterprise
- Minkoff, Jack
J. Mucha condescending toward Czech workers; C
- MIRV. See Armament — Missiles
- Mishan, E. J.
Abyss of progress; evil side effects of economic growth; S
- Missiles. See Armament — Missiles
- Mississippi; rival delegations to appear at Democratic convention. C. Wilkie; S
- Mitchell, Charlene; Negro presidential candidate, Communist party
- Mitterrand, François; leftist French politicians' setbacks in post-riots election
- Molière, Play The misanthrope (APA production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D
- Monday, November 25, 1963. C. Stolfy; P
- Money; Europe defies U.S. dollar in international currency struggle. M. Tanzer; S
- Jungle of international currency system. M.
Tanzer; E
- Struggle to stabilize French franc and reverse West German mark upward; E
- Mongolia. How Mongolia gets along. A. Axelbank; S
- Morris, David K. J.
Howard, C. J., discovers politics; rebel caucus at convention of American political science association; S
- Mozambique. See Portugal
- Moore, James
At 7:00 A.M., watching the cars on the bridge; P
- Flute song; P
- For a moment; P
- How to close the great distance between people; P
- I want to become thin; P
- Rain-drops; P
- Sky, the; P
- Moravia, Alberto
Lobster land: a traveler in China; S
- Morgan, Robert
Night rain; P
- Morning, Noon and Night. Reviewed by H.
Clurman; D
- Morse, Senator Wayne; tribute to long and effective service; defeated in bid for re-election; E
- Moscow. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
- Motion pictures
Soviet activities — See Hatch, R.; Clurman, H.
- Mouchette. Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP
- Mucha, Jiri
The cool Czechs; doubts amid liberalization of regime; S
- Electron in Prague; eyewitness report of Soviet invasion; S
- Muchmore, Don M.
Polls and the right to "no"; negativism
in U.S. electorate; S
- Mulloy, Joe; Appalachian volunteer harassed
by Kentucky authorities
- Murphy, Senator George; opposition to California rural legal assistance (CRLA)
- Musings. For reviews of exhibitions, see Alloway, L.
- Music; comments on J. Gabree article, Serious rock, in June 24 issue. B. F. Juil; C
- For reviews, see Hamilton, D.
- My husband's father. J. Saunders; P
- Nader, Ralph; champion of consumer
- Naness, Lillie W.
Withdrawal vote to show Democratic delegates that people must elect President; C
- Narr, Nita
Police brutality in Oakland, Cal., and Chicago; C
- Nathan, Leonard
The offering (Allahabad, India); P
- Nation, The; no presidential endorsement;
recommendations for Congress; E
- National rifle association. See Guns
- Nazarin. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP
- Negatives. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP
- Negroes
Anti-Semitism examined. H. Golden; S
- Apathy toward Humphrey
- Civil rights
Black panthers' suicidal tactics in Oakland, Cal. M. Harris; S
- Black power fallacies; E
- Blacks and students; critics of society.
T. B. Bottomore; S
- Critique of black power. T. B. Bottomore;
S
- Ebb tide of school integration. B. Sellers;
S
- Languish school integration in North Carolina. H. Golden; S
- Militants lack political program
- Moratorium on legislation demanded by G. V. Hansen, Idaho candidate for U.S. Senate. M. McCreary; S
- Spreading revolt since 1950's
- Discrimination against white workers;
Teachers' advocacy of national welfare investigation. R. A. Cloward and F. F.
Piven; S
- Discrimination against in TV and radio;
renewal of license of WLBT, biased Jackson, Miss., TV station. M. Christopher;
- Factor in "change coalition" in new U.S. politics
- Firm militance in Ocean Hill-Brownsville schools during New York City teachers' strike. N. G. Gross; S
- Five black N.C. youths given severe sentences for setting fire to Ku Klux Klan hut; E
- In rumor-filled Detroit during long newspaper strike
- How to live in amity with whites. S. Mc-Dowell; S
- Most of vote lost by Republicans 75 ft., 518, 522 1968 vote in South; encouraging; E
- Nixon must head demands
- No-choice dilemma in Chicago in presidential election. L. F. Palmer, Jr.; S
- Novel dimension of 1968 vote; E
- Political candidates in South; talent without campaign funds. R. G. Sherrill; S
- Political use of vandalism
- Fredom among New York State mental institutions' nonprofessional workers;
emancipatory strike. M. Gordon; S
- Presidential candidates ambiguous on race relations
- Regular army group's refusal to break up protest demonstrations during Chicago convention; subsequent arrest; E
- Relations with S. T. Agnew
- Representation at Democratic convention
- Role in influential underculture in U.S.
- Role in society as seen by new Left
- Roots of racism against M. Gordon; C
- Scholarships of eleven "black hired hands"
athletes canceled by U. of Texas at El Paso
- Seething against police in Watts section of Los Angeles; growing alliance with Mexican Americans. P. Kerby; S
- Status in Chicago and Delgado
- Troops' disillusionment in Vietnam; E
- Virgin Islands; near-complete integration.
E. Heckert; S
- Wretched living conditions in Beaufort,
S.C.; H. Golden; S
- Nethoy, Anthony
Salmon, the world's most harassed fish; S
- U. Sinclair opened eyes of many to social realities; C
- New Deal; mistaken pattern for much of U.S.
foreign policy. E. Kenworthy; S
- Policies inadequate for current domestic problems
- New Democratic coalition. See Democratic party

Newhouse, Richard H.; Illinois state senator urges unity of Chicago Negroes	397
New Jersey: election results analyzed. J. L. Wilson; S	518
New Left: rise in West, led by youth	169-70
New Mexico. Article by C. Knowlton. The New Mexican land war, in June 17 issue, praised. M. Horton; C	2
R. E. Tijerina, Spanish-American leader of 1967 raid on courthouse, acquitted; E	709
New York, N.Y.: nice little revolution at state university branch. W. Thompson; S	112
New party; attempts to form McCarthyite-based national protest organization. P. Booth; S	264
Newspapers. See Press, U.S.
Newton, Huey P.; black panther held for murder of Oakland, Cal., policeman	15
15 fr.; see also C, 130
Over-supply of doubt in conviction for manslaughter. W. Wood; S	300
New university conference; organization to defend radical faculty members and to transform academic institutions. R. Ross and J. Lemisch; C	130
New York City
Ineffective anti-election demonstration. K. G. Gross; S	595
Poorly planned school decentralization and teachers' strike; E	293
Proposed flat-rat welfare payments would fess the poor. R. A. Cloward and F. F. Piven; S	392
School strike and Albany politics. J. L. Wilson; S	648
Teachers' strike; objective and complete reporting impossible in Ocean Hill-Brownsville, Brooklyn. K. G. Gross; S	522
Welfare burden	558
New York film festival. Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP	379
New York Shakespeare festival. Open-air production of Hamlet reviewed by S. Bernard; D	93
New York State
Albany politics and New York City school strike. J. L. Wilson; S	648
Election results analyzed. J. L. Wilson; S	518
Need for continuation of Rockefeller governorship; E	707
Strike of nonprofessional workers at mental institutions. M. Gordon; S	650
Wage-supplement program	560
Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario. Shaw festival reviewed by J. Novick; D	221
Niura, H. L.
Conglomerates . . . the total corporation; S	434
Niemöller, Rev. Martin; quoted on consequences of not speaking up. G. Kano; C	322
Nigeria; civil war must end. S. Meisler; E	132
132; see also C, 194
Night letter. M. Friedberg; P	118
Night letter. R. Moylan; S	185
Nine rivers from Jordan. Opera reviewed by D. Hamilton; M	542
Nixon, Richard M.
Behind Nixon's grin — the old Nixon; E	130
Cabinet appointments; E	674
Candidacy supported by supposed doves such as W. Lippmann and J. V. Lindsay. By N. V. Seidita; C	514
Cultivating "no-change" coalition in new U.S. politics	274
Deals with South. H. Golden; S	147
Dick in Wall street; heavy-handed attack on SEC; E	387
Fear of among Negroes	394-5
Hurt more than Humphrey by Wallace movement	455
Inadequate stand on major issues	425
Increasing conviction rate or crime among campaign nostrums. F. Serbi; S	464
Interest in strong Democratic House leadership; E	579
Lackluster presidential aspirant in revolutionary age; E	34
Least popular choice among Republican candidates; strategy for new President; E	510
Minority president with Democratic Congress. A. Campbell; S	550
One nation — can Nixon do it? H. L. Nixon; S	614
Private-enterprise housing in ghettos through tax credits among campaign nostrums. C. Rabb; S	463
Probable use of U.N. as President	583
Refusal to discuss Vietnam and evasion of other issues; E	354
Republicans' gamble in nomination for presidency; E	98
98; see also C, 194
Setback in Southern campaign. R. G. Sherrill; S	75
Strong and bland in campaign warm-up; E	258

Victory would be analogous to Hayes sell-out of 1876, which ended Reconstruction. C. G. Hamilton; C	418
Weakness as Republican standard-bearer; E	66
Will Nixon "let" the press?; E	643
Won presidential nomination by default; comparison with Humphrey; E	226
Nkrumah, Kwame. See Ghana
North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO); shaken by West German spy scandal; E	548
North Carolina
G. C. Wallace speech in Charlotte; will draw many major-party votes. H. Golden; S	51
Negro youths in Benson given severe sentences for setting fire to Ku Klux Klan hut; E	517
R. Hawkins, Negro candidate, defeated for governor	210-11
Unearned progressive reputation; lagging in school integration. H. Golden; S	692
Wide opposition to open housing. H. Golden; S	500
Nossiter, Bernard D.; Washington Post interviews with aerospace leaders; E	676
Novick, Julius
Reviews of plays
American conservatory theatre (ACT), San Francisco	125
Camino Real (Cincinnati Playhouse in the park production)	382
Chemmy circle, the (Shaw festival production)	222
Deedle deedle dumpling, my son God	125
Dionysus in 69	29
Hamlet (American conservatory theatre production)	126
Heartbreak house (Shaw festival production)	221
In the matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer (Los Angeles production)	92
Long live life (Chekhov monologues)	125
Shaw festival, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario	221
Novd, Dale E.
Observations on C. Cohen's The case for selective pacifism; C	66
66; see also 11
Nuclear energy. See Atomic weapons
Nuclear weapons. See Atomic weapons
Nyerere, President Julius K. See Tanzania
O
Oakland, Cal. See California
O'Brien, David; significance of Supreme court's upholding of conviction of draft-card burning. P. W. Martin; S	42
Obscure vocabulary. M. Salim-ul-Rehman; P	474
Ocean Hill-Brownsville. See New York City
Offering, the (Allahabad, India). L. Nathan; P	440
Ogilvie, Richard; Republican candidate for Illinois governorship not actively opposed by Daley machine	486
Ohio; election results analyzed. G. I. Maeroff; C	521
Oil
Concessions to International petroleum company (Standard oil) as factor in Peruvian military coup. S. L. Rozman; S	432
Industry's drilling and installations spoiling southern California coast. T. Schoenman; C	226
International petroleum company plant expropriated by Peruvian junta; E	453
Shale oil; dormant bomb for U.S. oil industry. C. Welles; S	688
Shale oil as sensitive subject; C. Welles article on killed by Life; E	679
Oliver, Rev. C. Herbert; firm stand of Ocean Hill-Brownsville, Brooklyn, school governing board before and during New York City teachers' strike	522-3
Olympic games; successful at Mexico City but changes needed; E	484
O'Malley, Thomas W.
119 Negro soldiers, not 43, refused to fight in Vietnam in Chicago; C	578 also E, 421
O'Mara, Richard
Discovering Spiro Agnew; background of Republican vice-presidential nominee; S	175
Ombudsman; Swedish mediator idea at U.S. universities; E	611
Onassis, Aristotle
Plans for marriage for marrying Jacqueline Kennedy; welcomed by Greek junta; E	452
Open theatre. European tour and production of The serpent reviewed by R. Pasoli; D	157
Opera. For reviews, see Hamilton, D.
Operational and policy research; political-science group tied to CIA	179-180
Opperman, Günter; young East German minefield victim's plight not from political conviction; lesson for both Germans; E	677

Ossorio, Alfonso. Reviewed by L. Alloway; A	572
P
Page, Benjamin B.
Voices of Prague just before Soviet invasion. See S. J. S. 203; see also C, 290
Pagerin, Ken
Conservationist Sierra club loses tax-exempt status, but not National rifle association; C	148
Painting. For reviews, see Alloway, L.
Palmer, L. F., Jr.
No-choice dilemma for Chicago Negroes in 1968 presidential election. S	394
Panama; new junta fostered by U.S. military aid; E	453
Partin, Edward Grady; Justice department's request that criminal indictments against witness in J. R. Hoffa trial be quashed; payment to Mrs. Partin; E	164
Partner. Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP	379
Pasoli, Robert
Reviews of plays
Serpent, the	157
Tartuffe (Théâtre de la Cité production)	61
Three musketeers, the (Théâtre de la Cité production)	62
Passage (for Kim Merker). R. Dana; P	536
Pastan, Linda
Departures; P	374
Distances; P	374
Patterson, Eugene; resignation of prize-winning editor of Atlanta Constitution 680, 683, 684
Pawlowski, R.
The poet at seventy; P	124
Payton, George S. House challenger of L. M. Rivers' House seat defeated	210
Peace and pacifism
Case for selective pacifism, the. C. Cohen; S	66
66; see also 11
Chicago outlook for demonstrators during Democratic convention; April 27 crackdown recalled; E	131
Constructive Soviet-American relations, at U.N. and in proposed reopening of missile negotiations. A. Tuckerman; E	37
Conviction in Boston of B. Spook, W. S. Coffin, Jr., and others for anti-draft conspiracy; E	444
Danger of crackdown on pacifists by police and military	322
Defense funds needed for Privates D. Amick and K. Stoltz, distributors of antiwar leaflets on army base. G. Gidin; C	194
Disarmament mandate ignored by British government	656
Draft-card burners, the; constitutional implications of Supreme court's ruling. M. D. O'Brien case. P. W. Martin; S	42
Ireland's mass resistance to war prevented draft in World War I. By S. Graves; C	148
Movement should avoid fostering fear of violence; E	228
Pacifist crowd attack at Hilton hotel, Chicago. T. W. Pew, Jr.; E	229
Pacifists not assassins, despite A. Capp's fears. J. Hux; C	146
Peace and freedom party candidates in California	17
U.S. group's talks with North Vietnamese peace-coference delegates in Paris. M. R. Young; S	335
Vietnam summer, 1967, failed to build movement	613
Peale, Rev. Norman Vincent; sermon depicting God as Santa Claus figure; E	647
Pennsylvania; McCarthy victor in Democratic primary, but not among delegate-picking bosses. J. Higgins; S	109
Perfume; by Norell, $1000 at Bonwit Teller; E	679
Peru; military coup against President F. Belaúnde Terry; concessions to International petroleum company (Standard oil) as factor in Peruvian military coup. S. L. Rozman; S	432
New junta fostered by U.S. military aid; expropriates IPC plant; E	453
Peterson, Donald O.; leader in New Democratic coalition and E. J. McCarthy supporter	427
Peterson, Mrs. Esther; first presidential assistant on consumer affairs	583-4
Peterson, Robert
Late autumn leaves; P	374
Petulia. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	29
Pew, Thomas W., Jr.
The Hilton hotel incident; britishkrieg attack by Chicago police on pacifist crowd; E	229

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Philanthropy; as golden crowbar of the rich. G. G. Kirstein; S	235	Poland; reception of B. Brecht's plays. A. Wirth; D	117	Progress; animating belief in challenged throughout world. R. V. Sampson; S	653
Phonograph records. For reviews, see Hamilton, D.		Polanski, Roman. Film Rosemary's baby reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	60	Prohibition; movement's parallelism to Wallace wave	456
Physics. See Science		Polaris. See Armament — Missiles		Proxmire, Senator William; hearings on defense-contract costs	685-6
Pierce, William A., M.D.		Police		Points out possible $10.8-billion savings in defense budget; E	36
Greening write-in campaign needs support; C	354	Political arrest of robbed author in Atlanta. B. Kiely; S	553; see also C, 674	Public prosecutor, the G. Dzhangoray play introduced by Sir C. P. Snow; S	617
Pinter, Harold		As occupation forces in Watts section of Los Angeles. R. Kerby; S	166	Puerto Rico; new politics for; statehood candidate L. Ferré elected governor. T. Pugh; E	549
Plays. Tea party and the basement reviewed by H. Clurman; D	477	Backed by large groups afraid of violence; E	228	Renovation of economy under U.S.	587
Piven, Frances Fox. See Cloward, Richard A.		Blitzkrieg attack on pacifist crowd at Hilton hotel, Chicago. T. W. Few, Jr.; E	228	New politics for Puerto Rico; statehood candidate L. Ferré elected governor; E	549
Planchon, Robert. Productions of Tartuffe and The three musketeers reviewed by R. Pasolini; D	61	Brutality in Oakland and Chicago. N. Narr; C	258	Pugh, Travis
Plays. See Theater		Chicago patrolman's methods of spotting civil-rights R. Zimmermann; C	290	Republicans comfortable with Nixon at Miami convention; S	102
Ploss, Sidney L.		Excessive show of force during Democratic convention in Chicago. C. McWilliams; S	198; see also C, 227	U.S. planes over Saigon; operation self-destruction through bombing of South Vietnamese cities and environs; S	144
Kremlin seismograph: signs of splits in Soviet leadership and portents of change; S	494	Shame of Chicago. A. J. Mikva; E	229
Poems		Statements on and photos of misconduct in Chicago riot of August wanted for ACLU lawsuit. J. Miller; C	258
All day All night New York. S. Kaufman	69	Threatened crackdown on all leftist and peace groups; E	322
America. J. Haines	259	Wallace's call or police state. P. E. State; C	386
At 7:00 A.M., watching the cars on the bridge. J. Moore	598	Political science in U.S.; battle for integrity amid military-academic alliance. M. Surkin; S	179
Autumn kitchen. C. Berge	374	Discovers politics; rebel caucus at convention of American political science association. D. K. J. Morris; S	266
Birds on the morning of going. the W. S. Merwin	27	Politics of harmony, the "Masque" reviewed by D. Hamilton; M	542
Comfort. J. Farley	157	Polis; argument on validity revived in 1968 campaign; E	483
Crooked carol. N. Farber	609	Ganep and Harris surveys on alienated nonvoting groups; E	709
Dead sailor, the L. Turco	632	Increasing use by politicians; negativism among U.S. electorate. D. M. Muchmore; S	40
Death. P. Dow	630	Pollution; Cayuga like, N.Y., threatened by nuclear power plant; E	709
Delivered without heat. C. Stolf	374	Dire effects predicted by UNESCO. Of water and air in U.S. 138 ff.; see also C, 226	655
Departures. L. Pastan	374	Pompidou, Georges; French premier ousted by de Gaulle	73, 74
Distances. L. Pastan	374	Poems. Larry. Reviewed by L. Alloway; A	572
Elegy for the poet Morgan Blum, an. J. Wright	250	Population. See Birth control
Enemy within, the M. Cowley	598	Portugal; African empire after Salazar. By A. de Figueiredo; S	399
Flute song. J. Moore	598	Poseidon. See Armament — Missiles
For a moment. J. Moore	598	Poverty
Getting the picture. N. Price	502	Finessing the poor: New York City's proposed flat-rate welfare payments. R. A. Cloward and F. F. Piven; S	332
Good money after bad. W. Heyen	598	In eastern Kentucky; poor organization in strip coal mining. G. L. Mason; S	721
Graffiti of Paris student uprising	84, 85	Poor against themselves; (white) workers vs. (black) welfare recipients; S	558; see also C, 674 and 706
Grate society, the. G. Bowring	446	Unemployment in Spain	326
Hand, the, is quicker than the eye—or nose. W. V. Davis	410	Unemployment in Yugoslavia	50
Home town (from a Tingit myth). G. Hitchcock	57	Welfare mothers of Ann Arbor, Mich., win supplemental clothing funds. M. C. Mills; S	642
How to close the great distance between people. J. Moore	598	What we know about poverty; backward look at Johnson war on. R. J. L. Manheim; S	623
I heard the tread hunters. M. Shorb	507	Powell, Paul; Illinois secretary of state's re-election essential to Daley machine	486
I want to become thin. J. Moore	598	Power, electrical; hazardous boom in U.S. nuclear generating plants; E	677
If I were certain. F. A. Faiz	251	Powerful political tangle of throughout world. R. V. Sampson; S	653
If you will. J. Miles	251	Prague. See Czechoslovakia
Indian painting, probably Wasco, in a cave near Madras, Oregon. J. Ramsey	730	President, U.S. See United States — Presidency
Knowing. J. Gardner	53	Press, U.S.
Landlord. J. Engels	374	Crisis at Atlanta Constitution. A. Schardt; S	679
Late autumn leaves. R. Peterson	568	Detroit's year without news during long newspaper strike. J. Aumante; S	363
Monday, November 25, 1963. C. Stolf	568	Had Oakland, Cal., example of police brutality prior to Chicago. N. Narr; C	258
My husband's father. J. Saunders	87	Representatives' savage treatment by Chicago police during Democratic convention	190
Night letter. M. Friedberg	118	Restraint urged in coverage of assassins and mass murderers; E	133
Night rain. R. Morgan	185	Reticent on development of anti-personnel weapons; E	5
Obscure vocabulary. M. Salim-ur-Rehman	474	Supported pro-junta stand of Greek-language papers; E	581
Offering, the (Allahabad, India). L. Nathan	440	Will Nixon "get" the press; E	643
Passage (for Kim Merker). R. Dana	536	Will watch Nixon presidency warily	616
Poem in a time of crisis. 1951. M. Crowley	85	Pretty poison. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	37
Poet at seventy, the R. Pawlowski	124	Price, Representative Melvin; inaction of House ethics committee chairman on truckers' lobbying	205, 206
Poets in the streets (of Paris), the. Anonymous	85	Price, Nancy	502
Rain. W. Berry	185	Getting the picture; P
Rain-drop. J. Moore	598	Prophecy of abyss of evil side effects. E. J. Mishan; S	466; see also C, 610
Rainy day. R. Riemer	185
Rainy season. F. Quenneville	185
Revolution on the walls; graffiti of Paris student uprising	84, 85
Sculpture. D. Ray	727
Search, the. J. Logan	246. See also correction, 308
Secret meaning of things, the L. Ferlinghetti	251
Silent at breakfast. M. Shipley	190
Sky, the J. Moore	598
Snow. W. H. Howarth	570
Spider. D. Sherwood	604
Stanford Street poem: Albuquerque. G. Frumkin	732
Still fields (translation by T. Baland). M. Hernández	198
Timing. A. R. Ammons	685
Touch and go. E. Coleman	310
Unknown wilderness, an. D. Ray	727
Ventriloquist, the (in memory of J.P.). R. Huff	280
Well-dwellers, the (Lomas de Atzingo). B. Belitt	230
Welsh Christmas. E. Barker	474
Woman there was, a. Merraji	494
Wry music, a (seven are convicted at Meridian). R. Brown	374
Poet at seventy, the R. Pawlowski; P	124
Poetry, poems on. Special section. Sep. 16
Paths in the streets (of Paris), the. Anonymous; P	85

- Strategy backfires in South. R. G. Sherrill; S 75
- Also Elections, U.S., 1968
- Research and development
- Defense department expenditures on non-military studies investigated by Senate foreign relations committee. C. Rabb; S 46; see also C, 258
- Disaffected scientists among defense grantees; Pentagon's conciliatory attitude; E
- Pentagon crisis: the colleges are pulling out of partnership with military. G. Kolko; S 355
- Political scientists' battle for integrity amid military-academic alliance. M. Surkin; S 207
- Reuther, Walter P.; revolt of auto workers head against President G. Meany of AFL-CIO 179
- Reynolds, G. Scott
- Life insurance: the immaculate deception; S 304
- Rheingold, Das. H. von Karajan's Metropolitan opera production and recordings reviewed by D. Hamilton; M
- Rhodesia; attacks on by African "freedom fighters" 459
- Rich, the; and philanthropy. G. G. Kirstein; S 235
- Riemer, Ruby
- Rainy day; P
- Rierson, Robert and Leon
- Conservation for survival, from population control to protection of redwoods; S 138; see also C, 226
- Rimband, Arthur
- See ancestor of U.S. hippie-yippie underculture 716
- Riots; bring fear of violence in urban lower middle class and consequent oppression; E
- Chicago, April, 1968; Mayor Daley's shoot-to-kill order 100
- Could be averted by using some funds now spent by defense contractors; E
- Significance of in Negro ghettos
- Rivers, Representative L. Mendel; bars reductions in defense spending 101
- Beat off challenge of Negro primary opponent, G. A. Payton, Jr.
- Tribute to colleague C. A. Halleck upon retirement 210
- Roads; federal highway program; pork in big barrels. A. Q. Mowbray; S 205
- Trucking-industry lobby. C. Rabb; S
- Roberts, William James
- Reasons for Kennedy backers' misgivings about McCarthy; C 162; see also C, 67
- Robinson, Blake
- "War crops" of U.S. civilians; S 390
- Robinson, Donald L.
- Johnson's policy of withdrawal from presidential race gives him free hand in foreign policy; S
- Roche, John P.; hawkish intellectual-in-residence for Johnson; E
- Rockefeller, Governor Nelson A. collapse of hopes for Republican presidential nomination at Miami convention 102-3
- Should stay in present job to see programs through; E
- Rockefeller, Governor Winthrop; political success in Arkansas 707
- Rockwell, Norman. Reviewed by L. Alloway; A 572
- Rogers, John C.
- Southerner shocked by treatment of B. Kiely in Atlanta jail; C 674; see also 553
- Rokes, Willis Park
- Nixon vs. the consumer; S 583
- Rollins, William B.
- Aspen, Colo., conference on design reviewed; A
- The north slope circus; skiing as new big business; S 591
- Romeo and Juliet. F. Zeffirelli film reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 444
- Romney, Governor George; support of Nixon in Michigan; slated for post in new administration 520-1
- Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel. See Cohn, R.
- Ross, Charles R.; Federal power commissioner on need for cooperative conservationist efforts 141
- Ross, George (ed.)
- Revolution on the walls; graffiti of Paris student uprising; P 84
- Ross, Robert, and Jesse Lemish
- New university conference, organization to defend radical faculty members and to transform institutions; C 130
- Rozman, Stephen L.
- Pert: oil and the army; favors to U.S.-owned International petroleum company (Standard oil) as factor in military coup; S 432
- Ruppenthal, Karl M.
- No money for safe landings at U.S. airports; S 142
- Rusk, Dean; on "underdeveloped" boyhood environment 586
- Words inconsistent with deeds on relations with Soviet Union; E 678
- See also United States - State department
- S
- Sackler, Howard. Play The great white hope reviewed by H. Clurman; D 446
- Sakharov, Andrei D.; Soviet academician's essay on intellectual freedom 163
- Salan, Raul; dismissed exiled French general permitted to return home 74
- Salazar, Antonio de Oliveira. See Portugal
- Salm-ur-Khuma, M.
- Obscure vocabulary; P 474
- Salmon; world's most harassed fish. A. Net-boy; S 240
- Sampson, Ronald V.
- Bramble of power through world; challenge to progress, democracy, and socialism; S 653
- San Francisco. American conservatory theatre (ACT) reviewed by J. Novick; D 125
- Innovative Newsroom program of WQED-TV 422
- San Monica Mountains. See Los Angeles
- Sarne, Michael. Film Joanna reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 666
- Sartre, Jean-Paul
- Crisis and peace in democratic world; French and Czechoslovak events; S 297
- Saunders, Josephine
- My husband's father; P 87
- Scammon, Richard M.; pinpoints middle-class, middle-aged white voter as crucial factor in election; S 259
- Scariano, Anthony; Illinois legislator on crime in Chicago under Daley 329
- Schardt, Arlie
- Private life in suspense: crisis of Constitution, leading newspaper; S 679
- Schmitz, John G.; California state senator against welfare state except for himself; S 134
- Schneider, Edward
- The scar of G. C. Wallace on U.S. politics; S 454
- Schoenman, Theodore
- Oil companies' spoiling of southern California coast; C 226
- Schools. See Education
- Schwartz, Charles; physicist's struggle to have antiwar letter printed in Physics Today 294; see also C, 386
- Schwengel, Representative Fred; investigation of truckers' lobby. C. Rabb; S 205
- Science
- Backlash of technology in Great Britain: pressure for redistribution of political power. A. W. Benn; S 136
- Jugernaut must be stopped to save humanity; 468; see also C, 610
- Pentagon conciliatory toward disaffected defense-research grantees; E 355
- Pulling out from ties with Pentagon and CIA; G. S. S. 207
- Signs of social awareness in pure and applied fields, from physics to engineering; S 294; see also C, 386
- Sculpture. D. Ray; P 727
- Seagull, the (Stratford, Ontario, festival production). Reviewed by R. Hatch; D 190
- Seale, Bobby; seconds in command at Oakland, Cal. Black Panthers 16, 17; see also C, 130
- Search, the. J. Logan; P 246. See also 308
- Secret meaning of things, the. L. Ferlinghetti; P 251
- Security; illusion of for political leaders; E 580
- Obsession with promotes domestic arms race; E 580
- Seeger, Peter; stanza of song censored in TV appearance 564
- Serdin, Nicholas V.
- Disillusioning actions of hawk-supporting doves such as E. M. Kennedy, W. Lippmann, and J. V. Lindbergh; C 514
- Selective service system. See United States - Defense, national
- Sellers, Barney
- Ebb tide of social integration; S 626
- Sentinel. See Armament - Missiles
- Serbi, Frank
- Conviction hoax; increasing convictions no panacea for crime, despite Nixon claim 464
- Serpent, the. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 157
- Sex, thrust of hippie-yippie underculture on mores 716
- Shale oil. See Oil
- Shapiro, Sam; Illinois governor not actively supported by Daley machine 486-7
- Sharp, Gene and George Lake
- Students invited to write papers in field of nonviolent political action; C 322
- Shaw, George Bernard. Play Heartbreak house (Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, Shaw festival production) reviewed by J. Novick; S 221
- Shaw, Robert. Play The man in the glass both reviewed by H. Clurman; D 411
- Sherrill, Robert G.
- C. McMay, vice-presidential candidate on C. Wallace ticket as normal American killer; S 422
- Dixie's Negro candidates; talent without campaign funds; S 684
- Pentagon loot: more disclosures; S 684
- Republican strategy backfires in South; S 75
- Sherwood, Dora
- Spider; S 604
- Shipley, Margaret
- Silent at breakfast; P 190
- Shoben, Edward Joseph, Jr.
- Volstead, exhumed; proposed "dangerous drugs" legislation against LSD, pep pills, etc.; S 306
- Shorb, Mervyn
- I heard the tread hunters; P 507
- Shoup, General David; conciliatory views on Vietnam contrasted with those of former colleague C. McMay; E 133
- Shtemenko, General Sergei M.; pro-Stalin memoirs reviewed favorably in newspaper Soviet Russia 496-7
- Sierra club; conservationist group lost taxpayer status, but not National rifle association. K. Pagerin; C 148
- Silent at breakfast. M. Shipley; P 190
- Sinclair, Upton; tribute to writer-reformer; E 613; see also C, 674 and 706
- Sirhan, Sirhan B. See Kennedy, Robert F.
- Skinning; the north slope circus; new big business. W. B. Rollins; S 591
- Sky, the. J. Moore; P 598
- Silver, Richard E.; report on private-enterprise ghettoizing slated to be facilitated by tax credits 463
- Smebakken, Ted
- Democrat for '72; organization of New Democratic coalition (NDC) to restructure party; S 427
- Smith, Desmond
- Heart-transplant market: someone playing God; S 719
- Russia after 50: "Moscow is so dull"; literary and artistic scene; S 487; see also C, 610
- Smith, Martin
- No ordinary black man; murder trial of C. Watkins in Stockton, Cal.; S 429
- Smothers, Tom and Dick, and TV censors. P. Kerby; S 563
- Snow, W. H. Howarth; P 570
- Snow, W. H. and P. Kerby
- Liberal communism: the basic dogma, the scope for freedom, the danger in optimism; S 612
- War on overpopulation; E 355
- Socialism; animating belief in challenged. R. V. Sampson; S 653
- French party discredited 307
- Socialist scholars' conference at Rutgers U. By M. E. Gettleman; S 718
- Solomon, Arthur N.
- Case for rupee of Biafra by Nigeria; C 194; see also E, 132
- South, U.S.
- Election results analyzed. S. Meyer; S 519
- Emerging "new politics" 200
- Home of biggest beneficiaries of farm subsidies; E 291
- Negro candidates; talent without campaign funds. R. G. Sherrill; S 209
- New game in Dixie; Negroes' participation in politics. V. E. Jordan, Jr.; S 397
- 1968 Negro vote encouraging; E 547
- Republican strategy backfires. R. G. Sherrill; S 75
- Solid in Nixon nomination 226, 227
- Will vote for Nixon and Wallace despite Democratic largesse. H. Golden; S 147
- South Africa, Republic of; alliance with Portugal 400
- Prosecution of anti-apartheid editor L. Gandar; E 581
- South Carolina. Dr. D. Gatch driven out of state for testimony on Negroes' living conditions. H. Golden; S 564
- Recipient of federal largesse. H. Golden; S 147
- Representative L. M. Rivers 210
- Negro, G. A. Payton, Jr. 147
- Spain
- Fascism for the future: the Falange revised. G. Jackson; S 326

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Franco's price for renewal of five-year military-base agreement; E.....	293; see also C, 546	Innovative Newsroom program of KQED, San Francisco; E.....	422	U.N.: keeping the powder dry; Middle East mediation efforts and social-technical activity; S.....	582
Nation's charges of blackmail tactics on U.S. bases vindicated; E.....	645; see also C, 546	Networks' hurdles for advertising for gun-control legislation; M. Christopher; S.....	113	Turco, Lewis.....	632
New hard bargaining by U.S. on base-renewal payments; E.....	356	Restraint urged in coverage of assassins and mass murderers; E.....	135	Two memories of the Joe McCarthy era. Poem in a time of crisis: 1951; Enemy within, the. 1952. M. Cowley; P.....	85
Old man Franco bluffs in raising price for renewal of leases for U.S. military bases; E.....	100	Showed brutality of Chicago police during Democratic convention.....	198-9	U.....
Spider, D. Sherwood; P.....	604	Smother brothers program and industry censors. P. Kerby; S.....	563	Udall, Secretary Stewart L. See United States — Interior department
Spies. See Espionage		Texas; Republican strength.....	75 ff.	Undertakers. See Funerals
Spock, Dr. Benjamin; anti-draft conspiracy indictment in Boston; E.....	4	Thant, Secretary-general U. See United Nations		Unemployment. See Poverty
Sports; scholars' eleven "black hired hands" athletes clobbered by U. of Texas at El Paso; E.....	68	Theatre		Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Stalin, Joseph V.; conflicts on historical role among Soviet leaders.....	495, 496-7, 711-3	Brecht vs. Brecht: reception of his plays in Poland; A. Wirth; D.....	117	Agreement in name only with Dubcek-Svoboda regime in Czechoslovakia; E.....	195
Stalinism; essential dogmas and practice.....	618 ff.; 713	Reviews of plays		And the United States.....	261
Forced industrialization of Soviet economy.....	732	American conservatory theatre (ACT), San Francisco.....	125	Missile race now in ostentation stage; E.....	261
Stanford Street poem; Albuquerque G. Frumkin; P.....	732	Basement.....	477	Missile talks imperiled by Black Sea mission of U.S. destroyers; E.....	678
State, Paul E.....		Cannibals.....	603	Must cooperate to halt increase in world population.....	612
Wallace's call for police state fails to evoke protest from other candidates; C.....	386	Center theatre group, Los Angeles.....	92	Nuclear nonproliferation treaty obstructed by U.S. Senate; E.....	324
States, U.S.; consumer-protection legislation.....	585	Cry of players, a.....	604	Soviet-American sobriety seen in recent actions; E.....	37
Indignation over attempts to curtail federal highway spending.....	529 ff.	Decide decile dumping, my son God.....	29	Washington's odd logistics of low personnel quota for Moscow embassy and consulate, W. E. Chilton III; S.....	593
Stephenson, Robert C.....		Dionysus in 69.....	510	Brutal and stupid aggression against Czechoslovakia; E.....	162
Delicate Nixon-Humphrey balance, with Nixon not preferred; S.....	290	DMZ, New York political café.....	446	Czech intervention opposed by French and Italian Communist parties.....	74, 162, 232
Stevens, Richard.....		Drankenstein (living theater production) called white hope, the.....	510	Czech invasion condemned 8-1 by secretariat of Communist-controlled world federation.....	188
Preserving disorder in Chicago, courtesy of Mayor Daley; E.....	292	Hamlet (American conservatory theatre production).....	126	Czech invasion defended by F. Castro; E.....	292
Still fields (translated by T. Baland). M. Herlander; P.....	185	Head of New York Shakespeare festival's open-air production.....	93	Growing "private" sector in economy, with plants based on profit and material incentives. M. Miller; S.....	262
Stock market; and conglomerates.....	435 ff.	Huui, huui.....	665	Ideological argument with Czechoslovak liberalizers. V. Blackwell; S.....	145
Dick in Wall Street; Nixon's heavy-handed attack on SEC; E.....	387	King Lear (Lincoln center production of music) productions.....	573	Kremlin seismograph; signs of splits in leadership and portents of change. S. L. Floss; S.....	494
Stokes, Louis; new Negro congressman from Ohio.....	522	Lovers and other strangers.....	445	Link with Bulgaria.....	617 ff.
Stout, Carolyn.....		Man in the glass booth, the.....	411	Nation at slack tide, awaiting new currents; E.....	482
Delivered without heat; P.....	292	Misanthropy, the (APA production).....	510	Plain talk with vodka; exchanges of views with Soviet journalists. W. E. Chilton III; S.....	192 ff.
Monday, November 25, 1963; P.....	568	Morning, Noon and Night.....	165	Relations with Mongolia.....	477
Stolte, Ken. See Gitlin, T.		Serpent, the.....	557	Russia after 50 years of Communism: "Moscow is so dull"; literary and artistic scene. D. Smith; S.....	487; see also C, 610
Stratford, Ontario; Shakespeare festival reviewed by R. Hatch; D.....	189	Shaw's festival, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario (Heartbreak house and Chemmy circle, the).....	222	Schweik and the Russian bear: Czechoslovakia during August invasion. P. D. Hazard; S.....	201
Strikes. See Labor — Union		Stratford, Ontario, festival (Midsummer night's dream, Tartuffe, The seagull, The three musketeers).....	189	Stalin period recalled.....	618-9
Students. See Education		Sweet Eros.....	665	Vulnerable, staggering colossus. N. Birnbaum; S.....	167
Subsidies; of wages to poor compared with subventions to other groups.....	560	Tartuffe (Théâtre de la Cité production).....	61	Watcher in Prague; eyewitness account of Czech invasion. J. Mucha; S.....	360
Suburbs, U.S. See Cities, U.S.		Tea party.....	477	What Moscow fears; liberalization as real reason for invasion of Czechoslovakia. A. Werth; S.....	230; see also C, 290
Surkin, Marvin.....		We bombed in New Haven.....	467	United Arab Republic; wary exchange of memoranda with Israel via U.N.....	582
Political science: the battle for integrity amid military-academic alliance; S.....	169	Witness.....	477	United Nations; Secretary-general Thant's proposed resolution for U.S. cessation of bombing of North Vietnam.....	94
Sweet Eros. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D.....	675	Zorba.....	504	Sober and constructive U.S.-Soviet relations. A. Tuckerman; E.....	37
Swishelm, Emmet.....		Thiebaud, Wayne. Reviewed by L. Alloway; S.....	672	U.N.: keeping the powder dry; Middle East mediation efforts and social-technical activity. A. Tuckerman; S.....	582
Nixon corrupt; C.....	194; see also E, 98	Thien, Nguyen Van: South Vietnam president's peace conditions parallel those of Wallace and LeMay; E.....	451	United States
T.....		Stalling on Paris peace talks.....	546	Agency for international development (AID). See Foreign aid
Tabori, George. Play The cannibals reviewed by H. Clurman; D.....	603	Thompson, Robert G.; belated burial in Arlington national cemetery of Communist war veteran; E.....	709	Atomic energy commission
Talmadge, Senator Herman; opposed in Georgia Democratic primary by Negro, M. Jack. E.....	209-10	Thompson, Wade.....		Complaisant attitude on defects in nuclear power plants.....	677
Tanzania; leadership of President J. K. Nyerere in inter-African affairs.....	458, 459	A nice little revolution: students of state university of New York at New Paltz.....	112	Central intelligence agency
Tanzer, Michael.....		Three musketeers, the (Stratford, Ontario, festival production). Reviewed by R. Hatch; S.....	101	Behind 1954 Guatemala coup.....	589-90
Arms of gold; Europe defies the dollar in great-power monetary struggle; S.....	268	Thurmond, Senator J. Strom: 1948 Dixiecrat campaign contrasted to Wallace third-party movement of 1968.....	325	Funds to International association for cultural freedom and Institute of strategic studies; E.....	676
Money jungle; chaotic international currency system;.....	573	Nixon.....		Ties with American political science association and similar academic groups. M. Surkin; S.....	179
Tapies, Antoni. Reviewed by L. Alloway; A.....	573	Role in Nixon nomination.....	226	Universities loosening ties with G. Kolko; S.....	207
Tartuffe (Stratford, Ontario, production). Reviewed by R. Hatch; D.....	190	Tijerina, Reyes Lopez: leader of Spanish-American land war in New Mexico acquitted on 1967 raid charges; E.....	698	Congress.....
Tartuffe (Théâtre de la Cité production). Reviewed by R. Fassoli; D.....	61	Timing, A. R. Ammons; P.....	709	Candidates endorsed by The Nation.....	420
Tarver, Jack; business-oriented Atlanta newspaper executive.....	680 ff.	Tito, Marshal. See Yugoslavia		Certain members influential in location and disposal of military industrial plants; E.....	386
Taxes. See United States — Economic		Tobacco; cigarette advertising on TV may be banned, thanks to lawyer J. F. Bantzh III; E.....	644	Congential passage of "auster" defense budget in House; E.....	290
Taylor, Maxwell D.; report on 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion still withheld from public.....	485	Tonkin Gulf resolution, 1964; advance plan for Vietnam escalation.....	614	Gratifying re-election of prominent liberals; E.....	515
Tea party. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D.....	477	Tonch and go. E. Coleman; P.....	310
Teachers. See Education		Tourism. See Travel
Teamsters union. See Labor — Union		Tower, Senator John G.; milestone for Nixon as chairman of "key issues" committee.....	75, 226
Technology. See Science		Trade, link with Europe's defiance of dollar 268 ff. S.....	326
Television		Spain; Spain's overdependence on tourism.....	326
Cigarette advertising may be banned; E.....	644	Trucking industry; lobbying on Capitol hill.....	205
Cultural effects.....	655	C. Rabb; S.....
Daily's hour; documentary What trees do they plant, on Chicago riots during Democratic convention. C. Horman; T.....	348	Trudeau, Prime minister Pierre. See Canada
Discrimination against Negroes; renewal of Armistice of biased WLBET in Jackson, Miss. By M. Christopher; T.....	93	Truffaut, François. Film The bride wore black reviewed by R. Hatch; MP.....	61
Distorted coverage of New York City teachers' strike.....	522 ff.	Truman, Harry S.; of 1948 contrasted with H. H. Humphrey of 1968; E.....	324
East and West German programs compared. L. Colitt; T.....	508	Tuckerman, Anne.....
Efforts to fill news gap in paperless Detroit.....	364	Soviet-American sobriety in relations, as at U.N. and in proposed reopening of missile negotiations; E.....	37

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Ignored scientists' advice in voting for deployment of Sentinel missile against China; E 6	Federal aviation administration	State department	False view of third world, specifically Latin America; E. Kenworthy; S 586
Importance of electing outstanding liberals; E 226	Funds for airport expansion and safety cut by Vietnam expenditures 143	New tough stand on base-renewal payments to Spain; E 356	Undermanned in Moscow. W. E. Chilton III; S 583
Legislation favorable to trucking industry. C. Rabb; S 205	Federal communications commission	Supreme court	A. Fortas and H. Thornberry nominations return-stamped by American bar association; E 101
Members could protect own lives by voting for gun-control legislation. M. C. Humphrey; C 20	Controversial license renewal for WLB.T. and Micro Jackal TV station. M. Christopher; T 93	Constitutional implications in upholding conviction of D. O'Brien for draft-card burning; E. W. Martin 42	Contrast decisions under Warren as symptoms of change, not cause 616
Probable changes in Democratic House leadership; E 679	Federal trade commission	Contradictory decisions under Warren as symptoms of change, not cause 616	Dr. Fortas appointment; E 3
Rural school highway program 530 ft	Inadequate control of conglomerate mergers 435-6	1954 school-desegregation decision in danger of nullification 627	Tennessee Valley authority
Senate foreign relations committee's investigation of defense department's expenditures on nonmilitary research projects. C. Rabb; S 46; see also C. 258	Foreign area research coordination group	Market for coal from Kentucky strip mines 721	Transportation department
Senate's obstruction of nuclear nonproliferation treaty; E 324	Universities' rupture with 207, 209	Limited powers 143	Long unable to cut federal highway allocations 531-2
Should fund shadow presidency of opposition party; E 547	Foreign policy	Treasury department	Internal revenue service revoked tax-exempt status of Sierra club but not of National rifle association. K. Paggerman; C 42
Significance of 1968 election results. A. Campbell; S 550	America abroad: our image of poor nations' problems based on misapprehensions. E. Kenworthy; S 586	Unknown wilderness. A. D. Ray; P 727	Unruh, Jesse; California assembly speaker on weakness of labor endorsement 356
Strong opposition to effective gun control. M. Christopher; S 115	Free hand for President Johnson by withdrawing from 1968 race. D. L. Robinson; S 18	Urzaiz, Jaime de	Information counselor's "clarification" of Spanish demands for renewal of military base agreement 546, with editors' reply; see also E. 293 and 645
Unwillingness to set maximum of subsidies for individual farmers; E 291	Forests	Vandalism; as political tactic more often purposeful than wanton. S. Cohen; S 497	van Itallie, Jean-Claude; See Chaikin, Joseph 427
Wily old House committee chairmen as bar to progress. J. E. Crow; E 706	With Communist China; tenuous form via Warsaw talks to be resumed; E 642; see also 68	With Greece; constitutional referendum to impress U.S.; E 398	Vietnam
Constitution	With Cuba; terrorist bombings and plane hijacking as factors for restoration; E 197	With Greece; military aid restored; obscure roles of A. and J. Onassis; E 452	All forces as victims of war; low morale and among South Vietnamese soldiers and U.S. marines 325
First amendment and Supreme court's upholding of conviction of D. O'Brien for burning draft card. P. W. Martin; S 42	With Guatemala; as cause of terrorism. G. A. Geyer; S 8	With Panama and Peru; new juntas fostered by U.S. military aid; E 453	Atlanta lady's thoughts on U.S. propaganda booklet "Aggression from the North"; E 134; see also C. 194
Defense, national	With Japan; parallel with that of Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia. A. Glicksman; C 546	With Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and The United States	Bombing halt welcome; tragedy implicit in war from beginning; E 482
Alliance with universities; political scientists' struggle for integrity. M. Surkin; S 179	With Spain; France's bluff in raising price for renewal of military-base leases; E 100	With Spain; new hard bargaining over base-renewal payments; E 356	C. E. LeMay on war; see also E. 422 ft
Army's expanding role in enforcing domestic "law and order"; E 452	With Spain; Spanish blackmail on bases. E. 293 and 645; see also C. 546	General accounting office	End of war not to bring great reduction in U.S. military aid pending; E 100
Competition among services and suppliers; costly R. X. plan proposed; E 196	Lagging study on uniform accounting for defense contracts 684	Health, education and welfare department	Evidence of opposition to war at Democratic convention 199
Congential passage of "austere" $72.2-billion budget in House; E 290	May lose enforcement of school integration to Justice department 357	Internal department	Failure of electronic detection devices as probable cause of shelling of allied warships; E 4
Draft attacked by W. Allen Wallis of Rochester 1; E 612; see also Wallis letter, C. 706	Interrate commerce commission	Proposed shale-oil leases. C. Welles; S 688	Free hand for President Johnson by withdrawing from 1968 race in U.S. By D. L. Robinson; S 18
Draft-card burners, the; constitutional implications of Supreme court's ruling in D. O'Brien case. P. W. Martin; S 42	Interrate commerce commission	Report detailing slight losses in passenger service disrupted by railroads; E 549	Growing vocal opposition to war among pure and applied scientists; E 294; see also C. 386
Implications of department's proposed mobilization against social ills; E 357	Interrate commerce commission	Improper payments to witnesses against J. R. Hoffa; E 164	Impact of war expenditures on U.S. aviation, postal services, and other agencies 143-4
Medicine as vehicle for peace; with Geneva convention in eclipse. L. J. Rafter; S 211	Inadequate supervision over formation of conglomerate firms 435-6	Not equipped to enforce compliance with school integration 627-8	Issue of U.S. electorate by E. J. J. McCarthy; E 194
Military aid to Latin America fosters new junta crop, as in Peru and Panama; E 453	Overruled on denial of burial of Communist veteran R. Thompson in Arlington national cemetery 709	Overruled on denial of burial of Communist veteran R. Thompson in Arlington national cemetery 709	Johnson betrayed U.S. electorate by escalation of war; E 418
Military "software"; lavish expenditures on nonmilitary research projects investigated by Senate foreign relations committee. C. Rabb; S 46; see also C. 258	Report detailing slight losses in passenger service disrupted by railroads; E 549	Justice department	Medicine as weapon, with Geneva convention in eclipse. L. J. Rafter; S 211
Military supermarket; strategic placement and disposal of sites and plants; E 386	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission	Millions of American boys worried over moment of truth; South's stalling of Paris peace talks; E 546
Missile tests at Cape Kennedy; E 196	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission	No real discussion by 1968 presidential candidates 354
Negro troops' disillusionment in Vietnam; S 357	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission	North Vietnamese peace-talk delegates in Paris interviewed by five U.S. intellectuals. M. R. Fourn; S 335
Pentagon conciliatory on disaffected scientists; E 355	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission	Peace talks as positive factor in U.S.-Soviet relations 38
Pentagon crisis: colleges pulled out of research partnership with military. G. Kolko; S 207	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission	Phoenix; intelligence/extermination program against Vietnam leadership; E 261
Pentagon loot: more disclosures. R. G. Sheiell; S 684	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission	Protests against war by students of state university of New York at New Paltz 112-3
Possible budget savings of $10.8 billion pointed out by Senator Proxmire; E 37	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission	Secretary-general of U.N. proposed U.N. resolution for cessation of bombing of North; E 323
Reluctance on development of anti-personnel weapons 5	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Selective pacifism vs. selective service's requirement that conscientious objection must apply to all wars. C. Cohen; S 11; see also C. 66	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Temporary cessation of recruiting at state university of New York at New Paltz 113-4	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Threatened military crackdown on radical and peace groups; E 322	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Undiscussed issue of averting racial tension and improving American life by increasing military expenditures; E 100	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Vietnam enlistments extended despite statement in article by S. Goodman in June 3 issue. G. J. Boggio; C 2	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Weapons supply, not contributions to solution of social ills, as industry's chief concern; E 676	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Economics	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Balance-of-payment deficits; Europe defies Jolliffe. M. Tanser; S 268	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Inflation and trend toward monopoly 237	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Tax benefits as lure to philanthropy 237	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Tax surcharge ineffective against inflation; E 389	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Executive branch	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission
Nixon cabinet appointments 679	Interrate commerce commission	Interrate commerce commission

- Soviet journalists on war 493, 494
 Stumbling block to U.S.-Chinese negotiations 687-8
 Unreasonable peace conditions set by Wallace, LeMay, and President N. V. Thieu; 451
 U.S. enlistments extended, despite S. Goodman's statement in June 3 issue. G. J.
 Boggio; C 2
 U.S. planes over Saigon; operation self-destruction through bombing of cities and environs. K. H. Purnell; S 144
 U.S. press and government reticent on anti-personnel weapons, such as Rockeye cluster bomb; E 5
 U.S. Negro troops' disillusionment; E 357
 U.S. presidential candidates on war issue 425
 Views of Generals C. LeMay and D.
 Shoup; E 133
 Vietnam summer, 1967, failed to build peace movement 647
 "War corps" of U.S. civilians. B. Robinson; S 390
 War costs for U.S. consistently underestimated 290
 War drying up funds for U.S. education and research 208
 War supported by Mayor Daley of Chicago 329-30
 Violence; fear of brings support to Mayor
 Daley and incipient fascism; E 220 Virgin Islands, U.S.; near-complete racial integration. E. Heckert; S 366
 Vlachos, Helen; suspension of exiled Greek publisher's Hellenic Review in England 581 Voting; minimum age should be 18. E. Gabrielson; C 642
 Voznesensky, Andrei; evening with Soviet poet; views on Mayakovsky 489-90;
 see also C, 610
 Vy, Nguyen Minh; North Vietnamese Paris-talk delegate on peace terms 335-6
- W
 Wagner, Richard. See Hamilton, D.
 Wall Street. See Stock market
 Wallace, George C.
 Appeal of 425-6
 Call for police state fails to evoke protest from other candidates. P. E. State; C 386
 Disturbing hold on white unionists; E 165; E, 324; E, 356; 393
 Dangers of electoral-college strategy; E 66
 Drew more votes from Nixon than from Humphrey 615
 Expected to increase Humphrey vote of Southern Negroes 398
 Impressions of, at rally; appeals to insignificance. W. Berry; S 457
 Negro vote for urged by C. Lockridge, leader of black consortium 394
 On Vietnam and law and order 354
 Presidential-campaign speech in Charlotte, N.C., against federal bigness and interference. H. Goldin; S 51
 Rebellion in the shops: why labor unionists like Wallace. By B. J. Widick; S 518;
 see also C, 514 and 578
 Relations with running mate C. E. LeMay 423-4
 Repudiated by Nixon under pressure 75
 Scar on U.S. politics. E. Schneider; S 454
 Significance of large vote 550
 Strength in Idaho 233
 True to form in campaign warm-up; E 259
 Used as bogeyman for Negroes by Democrats 92
 Vietnam peace condition parallel President
 N. V. Thieu's; E 451
 Vote for in great centers 518
 Vote for in South 520, 548
 Won votes on stand against school integration 626-7
 Wallis, W. Allen; Rochester U. president's attack on draft; E 612; see also Wallis letter; C, 706
 Walton, Richard J.
 Candidates and bosses in Democratic party,
 as in Connecticut; under-representation of E. McCarthy forces brings third-party threat; E 2
 Warren, Chief Justice Earl. See United States
 Supreme court
 Warrendale. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 318
 Water pollution. See Pollution
 Watkins, Cliff; middle-class Negro defendant in Stockton, Cal., murder trial. M. Smith;
 S 419
 We bombed in New Haven. Reviewed by R.
 Hatch; D 477
 Webb, John F.
 Former Democratic committeeman won't vote for Humphrey 162
 Weekend. Reviewed by H. Clurman; MP 379
 Weisgal, Hugo. Opera Nines rivers from Jordan reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 542
- Welfare. See Poverty
 Well-dwellers, the (Lomas de Atzingo). B.
 Beland; S 250
 Welles, Chris
 Shale oil: dormant bomb for U.S. oil industry; S 688
 Shale-oil article killed by Life; E 679
 Welsh Christmas. E. Barker; P 694
 Werth, Alexander
 The backwash of Prague; French Communist party's polycentrism; power struggle within Soviet Union; S 710
 Cleverness of de Gaulle in playing on people's fears following French May riots; S 7
 Electoral victory for de Gaulle in riot-weary
 France; S 73
 TV interview mentioned in June 24 article, Students, workers and the general, was with de Gaulle, not F. Mitterrand; C 2
 What Moscow fears; liberalization as real reason for invasion of Czechoslovakia;
 S 230; see also C, 290
 West Virginia; preventable Mannington coalmine tragedy; E 611
 White hand; rightist Guatemalan terrorist group 8 ff.
 Whitehead, Ralph, Jr.
 What Daley needs, Daley gets; key Chicago and Illinois jobs for political machine 486
 Widick, B. J.
 Rebellion in the shops: why labor unionists
 like Wallace; S 358; see also C, 514 and 578
 Widmer, Kingsley
 Thrust of the hippie-yippie underculture on U.S. society; S 717
 Wiesner, Jerome B.; advice against deployment of Sentinel missile ignored by Congress; E 6
 Wilbur, Thomas P.
 Inequality in funding of ghetto and suburban schools; Detroit and Chicago suits against respective states; S 691
 Wilkie, Curtis
 Who speaks for Mississippi?; rival delegations to appear at Democratic convention; 135
 Williams, Governor John Bell; leader of segregationist "regular" Democratic Mississippi delegation to Chicago convention 135 Williams, Tennessee. Play Camino Real (Cincinnati Playhouse in the park production) reviewed by J. Novick; D 382
 Wilson, Jerome
 Election results analyzed in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut; S 518
 New York City school strike and Albany politics; S 648
 Wirth, Andrej
 Brecht vs. Brecht: reception of his plays in Poland; D 117
 Witten, Edward
 Rhetoric of ambivalence in U.S. new Left; 646
 WLBT. See Television
 Woman there was, a. Meeraji 479
 Wood, Wilbur
 Oversupply of doubt in H. P. Newton's conviction for manslaughter; S 300
 World union of trade unions. See Labor
 Union
 Wright, John
 An elegy for the poet Morgan Blum; P 250
 Writers and writing; controversies at Moscow conference 1967; 714
 Why P. music, a (seven are convicted at Meridian). R. Brown; P 371 Wuorinen, Charles. "Masque" The politics of harmony reviewed by D. Hamilton; M 542
- Y
 Yellow submarine. Reviewed by R. Hatch;
 MP 638
 Young, Marilyn R.
 Talks by five U.S. intellectuals with North Vietnamese peace-talk delegation in Paris;
 S 335
 Youngstown, Ohio; schools closed for lack of money. G. I. Macroff; S 713
 Youth
 Aided by poverty programs 624
 New activism; role in McCarthy movement 275-6
 Should be allowed to vote at 18. E. Gabrielson; C 716
 Thrust of hippie-yippie underculture on U.S. society. K. Widmer; S 612
 Unionists' antagonism toward young radical Vanguard of new Left 169 ff.
 Yugoslavia; private enterprise under guise of tourism 264
- Stalin's policy toward 713
 Tito digs the students; regime's constructive response to Belgrade U. demonstrations.
 C. McWilliams; S 48
- Z
 Zambia; economic ties with Tanzania; guerrilla fighters against Rhodesia 460-1
 Zimmerman, R.
 Chicago patrolman's methods for spotting
 civil-rights; C 290
 Zeffirelli, Franco. Film Romeo and Juliet reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 444
 Zorba. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 604

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
 R Reviewer
 C Correspondence

A

- Above the law: the rise and fall of Senator
 Thomas J. Dodd. By J. Boyd; B 278
 Academic revolution, the. C. Jencks and D.
 Riesman; B 120
 Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. By Mark Twain. Article Huckleberry Finn enriched, on available editions, by G. Mayberry 154
 After experience. W. D. Snodgrass; B 252
 Aged, the. Where they go to die: the tragedy of America's aged. R. M. Garvin and R. E.
 Burger; B 537
 Aldous Huxley. By J. Atkins; B 376
 All the little animals. W. Hamilton; B 346
 Alloway, Lawrence; R (art books) 661, 700
 American challenge, the. J.-J. Servan-
 Schreiber; B 726
 American history. Towards a new past: dissenting essays in American history. Edited by B. J. Bernstein; B 149
 Ammons, A. R.
 Amram, David
 Vibrations; B 635
 ... And other dirty stories. L. L. King; B 540
 Anderson, Jack. See Pearson, Drew
 Anderson, Patrick
 The President's men (Johnson advisers);
 B 571
 Anna Karenina and other essays. F. R.
 Leavis; B 217
 Annotated Sherlock Holmes, the. Sir Arthur
 Conan Doyle. Edited by W. S. Baring-
 Gould; B 122; see also C, 277
 Anti-memoirs. A. Malraux; B 469
 Appel, Alfred, Jr.; R 441
 Arendt, Hannah (ed.)
 Illuminations essays and reflections, by
 W. Benjamin; B 728
 Ariel. By S. Plath; B 245
 Armah, E. Kwei
 The beautiful ones are not yet born; B 221
 Art. Art books briefly noted 661, 700;
 see also correction on price of Josef Albers book, 706
 Art, the demands of. M. Raphael; B 659
 Arthos, John; R 248; see also C, 290
 Aspects of the theory of syntax. N. Chomsky;
 B 213
 Atkins, John
 Aldous Huxley; B 376
 Autobiography of Bertrand Russell, the;
 1914-1944; B 25
- B
 Baez, Joan
 Daybreak; P 286
 Bag, the. By Yurick; B 286
 Baker, Elliott
 The penny wars; B 221
 Bandler, Michael J.; R 443
 Baring-Gould, William S. (ed.)
 The annotated Sherlock Holmes; B 122;
 see also C, 277
 Barnett, Richard J.
 Intervention and revolution; B 505
 Barth, John
 Lost in the funhouse; B 441
 Baudelaire, Charles. See Lowell, R.
 Beard, Charles A. See Hofstadter, R.
 Beautiful ones are not yet born, the. A. K.
 Armah; B 221

[illegible]

- Guadagno, Carmelo. See Dockstader, F. J.
 Guatemala traveler, the: a concise history and guide. S. Rodman; B 26
 Guevara, Ernesto Che
 Eight books by and on reviewed 316;
 also C, 450
 Guthrie, Woody
 Bound for glory; B 346
- H
 Hamilton, Walker
 All the little animals; B 346
 Hansford Johnson, Pamela
 The survival of the fittest; B 124
 Hass, Robert; R 253
 Hatch, Robert; R 220, 602
 Heart-keeper, the. F. Sagan; B 539
 Herderson, John
 M. Cohen equates morality with legality;
 C 692; see also 597
 Hernton, Nat; R 53
 Herzen, Alexander
 My past and thoughts: the memoirs of Alexander Herzen; B 405
 Hofstadter, Richard
 The progressive historians; Turner, Beard,
 Parrington; B 533
 Holmes, Sherlock. See Doyle, Sir Arthur
 Conan
 Hong, Howard V. and Edna H. (eds.)
 Soren Kierkegaard: journals and papers;
 B 693
 Horizon book of the Middle Ages. Edited by M. Bishop and N. Kotker; B 293
 Hour of last things, an: and other stories.
 G. P. Elliott; B 153
 House made of dawn. N. S. Momaday; B 91
 Huckleberry Finn, adventures of. Mark Twain.
 Available editions reviewed by G. Mayberry Humanities and inhumanities, the. Article by
 L. Kampf on humanistic education of U.S.
 industrial elite 309
 Humphrey, Hubert H. Drugstore liberal, the:
 Hubert H. Humphrey in politics. R. G.
 Sherrill and H. W. Ernst (excerpt) 156
 Huxley, Aldous. By J. Atkins; B 376
 Huxley, Laura Archera
 This timeless moment: a personal view of
 Aldous Huxley; B 376
 Huxleys, the. R. W. Clark; B 376
 Hymes, Dell
 Cheap laugh for R. Roszak in citing dissertation titles in review of Annotated
 Sherlock Holmes; C 277; see also 122
- I
 Illuminations: essays and reflections. W. Benjamin. Edited by H. Arendt; B 728
 Indian art in South America. F. J. Dock-stader. Photography by C. Guadagno; B 54
 Indian heritage of America, the. A. M.
 Joseph, Jr.; B 699
 Intervention and revolution. R. J. Barnett;
 B 505
 Israel. Twelve books on reviewed 443
 Israel and world politics. T. Draper; B 443
 It's wings that me birds by: the story of a boy. S. Weiner; B 603
- J
 J. C. saves. R. Gover; B 286
 Jencks, Christopher, and David Riesman
 The academic revolution; B 120
 Johnson, President L. B. President's men, the.
 P. Anderson; B 571
 Johnson, Pamela Hansford. See Hansford
 Johnson, P.
 Joseph, Alvin M., Jr.
 The Indian heritage of America; B 699
- K
 Kael, Pauline
 Kiss kiss bang bang; B 221
 Kahn, E. J., Jr.
 The separated people: a look at contemporary South Africa; B 21
 Kampf, Louis
 Article The humanities and inhumanities, on humanistic education of U.S. industrial elite 309
 Katz, Steve
 The exaggerations of Peter Prince; B 286
 Keeley, George, and Philip Sherrard (eds.)
 Collected poems, 1924-1955, by C. Seferis;
 B 248; see also C, 290
 Kellogg, Charles Flint
 NAACP: a history of the National association for the advancement of colored people. Vol. I, 1909-1920; B 315
- Kenney, Edwin J., Jr.; R 282
 Kesel, Ken. Electric Kool-Aid acid test, the.
 T. Wolfe; B 218
 Kierkegaard, Soren: journals and papers.
 Edited by H. V. and E. H. Hong; B 283
 King, Larry L.
 . . . And other dirty stories; B 540
 Kinnell, Galway
 Body rags; B 244
 Kirkwood, James
 Good times and bad; B 603
 Kiss kiss bang bang. P. Kael; B 221
 Kissack, Gary
 (Sylvia) Plath: a terrible perfection. Article on poet 245
 Knoepfel, John; R 439
 Kotker, Norman (ed.) See Bishop, M.
 Kott, Jan
 Theatre notebook: 1947-1957; B 634
- L
 Lacy, Allen; R 120
 Lacy, Alan. Review of M. de Unamuno's Our Lord Don Quixote, in June 24 Nation, inadequate. G. P. Marks III; C 66
 Lam, Trung B. H.
 Patterns of Vietnamese response to foreign intervention: 1858-1900; B 88
 Laqueur, Walter
 Road to Jerusalem, the; B 443
 Latin America. Eight books by and about Che
 Guevara reviewed 316
 Lawrence (Ernest O.) and Oppenheimer (J.
 Robert); By N. P. Davis; B 634
 Lazere, Donald; R 569
 Leavis, F. R.
 Anna Karenina and other essays; B 217
 Le Carré, John
 A small town in Germany; B 731
 Lefort, Claude. See Morin, E.
 Leichuk, Alan; R 217
 Lester, Julius
 Look out, Whitey! Black power's gon' get your mama; B 53
 Lewis, Richard (ed.)
 Out of the world I sing: poetry and songs of the primitive peoples of the world; B Label and academic freedom: a law suit against political extremists. A. M. Rose;
 B 150
 Lice, the. W. S. Merwin; B 253
 Lieber, Joel; R 282
 Lieber, Joel
 Move!; B 58
 Light, James F.; R 183
 Linguistics. Five works by by N. Chomsky contributed by R. Sklar article 213; see also C, 322
 Logan, John; R 244
 Long view, the (on South Africa). A. Paton;
 B 610
 Look out, Whitey! Black power's gon' get your mama. J. Lester; B 53
 Lost in the funhouse. J. Barth; B 441
 Love and work. R. Price; B 59
 Lowell, Robert
 The voyage: and other versions of poems
 by Baudelaire. Illustrations by S. Nolan;
 B 698
 Lowry, Malcolm
 Dark as the grave wherein my friend is laid; B 188
 Lundberg, Ferdinand
 The rich and the super-rich; B 121
 Lyrical and critical essays. A. Camus. Edited by P. Thody; B 569
- M
 McNamara, Robert S.
 The essence of security; B 501; see
 also C, 610
 McNickle, D'Arcy; R 54, 699
 McWilliams, Carey (ed.)
 The California revolution (excerpt) 93
 Magdoff, Harry; R 726
 Mai 1968: la brèche. E. Morin, C. Lefort, and J.-M. Coudray; B 313
 Male, Norma
 Miami and the siege of Chicago: an informal history of the Republican and Democratic conventions of 1968; B 631
 Malraux, André
 Anti-memoirs; B 469
 Marcuse, Herbert
 Psychoanalysis und Politik; B 566
 Marks, George P. III
 A. Lacy inadequate in review of M. de Unamuno's Our Lord Don Quixote in June 24 Nation; C 66
 Márquez, Gabriel Garcia. See Garcia Már-qués
 Married man, a. A. B. DeMott; B 286
- Mayberry, George
 Article Huckleberry Finn enriched, on available editions of Mark Twain classic
 Mazzaro, Jerome; R 252, 698
 Mervin, W. S.
 The lice; B 253
 Meyers, Bert
 The dark birds; B 344
 Miami and the siege of Chicago: an informal history of the Republican and Democratic conventions of 1968. N. Mailer; B 631 Middle Ages, the flowering of. Edited by
 J. Evans; B 693
 Middle ages, the Horizon book of. Edited by M. Bishop and N. Kotker; B 693
 Military halt, the: U.S. destruction of Vietnamese people. J. Schell; B 88
 Mirabelli, Eugene
 The way in; B 91
 Mirsky, Jonathan; R 88
 Momaday, N. Scott
 House made of dawn; B 91
 Mooney, Tom. Frame-up: the incredible case of Tom Mooney and Warren Billings. By
 C. Gentry; B 629
 Mooney case, the. R. H. Frost; B 629
 Morgenstern, Christian
 Gallows songs; B 252
 Morin, Edgar, Claude Lefort, and Jean-Marc Coudray
 Mai 1968: la brèche; B 313
 Morning moon and night. J. G. Cooper; B 218
 Mosby's memoirs and other stories. S. Bellow;
 B 725
 Morris, Robert K.; R 58
 Motion pictures. Kiss kiss bang bang. P. Kael;
 B 221
 Move! J. Lieber; B 58
 Music and people. N. Rorem; B 615
 My past and thoughts: the memoirs of Alexander Herzen; B 405
 Myers, Oliver T.; R 600
 Myrdal, Jan
 Confessions of a disloyal European; B 220
 Myer, Anton
 Once an eagle; B 221
- N
 NAACP: a history of the National association for the advancement of colored people.
 Vol. I, 1909-1920. C. F. Kellogg; B 315
 Nairn, Tom
 Learning ahead of theory: Article on May, 1968, French student revolt and books thereon 313
 Nation, The: books of interest to readers of.
 Books by contributors 506
 Negroes. Eight books on urban Negroes in North. Article by E. D. Genovese 56
 Night patrol to Hanoi. D. Berrigan; B 539
 No one writes to the colored: and other stories.
 G. Garcia Márquez; B 600
 Nolan, Sidney. See Lowell, R.
 Novick, Julius
 Beyond Broadway: the quest for permanent theatres (excerpt) 60
- O
 Oates, Joyce Carol
 Expensive people; B 475
 Obscenity. End of obscenity, the. C. Rembar;
 B 184
 O'Connell, Shaun; R 407
 Oé, Kenzaburo
 A personal matter; B 91
 Once an eagle. A. Myrer; B 221
 O'Nolan, Kevin. See Gopalen, Myles
 Oppenheimer, J. Robert. Lawrence and Oppenheimer. By N. P. Davis; B 633
 Out of the world I sing: poetry and songs of primitive peoples of the world. Edited by
 R. Lewis; B 56
- P
 Paradox players, the. M. Duffy; B 346
 Parrington, Vernon L. See Hofstadter, R.
 Passion for Sicilians, a: the world of Danilo
 Dolci. By J. Mangione; B 602
 Paton, Alan
 The long view; B 21
 Patterns of Vietnamese response to foreign intervention: 1858-1900. T. B. Lam; B 88
 Pearson, Drew, and Jack Anderson
 The case against Congress: a compelling indictment of corruption on Capitol Hill;
 B 278
 Pendrell, Nat; R 342
 Penny wars, the. E. Baker; B 221
 Personal matter, the. K. Oe; B 91
 Picasso theatre. D. Cooper; B 697

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Planz, Allen; R	247	Science. Politics of pure science, the. D. S. Greenberg; B
Plath, Sylvia	245	Scott, Robert Ian
Arlet; B	245	Strictures on N. Chomsky's contribution to linguistics; C
The colossus; B	245	322; see also 213
Poemas humanos/Human poems. C. Vallejo. Bilingual edition, translated by C. Eshleman; B	439	Seance, the. I. B. Singer; B
man; B	439	Seferis, George
Poetry, primitive. Out of the world I sing: poetry and songs of primitive peoples of the world. Edited by R. Lewis; B	56	Collected poems 1924-1955. Edited by E. Kealey and P. Sherrard; B
Unwritten song, the: poetry of the primitive and traditional peoples of the world. Edited by W. Trask; B	56	Separated people, the: a look at contemporary South Africa. E. J. Kahn, Jr.; B
Poets on poetry. Special section, Sep. 16	56	Servan-Schreiber, J.-J.
Point of departure: an attempt at autobiography. J. Cameron; B	730	The American challenge; B
Politics of pure science, the. D. S. Greenberg; B	186	Sheed, Wilfred
Polner, Murray; R	537	The blacking factory and Pennsylvania Gothic; B
Portis, Charles		Sherrard, Philip (ed.). See Kealey, E.
True grit; B	92	Sherrill, Robert G.; R
Poss, Stanley; R	153	Sherrill, Robert G., and Harry W. Ernst
Poverty, culture and: critique and counter proposals. C. A. Valentine; B	342	The drugstore liberal: Hubert H. Humphrey in politics (excerpt)
President's men, the. P. Anderson; B	571	Ship Island and other stories. E. Spencer; B
Price, Reynolds	59	Sicily. Passion for Sicilians, a: the world of Danilo Dolci. By J. Mangione; B
Love and work; B	59	Silver, Nathan; R
Priestley, J. B.	534	Singer, Isaac Bashevis
Essays of five decades; B	534	The seance; B
Progressive historians, the: Turner, Beard, Parrington. By R. Hofstadter; B	533	Sklar, Robert; R
Psychoanalyse und Politik. H. Marcuse; B	566	Sklar, Robert
Pursuit of happiness, the. T. Rogers; B	59	Chomsky's revolution in linguistics. Article on work of linguist-radical
R		213; see also C, 322
Radosh, Roland; R	149	Slave language. Essay by M. Thelwell quoted from book William Styron's Nat Turner: ten black writers respond
Raphael, Max		316
The demands of art; B	659	Sloat, Warren; R
Rembar, Charles		26
The end of obscenity; B	184	Small town in Germany, a. J. Le Carré; B
Renek, Morris		731
Quote demonstrates R. S. McNamara's lack of candor; C	610; see also 501	Snodgrass, W. D.
Revolutionary politics and the Cuban working class. M. Zeitlin; B	55	After experience; B
Rich and the super-rich, the. F. Lundberg; B	121	252
Riesman, David. See Jencks, W.		Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr I.
Road to Jerusalem. W. L. Laqueur; B	423	The first circle; B
Rodman, Selden		341
The Guatemala traveler: a concise history and guide; B	26	Soren Kierkegaard: journals and papers. Edited by H. V. and E. H. Hong; B
Rogers, Thomas		283
The pursuit of happiness; B	59	South Africa. Long view, the. A. Paton; B
Rorem, Ned		21
Music and people; B	635	Separated people, the: a look at contemporary South Africa. E. J. Kahn, Jr.; B
Rose, Arnold M.		21
Label and academic freedom: a law suit against political extremists; B	150	Spencer, Elizabeth
Rosenkrantz, Linda		539
Talk; B	59	Ship Island and other stories; B
Rosenthal, Raymond; R	504	Stade, George; R
Rosset, Barney (ed.)		728
Evergreen Review reader; B	533	Stallman, R. W.
Rosten, Norman		183
Under the boardwalk; B	602	Steen Crane, By R. W. Stallman; B
Rozsak, Theodore; R	122; see also C, 277	Stern, Daniel; R
Rosenberg, Jerome; R	56	Stern, Daniel
Ruchames, Louis; R	315	The suicide academy; B
Ruiz, Ramón Eduardo		407
Cuba: the making of a revolution; B	55	Stock, Robert
Russell, Bertrand		Covenants; B
The autobiography of Bertrand Russell: 1914-1944; B	25	Stone, Christopher D.; R
S		629
Sagan, Françoise		Stratégie et révolution en France 1968. A. Glucksmann; B
The heart-keeper; B	539	313
Sainz, Gustavo		Strout, Cushing
Gazapo; B	91	C. Brossard unfair to E. H. Erikson's Identity: youth in crisis, in June 3 Nation ; C
Schell, Jonathan		2
The military half; B	88	Suicide academy, the. D. Stern; B
Schiffman, André		407
Heil ho! the Frankfurt fair. Article on student demonstrations at German book fair	373	Suknick, Ronald
Schumann, Frederick L.		58
P. Cileack and C. Brossard unfair to J. T. Farrell's New Year's Eve 1929 and E. H. Erikson's Identity: youth in crisis in respective reviews in June 3 Nation ; C	20	Survival of the fittest, the. P. Hansford Johnson; B
		124
		Syntactic structures. N. Chomsky; B 213
		T
		Talk. L. Rosenkrantz; B
		59
		Terkel, Studs; R
		730
		Theatre. Beyond Broadway: the quest for permanent theatres. J. Novick (excerpt)
		60
		Theatre notebook: 1947-1967. J. Kott; B
		634
		Thelwell, Mike
		Essay Slave language, quoted from book William Styron's Nat Turner: ten black writers respond, edited by J. H. Clarke 316
		This timeless moment: a personal view of Aldous Huxley. By L. A. Huxley; B 376
		Topics in the theory of generative grammar. N. Chomsky; B
		213
		Towards a new past: dissenting essays in American history. Edited by B. J. Bernstein; B
		149
		Trachtenberg, Alan; R
		534, 631
		Trask, Willard (ed.)
		The unwritten song: poetry of the primitive and traditional peoples of the world; B 56
		True grit. C. Portis; B
		92
		Zweig, Paul; R
		283, 469

FROM PARIS ALEXANDER WERTH

THE NATION

JULY 8, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
JUL 8 1968
LIBRARY

A Man May Choose

The Case for Selective Pacifism

CARL COHEN

Black Panthers: The Cornered Cats

MICHAEL HARRIS

n's Ploy

FLIGHT OF THE LAME DUCK

DONALD L. ROBINSON

South Africa: The Onlooker and the Insider

NADINE GORDIMER

3-69R PL-337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

Marine veteran

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Apropos Sandy Goodman's "Back from Vietnam: The Invisible Veterans" [The Nation, June 3], I wish to correct an erroneous statement: "And so far enlistments haven't been extended, as they were during Korea."

In March, 1966, all enlisted Marine Corps personnel were given a four-month involuntary extension. Although I myself was to be released from active duty on March 1, 1966, I did not leave Vietnam until late June of that year.

Furthermore, our organization (Vietnam Veterans Against the War) respects the opinion of Mr. DuParma, that "Almost every veteran has an emotional bias in favor of the war," but we do not agree and, in fact, contend that the opposite is closer to the truth.

G. James Boggio

memorial

Brooklyn, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: Is it stupidity, hypocrisy, or just plain contempt for the democratic voter?

Worship Robert Kennedy, work for him, adulate him, respect him, weep for him, cherish him forever—and then ignore his last testament by casting Kennedy votes for the Humphrey-Administration ticket which he so valiantly opposed?

Aaron Katz

band of dispossessed

Knoxville, Tenn.

DEAR SIR: I read "The New Mexican Land War" by Clark Knowlton [The Nation, June 17] with a map of New Mexico in front of me, and an exciting three weeks of Poor People's Campaign discussions and demonstrations with Reies Tijerina in my mind. Thanks for the clearest account of the Alianza Federal de Mercedes history and activities I have seen.

Let us hope there can be a banding together of people all over this land whose homes and land have been confiscated or covered with mud by strip mining or pushed aside by mechanization.

Myles Horton, Highlander Center

correction

Through an error in transmission from Paris, a sentence of Alexander Werth's "Students, Workers and the General" (The Nation, June 24) was garbled. The error appears at the foot of column one, page 818, where a television interview with de Gaulle was attributed to M. Mitterrand.

The Editors

Erikson and Farrell

Ithaca, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: Any one who has actually read Erik Erikson's work will not be misled by Chandler Brossard's glib caricature of it ["Making Life Tougher," The Nation, June 3]. Those who might be led to read it have been treated badly. Erikson specifically rebukes those who would try to analyze creative people with historical commitments in terms of an inappropriate and mythical idea of "inner repose"; and he has developed the identity-crisis concept as a way of preventing people from being prematurely categorized as "patients" who don't "adjust." Mr. Brossard confuses "invigorating sameness" with monotony, and resolving "identity-diffusion" with what he would probably call "self-

(Continued on page 20)

EDITORIALS

Candidates and Bosses

It finally became clear in Connecticut that a third-party movement is beginning to emerge. And Democratic National Chairman John Bailey is one of its architects. At the Connecticut convention on June 21 and 22, he refused to give McCarthy supporters proportional representation on the state's delegation to the national convention. He stuck rigidly to his position, despite a public appeal by Sen. Abe Ribicoff that was nothing less than passionate. It was apparent to everyone that Bailey was acting not as State Chairman (which he also is) but as National Chairman. The Humphrey forces have learned from one disastrous primary after another that they cannot win the nomination with the support of the people; they must rely upon the support of the national bosses. And this boss support—as Bailey demonstrated in Hartford and Humphrey himself demonstrated on the same day in Minnesota—is going to be applied ruthlessly.

Ribicoff, a decent man and a skilled politician, knows what this means. He made the extraordinary gesture of offering his own place on the national delegation to the Rev. Joseph Duffey, leader of the McCarthy forces. He also pleaded with these forces not to walk out, a plea that finally went unheeded. Duffey and Bailey negotiated up until the closing minutes of the convention, and the number ten became symbolic. The McCarthy forces demanded ten seats on the forty-four-man delegation, even though a vote on one question indicated that their proportional share should have been thirteen. Bailey raised his offer from five to nine and refused to add the one more, even though Ribicoff and Gov. John Dempsey wanted him to compromise, and even though he knew a walkout would follow if he did not.

There is no secret what the Humphrey-Bailey strategy is: ramrod Humphrey into the nomination and then count on the specter of Richard Nixon as President to restore, however reluctantly, party unity. But, as Ribicoff recognized in what must have been the most unhappy speech in his long and useful career, this may not work. Indeed, if the statements of the McCarthy people, both public and private, are any indication, it will not work. This was made clear at a rally on the lawn outside the Connecticut Statehouse, sponsored by Clarence Jones, a leader of the McCarthy supporters in New York State, where the Senator had won such an extraordinary victory just a few days before. Jones, a Negro, said he "was not going to mouth the customary words about support of the party." He said that McCarthy people would work inside and outside the party, and that if Humphrey were nominated he reserved the right to take action outside the party.

A few minutes later, inside the convention hall, Richard Goodwin, who spoke on behalf of McCarthy, said that the McCarthy forces were going to carry the fight to Chicago and beyond. And after the McCarthy supporters, more than a quarter of the convention delegates, had walked out, Paul O'Dwyer said that "we are not going to accept a Democratic organization that repudiates the people from one end of the country to the other." O'Dwyer was obviously a hero to the McCarthy people in Connecticut. Not only were they won by his wit and charm but his all-but-impossible victory in New York symbolized their hope that McCarthy too could win an all-but-impossible victory.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

If this is to be done, the McCarthy supporters must convince the bosses that Humphrey can't win—that even Nixon is not a bugaboo sufficiently alarming to restore party unity. At this stage the McCarthy leaders are not in a position to threaten publicly and flatly a third party, but in private conversation there was endless speculation about such a possibility. It was not glib talk; these were loyal Democrats who want to remain Democrats but who feel rejected by their own party. Some talked of a third party in the hope that the mere threat will cause the convention to reject Humphrey. Among these were also some who hope that such talk will, at least, force Humphrey to take a strong stand against the war in Vietnam.

There are those, however, who feel so deeply alienated by the party machine that they seriously advocate a third party, even if it would—as they recognize—mean the election of Nixon. While they are horrified by such a prospect, they are so deeply convinced that fundamental change in the Democratic Party is necessary that they are willing to pay even that extreme price. Humphrey is betting that not too many feel as bitter as that, but he would be making a serious mistake to count on it too heavily. The depth of feeling against him is great.

In any case, a third party is a last resort, not to be taken until after Chicago. Until then the McCarthy people will work within the party. They will go to the courts wherever they can but the campaign will, from the start, be based on the people. The biggest petition campaign in American history will be undertaken. State by state, town by town, McCarthy volunteers, many of them college students on vacation, will collect signatures. They hope for millions, more than have ever been collected in this or any other nation. They want to say to Bailey and the bosses at Chicago: "These millions of people want McCarthy for President. Reject him and them at your own risk."

If they can get these signatures—and no doubt they will get a great many—Bailey and the bosses should take heed. If they don't, no one can say what will happen, but it will not be good. Nixon or Humphrey may be able to be elected, but neither will be able to govern. Is that what Humphrey and Bailey want?

RICHARD J. WALTON

Delegate to the Connecticut Democratic Convention

IN THIS ISSUE

AUG 6
NOV 19
JULY 8, 1968

EDITORIALS

2

ARTICLES

- 7 The Cleverness of de Gaulle

Alexander Werth

- 8 Left, Right and Yankee:
The Blood of Guatemala

Georgie Anne Geyer

- 11 A Man May Choose:
The Case for Selective Pacifism

Carl Cohen

- 15 Black Panthers: The Cornered Cats

Michael Harris

- 18 Johnson's Ploy:
Flight of the Lame Duck

Donald L. Robinson

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 21 The Onlooker and the Insider

Nadine Gordimer

- 25 Haunted by Himself

Max Byrd

- 26 United Fruit Country

Warren Sloat

- 27 The Birds on the Morning of Going (poem)

W. S. Merwin

- 28 The Big Black Bag

Martin Tucker

- 28 Films

Robert Hatch

- 29 Theatre

Julius Novick

- 31 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL ALLEN

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YULE

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHKE; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 1

The Honorable 'Conspirators'

In Boston, Dr. Benjamin Spock, the Rev. William Sloane Coffin, Jr., Mitchell Goodman and Michael Ferber have been convicted in federal court of conspiracy to counsel young men to evade the draft. In Baltimore, the Rev. Philip Berrigan, the Rev. James L. Mengel, Thomas P. Lewis and David Eberhardt have been convicted of hindrance to the execution of the draft laws (they had poured blood on draft board records) and other federal offenses. The latter quartet received sentences ranging up to six years.

The charge of "conspiracy" in the Boston case is absurd on its face, except possibly in the narrow legal sense, under which conspiracy is a catchall for any action, whether actually criminal or merely inconvenient to the government, in which two or more participate together. The element of secrecy, always present in the popular idea of conspiracy, is not essential in the legal version. Some of the "conspirators" in the Boston case deposited at the Department of Justice scraps of draft cards which they averred had been torn up by the individuals to whom the cards had been issued. They did not all know one another until after they were indicted. They circulated a political tract, "Call to Resist," which was signed by 2,500 others, including Bishop Pike and Linus Pauling. Still, the government contended, and the jury agreed (except as to one defendant), that a criminal conspiracy had indeed taken place.

In the Boston and Baltimore cases the elements of similarity, on the government's side, transcend the differences. The government's objective was deterrence of any public action that would tend to promote resistance to the Selective Service laws and the Vietnamese War. Another similarity, as Prof. Herbert Jehle of George Washington University pointed out in a letter published in the June 21 New York Times in reference to the Boston trial, was that the court "sidetracked the issue of legality, morality or constitutionality of the war in Vietnam as irrelevant to the case [and thus] conveniently closed its ears to the real issues at stake: the terrible confusion in regard to violence which plagues this country and the world." This applies with equal force to the Baltimore proceeding.

Political trials, of course, are nothing new in this country. As recently as the fifties, in the era of Joe McCarthy, we had hundreds of them—a few dozen formal ones in the courts, the others before legislative tribunals in the guise of investigations. From one viewpoint, the current proceedings are distinct from those carried out in the hysterical phase of anti-communism. The accused in the celebrated earlier trials—Hiss, Remington, the Rosenbergs, Sobell and others—were charged with offenses which, if they did in fact commit them, put the defendants outside the pale of popular toleration. They were accused of trafficking with a foreign power which, if not technically an enemy (indeed, an ally when the trafficking was allegedly done) was, and is, viewed with fear and distrust by most Americans. Their word for such action is treason.

But no one calls the defendants in the current cases by opprobrious names. The talk now is about unwise methods of dissent, of the arrogance of moral conviction, of eroding authority, etc. The men themselves are held to be honorable, even by the attorneys who prosecute them. The Baltimore prosecutor said to Father Berrigan's sister-in-law: "If there is a heaven, these men will go there. I have to do my job in the courtroom." He drew the sharpest possible distinction between government and morality—the issue that has been avoided in the trials to date and that will, unless the higher courts intervene, be avoided in the trials to come.

This avoidance goes to the heart of the matter. A government, being sovereign, is ipso facto immune from questions of morality. It can command its citizens to commit murder in what the rulers decide is the national interest, and by that command the deed ceases to be murder and becomes the most praiseworthy of actions. The nature of the war is immaterial, as are the motives and character of its opponents. The war may conform to St. Augustine's criteria of the just war, as World War II did on the Allied side, but the courts do not distinguish between the Vietnamese War and World War II. The war is the war, the law is the law. [See "The Case for Selective Pacifism" by Carl Cohen, p. 11.]

The analogy with the Joe McCarthy era lies in the fact that the motivating force of the cold war is now, as it has been all along, the popular fear of revolution. The Vietnamese War is only an extension of the cold war into the realm of violence. It is impossible to call the opponents of the war Communists, but they can be called revolutionists—from the bench in Baltimore—and in their resistance to governmental action, that is precisely what they are.

Might one say, then, that one measure of the irrationality and cruelty of a nation's foreign policy is the caliber of the citizens it must prosecute in order to continue that policy unchallenged? If so, is there still a category morally superior to Berrigan, Coffin, Spock, et al., that can be brought to the dock as our policy and its furtherance become still more indefensible? Or might one judge, from the moral stature of these men, that we have already reached some absolute of international folly?

The Bugs of War

A major (and increasing) part of the $17 billion the federal government spends annually on research and development is, directly or indirectly, "mission-oriented"—directed toward specific military objectives. Some part of these billions is funneled into projects inspired by the demands of the Vietnamese War, which will go down in history as an attack on a small, primitive country by the world's foremost technological-military power. These projects include such bizarre devices as an artificial bloodhound claimed to be capable of detecting human beings by smell, so that guerrilla fighters in the jungle (or simply peasants) may be exterminated by air strikes.

A more plausible, and indeed demonstrably operative, invention is a family of devices that in the present state of the art permit night observation at ranges up to 1,200 meters (about 3/4 mile). These are electronic light amplifiers, emitting no radiation of their own and hence undetectable by the enemy but utilizing ambient light—skyglow, starlight or moonlight—to produce the image of a target that would be invisible to the unaided eye. The resolution is said to be that of an average TV picture, and with greater brightness. Such electronic telescopes are ancillary to the vast array of radar equipment.

But all such contrivances are subject to error and misuse in combat, as was shown in the Tonkin Bay incident, where it now seems evident that the idiosyncrasies of radar and sonar enabled the Johnson-Humphrey Administration to initiate the bombing of North Vietnam and expand the war with a blank check from Congress. More recently, mistaken electronic observations apparently played a part in the incident in waters off the DMZ in which the U.S. cruiser Boston, the Australian cruiser Hobart, two USN Swift boats and a Coast Guard cutter were fired on—probably by our own aircraft—producing seven fatalities and the same number of wounded.

The Associated Press (June 21) quoted U.S. sources in Saigon to the effect that it was “highly probable” (in such cases this usually means practically certain) that U.S. aircraft and artillery “mistakenly” attacked allied ships under the impression that they were shooting at enemy helicopters, which had suddenly been reported over the DMZ. The first reports reaching the United States (from South Vietnamese sources) were that American jets and artillery had shot down twelve “Soviet-made” helicopters on June 16-17. An intensive search revealed no helicopter wreckage, while the damage to U.S. and allied surface craft was all too evident.

It was explained (as everyone with even World War II experience with radar knew) that surface craft could be mistaken for low-flying aircraft, while electronic telescopes—through which moving lights were said to have been observed—were unreliable for ranging. One source even speculated that the reports of flying lights might have had the same origin as the sightings of flying saucers in the United States. “The power of suggestion is enormous,” this informant commented.

Of course fatalities inflicted by friendly forces are an old story in war. Stonewall Jackson, the most brilliant general officer the Confederacy possessed, was mortally wounded at Chancellorsville by the fire of his own men. But as war becomes increasingly technologized, such mistakes are bound to occur more frequently, especially in a situation such as that in Vietnam where practically all the air power is on one side. While the reports of North Vietnamese helicopters may be true, on June 23 Gen. Creighton W. Abrams, commander of U.S. troops in South Vietnam, said there is “no formal, concrete, factual evidence” of their presence.

The incident may also betray a degree of apprehension among our military people that at some point our mastery of the air above South Vietnam might be challenged. As it is, whenever U.S. infantry encounters opposition, air strikes are called for and the enemy is slaughtered with practically no risk. This accounts for the 10-to-1 ratio of enemy losses to our own. From a chivalrous or merely decent standpoint (totally irrelevant, to be sure) this is a sickening ratio, just as the use of Vietnam as a proving ground for American weaponry is sickening. The loss of life by fire from friendly sources is deplorable, but no more so than everything else about this war.

The Good Americans

Antipersonnel weapons are developed in bits and pieces. One Army laboratory investigates new materials for fragmenting warheads; another conducts ballistic tests. One company designs a bomblet, another designs the bomblet dispenser fuse, while a third is conducting aerodynamic tests on the dispersion of bomblets. An engineer can concentrate on his immediate task without knowing how his work will be used. Nor does a worker at a ball bearing factory need to know that the 7/32-inch steel balls he is making will go into a fragmentation bomblet.

People in the “establishment” seem similarly unwilling to spread the word. The New York Times has a science correspondent and a military correspondent, both men of considerable experience. The dozens of antipersonnel weapons developed in the last few years might be considered an achievement from either a technological or a military point of view. Various details have been published elsewhere, and a newspaper like the Times has its own methods of getting information. On this subject, however, it maintains a discreet silence. Judging from the index, in 1966 the Times published only two articles on the development of military equipment for use in Vietnam, and antipersonnel weapons were not mentioned in either of them.

Honeywell, Inc., is probably the country's leading producer of antipersonnel weapons. Its sales of aerospace and defense products rose 42 per cent in 1967 to $330 million, 31 per cent of the company's total sales. The Honeywell Annual Report for 1967 attributes this increase largely to “the planned diversification into new air-delivered weapons for the Air Force,” plus equipment for the Navy. The word “antipersonnel” does not appear in the report.

Honeywell does not say “our cluster bombs kill cheaply and efficiently”; rather, their statements are couched in the language of prosperity and careful planning:

Conventional weapon programs promising steady growth potential in future years include the Navy's Rockeye munition-dispenser system and several aerically delivered mine-dispenser systems, which went into volume production during the year.

A Honeywell stockholder will have very little idea what this is all about unless he knows that Rockeye and others of the “new air-delivered weapons” are antipersonnel.

The military services are also not eager to be explicit. A military witness was being somewhat pressed at a Congressional hearing in 1966:

MR. SIKES (D., Fla.): In the justification I note this: “The Rockeye II is a cluster bomb which contains antitank and antipersonnel bomblets.” Does that mean one or the other and not both in the same cluster?

ADMIRAL SHINN (Chief, Bureau of Naval Weapons): They are the same, sir. They spread and if you have a concentration of personnel, would be damaging to the personnel. . . .

MR. SIKES: Surely a bomblet effective against people is not necessarily effective against tanks.

COMMANDER HALEY: Basically this is a shaped-charge head. It is the same as we use on rockets and many other items. The fringe benefit that you derive from this is the antipersonnel effect.

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated July 22, August 5, August 19 and August 26.

From a UPI dispatch to the San Francisco Examiner, January 2:

Fighting against being overrun, the 500 Americans lowered their artillery barrels and boomed round after round of "beehive" shells into the human waves of guerrillas. Each "beehive" shell exploded into hundreds of half-inch darts that shredded the Vietcong. . . .

Flechettes (small darts), according to a U.S. officer quoted by the AP, sometimes pin enemy soldiers to trees. What with shredding, pinning and other forms of "damage," the fringe benefits of antipersonnel weapons seem endless. But no one wants to talk about them.

Insanity as Usual

Recurrently, under the existing political setup, one gets the feeling that reason cannot prevail in any matter pertaining to armaments. In the June 23 New York Times, there appeared a letter by Jerome B. Wiesner—provost of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, science adviser to President Kennedy, and a spokesman for most members of the scientific and technological communities—in reference to the so-called "thin" defense system against future Chinese intercontinental missiles. As marshaled by Wiesner, the arguments against deployment of this misnamed "Sentinel" were devastating, but he might as well have been shouting down a rainbarrel.

On June 24, by a 52-to-34 vote, the Senate defeated a move to postpone deployment of Sentinel, initially submitted by the Administration as a small ($5.5 billion) defense against a weak Chinese ICBM threat. Now the Administration is also swinging to all-out anti-ballistic-missile (ABM) systems in the $40 billion to $100 billion range, designed to ward off Soviet ICBMs.

Wiesner said he was baffled by the logic which held that U.S. offensive missile power is adequate to deter a Soviet missile attack but that we had to have a shield against the relatively weak nuclear attack which the Chinese might be in a position to mount in the seventies. He noted that three Presidential science advisers besides himself had opposed deployment of an anti-Soviet system for the reason that it would only accelerate the arms race. Sentinel, moreover, is already obsolete. Wiesner said, "By the time a defensive system is supposedly perfected, the offense has long since developed a means of overcoming it." The Senate ignored all this sound advice.

And it did so at a time when the world is looking to the United States for some sign that it is willing to take concrete steps toward nuclear disarmament, instead of merely asking other nations to refrain from equipping themselves while the existing nuclear powers hold onto their monopoly. It makes a mockery of President Johnson's pledge to the UN to "search for an agreement that will not only avoid another costly and futile escalation of the arms race but will de-escalate it." What the President says is one thing; what he does is quite another.

The Administration's sponsorship of Sentinel (at a time when the federal budget is to be cut) and the Senate's action (so nicely synchronized with the demolition of Resurrection City) make it the more imperative to nominate and elect candidates, for both legislative and Executive office, who will not be blindly subservient to military persuasion.

California's 'Sick Campuses'

In a letter sent recently to trustees of the California State Colleges, Gov. Ronald Reagan deplored the "climate of violence" which has been created, so he claims, by the campuses. "A sick campus community in California in many ways is responsible for a sick community around those campuses," he said—offering another of his simplistic explanations for the chaos in California. It might be recalled that Governor Reagan promised during his campaign to stop the "chaos on the campuses," but his administration has presided over a deterioration of the educational scene. That is because just the opposite of what he said is true: a sick society creates turmoil on the campuses, especially when idealistic young people confront the hypocrisies of American society.

One of the biggest problems for the campuses of the California state college system is the fact that they are inadequately financed, almost to the point of desperation. They are sick because they are being starved to death—this in California, the richest state in the nation. Reagan has performed a "political miracle" in California: he has drastically cut services (especially those which aid the poor and defenseless) while raising taxes. One result of his economics has been that the state college system has declined to the point where it is, without doubt, second-rate.

The faculty turnover rate in the state colleges was more than 10 per cent last year—almost twice as much as it should have been, according to the Coordinating Council for Higher Education, which lists 6 per cent as acceptable. The percentage of professors holding Ph.D.s has dropped from 47 per cent in 1964-65 to 34 per cent in 1967-68. It is estimated that some 1,100 full-time and 700 part-time positions have yet to be filled for next year. At San Francisco State, where the History Department lost four senior members this year, it is estimated that at least 8,000 students will be turned away in the fall for lack of facilities, and that some 10 per cent of the faculty positions will not be filled by permanent staff. Into the gap will step the ubiquitous and always exploited graduate student.

But Reagan is the philosopher of the "creative society," and it may be expected that he will soon put an end to sickness on the campuses—even if he has to put an end to the campuses themselves.

THE CLEVERNESS OF DE GAULLE

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

It must be said that de Gaulle played his hand more cleverly than anyone else—certainly more cleverly than Mitterrand, head of the Socialist opposition, who at the height of the May crisis proposed himself for the Presidency; than Mendès-France, who offered himself as Premier; or than Giscard D'Estaing, who could see himself in either capacity and who had demanded the government's resignation before de Gaulle's dramatic return to Paris.

De Gaulle, the good psychologist, cashed in on the strike of 10 million and the violent student disorders, playing them up as a menace to the Republic. The general public, especially in the provinces, was genuinely afraid of civil war and economic chaos. De Gaulle declared France threatened by "totalitarian communism," which doesn't necessarily mean the French Communist Party. It avowedly did not consider the situation revolutionary and was content to press for economic concessions to the strikers. The real revolutionaries were the various minor student groups and a small section of the workers; and no one yet knows the extent to which the 1848-type barricades and street violence were the work of government agents provocateurs, eager to create the nation-wide panic which served de Gaulle so well. Time will also show whether de Gaulle's appeal to the army in Germany and the price he paid Massu and the other generals—the release from jail of Salan and the other OAS leaders—wasn't in part intended to attract into the Gaullist ranks extreme Right elements, including the Algerian repatriates.

It seems psychologically improbable that de Gaulle is ganging up with men like Massu, who loathe him for abandoning Algeria, or with Salan whom he wanted condemned to death in 1962 when the court, much to de Gaulle's anger, imposed only a life sentence. Fear of chaos alone explains the overall success of the Gaullists at the polls, the reduction of the Communist vote from 22 per cent to 20 per cent, and the poor showing of Mitterrand, Mollet, Mendès-France and the other left wingers. Mendès-France, in particular, hurt himself by fraternizing with "the revolutionary students," who rebelled not only against the established bourgeois order but also against the regular Communist Party.

The election results suggest a return to "law and order." But what kind? The Spanish press is triumphant, saying that Franco, Salazar and de Gaulle now form a splendid West European front against communism. This suggests for France some kind of Fascist state, with Civic Action para-military formations of the sort de Gaulle mentioned in May. I am perhaps optimistic, but de Gaulle must know that what French opinion can be made to accept is not his abortive quasi-Fascist "French People's Rally" of 1947-53 but the liberal autocracy with an obedient parliament of the last ten years. It is probable that the technological managerial class shares this opinion. Moreover, they know that the French Communist Party, despite the Gaullist election slogans, is no threat and that of all the anti-government forces during the May crisis the Communist C.G.T. Labor Federation was the most moderate.

At the moment, it seems more likely that de Gaulle will support the big business managerial classes rather than the fundamentally anti-Gaullist elements represented by the French Army, the Algerians, et al., though he may keep Roger Frey's Civic Action Committees in reserve against another nation-wide flare-up. The real danger would be that de Gaulle was not pretending to be scared on May 29 but genuinely was so. In that case he might go ahead with his "participation," which recalls the labor-capital association of unholy R.P.F. memory.

In any case, formidable economic difficulties lie ahead. In regard to foreign policy, everything suggests that de Gaulle will continue along his earlier lines, though he may find it awkward to maintain a rapprochement with the East after his denunciations of the Communists. Nevertheless, relations between de Gaulle and the Russian Embassy here continue on the most cordial basis. Both seem to be doing everything possible to help in the American-Vietnamese talks, about which the Soviet Ambassador, whom I saw last week, seemed remarkably optimistic. The difficulties, he said, now come mainly from China.

THE BLOOD OF GUATEMALA

GEORGIE ANNE GEYER

Miss Geyer is a correspondent on Latin America for the Chicago Daily News. Her book, The New Latins, will be published by Putnam's next spring.

Just a year ago, a bellboy of the Hotel Panamericano in Guatemala City handed me an envelope, postmarked the day before in the capital and giving no return address. I opened it and found a letter signed by the new rightist terrorist group called La Mano Blanca, The White Hand. Across the single sheet of plain white paper was printed the outline of a hand. The message was quite clear: interspersed with vulgarities it warned that I would be killed if I attempted to go to the mountains with the Marxist guerrillas.

For a while, the letter troubled me. But, after I showed it to a few associates at the embassy and to people in Guatemalan political circles, I almost forgot about it. The White Hand, they assured me, was only a group of slightly mad letter writers. One friend was convinced that The White Hand is one man who sits at a typewriter all day, writing dirty letters to people he doesn't like.

Now, a year later, it is obvious how tragically wrong we all were. Today, organizations like The White Hand, indirectly supported by American military aid, have set Guatemala on a course of savage destruction. Intent on wiping out the Communist guerrillas, they have been indiscriminately killing Communists, leftists, democrats and innocent bystanders.

When they kidnaped Archbishop Mario Casariego on March 16, their daring reached its peak. They seized the ailing clergyman, and his car, as he returned from Mexico and held him captive for several days, hoping that the very effrontery of the act would bring crowds into the streets and eventually topple the shaky government of President Julio César Mendez Montenegro.

Instead, a nation-wide search began. President Mendez urged loyal Catholics not to demonstrate and implored the country to remain calm. Three days later, the archbishop and his chauffeur walked into the cathedral in the town of Quetzaltenango and the clergyman asked, "Please call for help, we've been released."

For a few days there was no explanation as to the identity of the kidnapers. Then the national police issued a public bulletin attributing the act to The White Hand and acknowledged that the band had expected it could force the government to step down because it would be unable to maintain public order. Raul Laurenziano, the hoodlum military chief of the Hand, was named in the bulletin, and, to the surprise of many Guatemalans, so was Roberto Alejos. Alejos immediately went into hiding. This involvement clearly shows the form of events taking place in Guatemala. Alejos is a wealthy coffee and sugar grower, president of several landowners' associations, and a man with a dramatic past in Guatemalan-American relations. It was the pro-American Alejos who offered his hacienda to the CIA to be used to train men for the Bay of Pigs invasion. Today, he is charged with being one of the most brutal counter-terrorists in all of Latin American history.

But "the archbishop affair," while it shook the shaky country even more than most of the bizarre events that occur there, was only one in a long series. The estimates of people killed within the past year in this troubled little country of 4.5 million persons range between 1,000 and 2,000. The carnage shows no signs of abating. The Communist guerrillas, formed in 1963 as the Rebel Armed Forces (FAR), react to rightist savagery with an equal measure of their own terror.

It was typical of the FAR that, early in January, they assassinated Col. John D. Webber, Jr., and Lieut. Comdr. Ernest A. Munro of the American military mission. [See "Guatemala: Why They Shoot Americans" by Norman Diamond, The Nation, February 5.] The guerrillas have always taken the position that the United States was guilty, because of its continued intervention in Guatemalan affairs, for the country's unhappy situation. To kill Americans was simply to pinpoint the blame.

The murders, moreover, were carried out in revenge for the rightist murder of Rogelia Cruz, Miss Guatemala of 1959, who sympathized with and probably worked for the guerrillas. She had been raped, beaten, stabbed and shot.

But the cause célèbre that shook many observers of the Guatemalan scene most—and the case that perhaps highlights the deep disintegration taking place there—was the expulsion of four Maryknoll clergy from the country in January. Father Thomas Melville, his brother, Father Arthur Melville, Father Blase Bonpane and Sister Marian Peter had opened contacts with the guerrillas, their order admitted. The Guatemalan Government told Maryknoll that either the offending clergy must leave the country or the order would be barred.

What actually happened was that the Maryknoll representatives met with some of the guerrillas. They then decided to form a "Christian guerrilla front" composed of Catholic revolutionaries. They planned to work in the Huehuetenango area, as an arm of the Marxist movement. As far as American and Latin American priests know, this was a "first" of its kind in Latin history.

When these activities were uncovered, an emotion-charged thirty-two-hour meeting followed and the clergy left the country. Three of them went to Mexico City. Sixteen students they had trained for the front followed them—students who smuggled themselves across the border and can never go home again.

The desperation and growing conviction of these four that Guatemalan life cannot be changed by peaceful means, their reasoning and their actions are gaining increasing acceptance among liberal priests in Latin America. "No one wants violence," Father Bonpane said when he left Guatemala, "but when you have American power thrown behind the 2 per cent of the people who own 80 per cent of the land, and supporting a right-wing army that shoots reformers on the spot as 'Communists,' violence is already institutionalized."

Vadillo, La Prensa (Mexico)

And so the battle is joined: two obdurate, implacable extremes, locked in a death struggle, while the middle group flails its arms helplessly. Guatemala's tragedy is that it is frozen in a totally unresolved and unresolvable conflict, with both sides determined, unregenerate, unyielding, and sufficiently matched so as to maintain an endlessly drawn-out conflict.

Since Mendez took power two years ago, the first hopeful sign for the middle group came after the archbishop's kidnapping. For the first time, the President was able to garner enough power to get rid of the top men in the armed forces—men who were openly identified with the Hand. He dismissed three offenders at 9 A.M. on March 28 and at 1 P.M. called a press conference, announcing that all were to be given diplomatic posts—the classic Latin way of kicking undesirables, not upstairs but abroad. He removed the Minister of Defense, Col. Rafael Ariaga Bosque, who had just returned from red-carpet military treatment in the United States; Col. Carlos Arana, who had repeatedly threatened a rightist coup against the government, and Col. Manuel Francisco Sosa Avila, the commander of the National Police. The new defense minister, Col. Rolando Chinchilla Aguilar, formerly chief of the Guatemalan West Point and minister of education, went on the radio, urging both sides to make peace and lay down their arms. (On June 20, the government announced that the state of siege which had prevailed in the country since January 1 had been lifted and constitutional rights restored. Henry Ginniger, reporting in The New York Times, attributed the new "state of optimism" to the decline of rightist terrorism following the diplomatic exile of the colonels.)

But while this step by President Mendez is doubtless the most promising since his election, it is unlikely to secure either peace or tranquility in the near future. Despite the archbishop affair and the military shake-up, there is no evidence that the Hand has been broken. The guerrillas have been largely driven out of their mountain retreat in the Sierra de las Minas, but they have now recouped in the city—one of the first instances in Latin American history that a guerrilla movement has centered its activities in an urban area.

When I went to the mountains with the guerrillas in November, 1966, it was quite different. Then they were following the very essence of the peasant war philosophy of Mao and Castro—the peasant army, formed in the mountains, sweeping down on the evil cities.

The FAR had been formed in 1963 when a handsome young ex-lieutenant in the Guatemalan military, Luis Turcios, deserted the Trotskyite movement of another ex-officer, Marco Antonio Yon Sosa. The movement included students (the largest element by far), peasants and workers. Its spirit was that of the New Left among the Latin American Communists. Like Castro, it deified action and scoffed at the old Moscow-line Communists, who eschew violence. For a while its members maintained a working relationship with the Guatemalan Labor Party, the local Communist Party, but, in February, they broke completely with the party.

The FAR was always a clever group of youngsters, adept at terror. Their specialty was kidnapping big landowners for $75,000 a head, killing marked people and robbing banks. I asked César Montes, the commander after Turcios was killed in an automobile accident, whether they got money from Cuba. Visibly annoyed by the question, he replied: "You've heard about our kidnappings and our bank robberies. You know we're self-supporting."

Just before I went to the mountains to see Montes and his band, the government, for the first time, dispatched 3,000 troops against them and the real war was on. The guerrillas accepted the fight as a challenge and took great pride in sneaking me in and out, under the nose of the military.

We left Guatemala City at 10 P.M., drove through a state of siege, with soldiers on every corner, and stopped the car at a dark portion of the road. From there we walked into the mountains in darkness. They hid me for twenty-four hours in a shack on one of the big haciendas—the "underground railroad" into the mountains.

The guerrillas prayed constantly for overt American involvement. One afternoon, sitting on the side of a mountain, the ground mottled with spots of sun that sifted through the trees, I talked to a German-educated guerrilla named Miguel, now dead. I enjoyed talking with him and he confided: "We hope the Green Berets will come. We want them to come. Then those who say now, we won't take part, will join us against the foreign invaders."

The small and slim César Montes, who was sick that day and spent most of it sprawled on the ground, lifted his head and said in his wry way, "Then they can say they are fighting against the North Guatemalans."

There were perhaps 200 guerrillas in the mountains and about 4,000 in the whole movement, including members located in urban groups. They were at that time uniting with Yon Sosa, the Trotskyite (they were having an "exchange of guerrillas" to get started, they told me). Today, they not only work closely with him but Yon Sosa was this winter named the new chief of the movement.

Driven back to the cities by the government's counter-insurgency program, the guerrillas were doing well and held the offensive until The White Hand and other rightist groups were formed and terrorism and counter-terrorism began on a major scale.

How the rightist groups operate is no secret in Guatemala. They are directed and supported by a clique of big landowners who each contributed $1,000 when the organization was founded in 1966. Those who did not give willingly were kidnapped by the Hand, usually for a $75,000 ransom. Since this is the same fee that the guerrillas charge, it almost constitutes price fixing.

These groups, ironically, rose directly out of the National Liberation movement, which was inaugurated in 1954 with U.S. backing, to overthrow the pro-Communist, Jacobo Arbenz. The ultra-rightist Castillo Armas was to be placed in power. His backers were fanatically Catholic, in the old traditional sense. They saw Communists everywhere and thought they were fighting for a traditionally structured and hierarchical society.

Indirectly, through the participation of Guatemalan officers and soldiers in these rightist groups, the United States is still supporting them. About 50 per cent of Guatemalan officers are trained in the United States. However, little of the American military ideas and rationale rubs off on them.

"The guerrillas have a Marxist philosophy," one American military attaché in Guatemala commented, "and all we have to counter that is a few pamphlets on democracy. The recruits come back anti-Communist, but nothing else is accomplished."

About $2 million of Guatemala's $14 million annual military budget comes from American military aid. In addition, AID money goes to training the Guatemalan police. ("We give them arms for security," one American official commented, "and if they use them to put down a riot, well there's nothing we can do about it.")

But American influence on the Guatemalan military goes far beyond financial support. During the 1966 elections, fearing that street riots would erupt and give the guerrillas a chance to take power, the American military advisers were feeding intelligence to the Guatemalan army, which had no intelligence section. Since then, American military and Green Beret trainers have helped train the troops in anti-guerrilla tactics. The most ominous creation was a group of several hundred vigilantes—armed peasants who were sent out into the mountains to kill guerrillas and "anyone expected of sympathizing."

"A lot of White Hand people were deputized," says one high American official, "and they took care of their personal vendettas."

Whether Americans were directly involved in training the vigilantes is open to question, but certainly the support and funds given the military seep down to them. A possible connection worries some of the highest of Washington's Latin America policy makers.

"I don't know what role the American military played in the formation of the vigilantes," Sol Linowitz, American ambassador to the Organization of American States, told me recently, "but I intend to find out. Vigilantes are always a dangerous business."

It would not be the first time that the United States has intervened in Guatemala. The 1954 coup against Arbenz was Washington's creation and was followed by three years of a total military dictatorship. By 1963 a moderate, General Miguel Ydigoras Fuentes, had been elected President. However, it looked as though Ydigoras might be succeeded that year by a man who had leftist tendencies though he was not a Communist. Again the United States moved. With Washington's help, Ydigoras was overthrown and again a three-year rightist military dictatorship was installed. [See Warren Sloat's review of The Guatemala Traveler, p. 26 this issue.]

Clearly, it was during this three-year period, when there was no movement forward at all in the country, that the guerrilla movement developed and so did the level of desperation. For while in most Latin countries social progress is at a standstill, in Guatemala, the march is resolutely backward. In 1950, 70 per cent of the people lived on a subsistence level. By 1963 the percentage had moved to 73. From 1950 to 1964, while the GNP increased, the per capita income of the rural population (70 per cent of the people) dropped from $87 to $83.

The mood in the country by the time elections were held in March, 1966, was so foreboding that society ladies used the constant explosions as signals for putting more money in the bridge-game pot. One large landowner who used to give his peasants statues of the Peruvian saint, Saint Martin de Porres, the "example of humility," recently stopped. Local priests were agitating for labor unions and the owner had become disillusioned with the church and its symbolism which had served his purpose so well for so long.

The popular dissatisfaction with military rule emerged dramatically in the 1966 elections. Although seeming in full control of the electoral machinery and of the massive (65 per cent) Indian vote, the military lost the election to the only civilian candidate, the dapper former law professor Mendez Montenegro. For weeks after the election, the electoral board refused to release figures. Correspondents' questions were met with ingenious explanations—the votes were coming in by mule packs and the mules hadn't arrived.

When Mendez did take power, his hands were tied. He was forced into a written pact with the armed forces by which he agreed not to touch the military or go too far with reforms, and they in turn agreed to let him stay in power. Both Mendez and the American embassy consistently took the position that staying in power for the four years, even if he did nothing, would be enough of an accomplishment.

But for the increasingly restive youth of the country, it was not enough. As one of the guerrillas told me at the time, "Even if Mendez stays in power, if he can't do anything, it is just another example to us that democracy can't work."

So far, nothing has worked. Mendez's mild agrarian reform, which aimed at turning over seven government-owned estates to the peasants that worked them, managed in the end to turn over only two estates. In a country where tax receipts are among the very lowest in the world, the government was forced by the opposition to rescind even a small tax on goods and services that would have financed development. Nonetheless, the wealthy coffee growers insist that the government continue to underwrite their crops.

If Mendez can control the military and if he can even now begin to initiate some reforms, there still may be hope for this ravaged country. But American officials are not optimistic.

"His record of achievement is discouraging," one top American official working in Guatemala says. "His reform program is constantly attacked as communistic and he is so involved in counterinsurgency, there is no time for anything else. Besides, our new foreign aid legislation requires self-help. In Guatemala, there has been a noted lack of administrative zeal over this."

Perhaps the most depressing factor about the entire Guatemalan saga is the growing desperation of so many of the youth. They are beginning to echo the words of the rebels in Santo Domingo and the students in South Vietnam who, when faced by a situation they felt never could be resolved, turned toward sacrificial death as their only offering to history.

As Father Bonpane said of the "Christian guerrillas" he was helping to train: "One lad told me eighty of his friends were shot last year. He also told me, 'Well, Jesus told us the seed had to fall into the ground and die or it would remain by itself, alone.'

"I think, Father, that we are the seed of the new order, and I think that the first and most difficult thing we have to do is lose our fear of death."

A MAN MAY CHOOSE

The Case for Selective Pacifism

CARL COHEN

Mr. Cohen teaches philosophy at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor.

Conscience is the term loosely employed by each man to identify the set of moral principles he personally holds fundamental; our conscience bothers us, we say, when we are aware of a discrepancy between how we act and what we profess. Sometimes the conscience of an individual and the accepted standards of his society come into conflict. When a man believes that, in order to act in good conscience, he must do what is condemned by the great majority of his fellow citizens and by the laws of his state, he faces an agonizing dilemma. He recognizes a general obligation to obey the law, but he is deeply convinced (rightly or wrongly) that he has a more compelling moral obligation to refrain from doing what the law commands. If the law is clear and offers no alternatives, and his principles are clear and admit of no exceptions, he must (unless he leaves the community altogether) either act lawfully and not conscientiously, or conscientiously and not lawfully.

To avoid forcing such dilemmas upon good and law-abiding, but eccentric, citizens many modern governments introduce conscientious objection clauses into some legislation, most notably into laws which conscript citizens for military service. It is a mark of sophistication and self-restraint that governments provide such lawful alternatives. Conscientious objection clauses are tacit admissions that war, as an instrument of national policy, is at least morally questionable. They are explicit recognitions that in matters of life and death strong moral convictions may oblige good men to defy their own governments, and they are concrete manifestations of respect for individuals and for the honest and deeply felt moral positions they may hold.

Conscientious objection to military conscription in the United States today is governed by the Military Selective Service Act of 1967. Section 6 (j) of that act reads:

Nothing contained in this title shall be construed to require any person to be subject to combatant training and service in the armed forces of the United States who, by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form. As used in this subsection, the term "religious training and belief" does not include essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views, or a merely personal moral code. . . .

I put aside for the present the requirement here imposed that conscientious objection be "by reason of religious training and belief." It is an unjust requirement, favoring those who profess religious beliefs over those who do not, and the Supreme Court has partly recognized this by expanding (in U.S. v. Seeger 380 US 163) the concept of religious belief as widely as possible.

The more immediate concern of many Americans today is the requirement that those who would invoke the protection of this subsection must be "conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form." This means, in practice, that only thoroughgoing pacifists may qualify. One who would gladly fight for his country under some circumstances, but who will not do so when he honestly believes the war in progress is unjust, is disqualified. Our law does not recognize what is frequently the case: deeply conscientious objection to a particular war.

No one can deny that moral principles with differing contents, differing degrees of generality, and differing claims of absoluteness may be held and practiced by different persons with equal conscientiousness. A man may believe that he must never, under any circumstances, do a certain thing; or he may believe that he must not do such a thing except under certain rare and compelling circumstances. In either case he may be wholly conscientious. And it is conscientious objection which, in theory, the law aims to respect.

The requirement, therefore, that to qualify as a conscientious objector one must be opposed to war in any form is gravely unjust. It discriminates among citizens, regarding their qualification for an established legal protection, on the basis of the content of their moral principles. But conscientiousness cannot depend upon the content or the sweep of the principle that one is upholding.

The question of whether or not citizens have a natural right to conscientious objection does not arise here; conscientious action is protected by statute. As a matter of justice, this protection of the law should be extended to all who are conscientiously opposed to military service, and not reserved for some only, because of their special beliefs. The law should be amended so as to recognize conscientious objection to a particular war or kind of war.

The refusal to recognize conscientious objection to particular wars is unwise as well as unjust. The world being as confusing as it is, and human affairs as complex as they are, principles of the form "Always do . . ." or "Never do . . ." are almost sure to lead to error through oversimplification; while principles of a more limited scope, though also uncertain, have a far better chance of approximating the truth. We do well, therefore, to credit the conscientious man with limited principles, rather than to discredit him because his principles are limited.

Such limitation, after all, is the normal product of rational reflection and analysis. We do not find fault with the criminal law because it punishes many forms of violence but excuses violence resorted to in self-defense. We do not say: "If the law were really moral it would punish all violence or none at all." We dismiss sweeping generalizations of that sort as naive, crude, inadequate to deal with the complexity of human activity. Similarly, in matters of national conduct, we do not say to another country—e.g., Great Britain—that to be moral, or to be conscientious, it must fight whenever offended, or forgo all resort to war. We honor the British for their battles against the Kaiser and the Third Reich, but condemn their imperialistic wars under King George III, their naval war of 1812, and their recent military adventures in Suez. So others may look at us, and so we may look at ourselves.

The same reasonableness and willingness to make essential discriminations must be employed in appraising the character and conduct of individuals. It is absurd to demand of individuals that the principles they employ be of universal scope, when the laws, nations and individuals we most respect are always making careful distinctions in the application of moral principles.

Note that those who refuse to allow conscientious objection to a particular war, but permit it to all war, admit the competence of the individual to judge the morality of a means (war, killing, etc.) but not his competence to judge the morality of an end (dictatorship, democracy, national power, etc.). To put this more exactly, while they may think the conscientious objector gravely mistaken in his judgments, they are prepared to honor the conscientiousness of those judgments when expressed about means, but not when expressed about ends. Therefore, when reflecting about the conduct of his country, the citizen is obliged (on their view) to apply his principles without regard to the objectives sought. He is not permitted effectively to ask, "Is this means justified by this end?" He is permitted to say "I never kill," and (if he says that truly) he will be excused. But let him once admit that under certain circumstances he will kill, it must then be presumed that he is not able to judge where or when it is appropriate for him to do so in matters of national concern.

Even if the reasons given for this presumption were good, it would be important to recognize the unhappy consequences of proceeding as we do. By compelling the citizen to accept or reject certain means (i.e., war) in the sphere of his own nation's conduct, without exception, we punish, in effect, his effort to draw morally essential discriminations. We refuse any citizen the opportunity to weigh ends and means together, as one must if he is to make refined and sensitive moral judgments, whether of his own acts or of another's. This refusal invites, sometimes forces, that very disparity of ends and means which is so disastrous in social affairs, and which we so vehemently and rightly condemn in the conduct of other nations.

I do not claim here that all conscientious objection, or all conscientious objection to a particular war, is objectively right or justifiable; I am not sure how that objective rightness (or wrongness) is to be determined. But I do insist that conscientious objection to a particular war may be as right and as justifiable as the conscientious objection we now permit. Moreover, since conscientious objection of the more specific sort involves the reflective consideration of means and ends, it is more likely, rather than less likely, to be the outcome of an intelligent and reliable moral judgment. And in any event, the opportunity to weigh ends as well as means certainly does not keep the objector from being fully and profoundly conscientious.

Why has conscientious objection to a specific war been refused a hearing? I cannot be certain what the actual considerations motivating that refusal have been, but the reasons commonly given for it do not stand up on careful examination.

(1) To permit conscientious objection to a particular war would be to commit national suicide. War is a matter of life or death for the nation; if individual citizens were permitted to object on grounds of personal convictions, the danger to all would be too great to tolerate.

This objection derives superficial plausibility from the truth that war is sometimes a matter of national life or death; when at war a nation is in great danger. But the claim that permitting conscientious objection to a given war will significantly increase that danger cannot be substantiated and is almost certainly false. When a nation goes to war, for whatever cause, the vast majority of its citizens rally to its flag. The number who have refused to fight on grounds of conscience has historically been very small; even if the category of conscientious objectors were widened as I propose, there is every reason to believe that the number who would openly hold their nation to be morally wrong would constitute no significant threat to national safety. Even the present war in Vietnam—for which there is more moral repugnance and articulate objection than for any previous war in American history—would bring forth only a small minority who, when called to serve, would refuse on grounds of conscience. This objection grossly underestimates the passion of our citizens (and that of the citizens of most countries) for their national welfare, and their general readiness to respond, particularly in times of crisis, to the requests of their elected leaders.

From a strictly military point of view, moreover, the elimination from the armed services of those who believe that a particular war is wrong would be a measure increasing safety, not risk. If fighting in that war offends against their deepest moral principles, such objectors would make poor soldiers. The number of persons involved is not likely to shake national security one way or the other, but if degree of military risk is the chief consideration, that risk is likely to be lowest if the prosecution of such a war in no way depends upon would-be conscientious objectors.

(2) To permit conscientious objection to a particular war (even if doing so does not increase risk) is wholly unreasonable because it gives too much authority to the individual. In a law-governed community individual citizens cannot be allowed to decide for themselves whether fighting in a given war is or is not in accord with their moral principles.

This objection is profoundly mistaken, but it is commonly voiced, and even more commonly given tacit or indirect support. Why is it so widely believed that it is somehow wrong or improper to recognize in each citizen the right to decide for himself whether his nation's cause (or conduct) is just? In part it is an irrational consequence of blind love for fatherland, and unreasoned deference to those in authority. But where this objection is given some rational support, it usually takes the form of one or more of three principles, often unclearly formulated, each of which is itself mistaken, though possessing a germ of truth.

(a) Once the majority (or its instrument) has spoken, the nation acts; the individual citizen may not refuse to go along with these decisions and acts.

There is some truth here. The citizen does have an obligation to abide by the decisions of the body politic, especially in a democracy where he had at least a right to participate in making those decisions. But it is not necessarily the case that this obligation to go along with the lawful decisions of his community overrides all other obligations he may have. He may have a yet more compelling obligation to refuse to abide by the decision of the majority if, after careful reflection, he concludes that it calls for conduct which to him is morally intolerable.

(b) The conflict of moral obligation with national loyalty does not arise in this country. Conscientious objection to a particular war is unnecessary in a country which is never wrong, and never acts immorally.

This supposition, that Americans (or the citizens of one's own nation, whichever it may be) are made of nobler, finer stuff than the rest of humanity, and that somehow our national acts exhibit a purity and integrity that cannot reasonably be questioned, is terribly naive; because it blinds us to the serious mistakes we do make on occasion and hinders our efforts to correct them, it is also extremely dangerous.

(c) Our nation may, on rare occasion, act wrongly, perhaps immorally. But it is never within the competence of an individual citizen to determine that error, or to guide his conduct on the basis of such a finding, in opposition to his lawful government.

If not individuals, who then may detect our moral wrongs—the gods alone? Individual citizens not only may but must pass judgment upon the acts of their government. There is too much likelihood that they will be strongly biased in favor of their own, that they will give every benefit of doubt or interpretation to their leaders, and where a wrong is evident, that they will judge too leniently. But judge they must. Of course no man is competent to decide such questions for another, or for all, and here lies the apparent plausibility of this third principle. When the community must act, and must judge its own acts, no single citizen may presume to act or judge for it. But if, in spite of all the considerations of loyalty and private interest which must dispose him to side with his government, the individual citizen is constrained to conclude that it is behaving with gross immorality, it is surely his duty to act in accord with that judgment, recognizing that he speaks only for himself, and that he may be in error.

The danger, in short, lies not in giving too much authority to the individual but in giving him too little. In matters of deep moral principle nobody can relieve the individual of his responsibility to exercise his moral judgment; all that the state can do is make it harder or easier for him to act in accord with that judgment. Present provisions for conscientious objectors are commendable insofar as they do ease that task for some; it remains to recognize in law the truly conscientious objection of others.

(3) To permit conscientious objection to a particular war (even if it were clearly just to do so) is simply not practical. To give each citizen the privilege of opting out when the situation becomes dangerous or critical is to invite chaos.

The plausibility of this objection depends wholly upon the supposition that being a conscientious objector to a particular war is merely a matter of "opting out." This is not so. Whoever claims to be a conscientious objector must make specific application for that status, must undergo intense, thorough examination by the classifying agency. He must show convincingly, through his own testimony and that of his teachers or associates, that the moral scruples he professes are in fact part of his conscientiously held position. The status of conscientious objector is very far indeed from being a matter of simple option; it will be allowed only after a serious claim has been carefully documented and its truth solidly established.

Making such determinations, by Selective Service boards or equivalent agencies, will involve the expenditure of some time and energy. There may be some additional administrative complexities, and some small additional expense. But the trouble and expense are insignificant when contrasted with the moral good this policy would accomplish. Even were that resulting expense and inconvenience great (which is very unlikely) considerations of justice would oblige us to undertake the effort to identify conscientious objectors without discriminating as to the sweep or content of their moral views.

(4) If conscientious objection to a particular war were permissible, the difficulty of determining the legitimacy of any particular application for that status would be so great as to encourage fakery. In consequence, many would simply lie their way out of military service.

These predictions are very probably false, and they are based upon an assumption that is certainly false. The assumption is that, because moral matters are at issue, it is practically impossible to determine the legitimacy of a claim of conscientious objection. In reality, however, although the claims made are about moral views of which the truth is difficult to determine, the claims themselves are plainly factual, and can be thoroughly scrutinized and carefully tested. What has to be decided by the classifying agency is not the correctness of the moral convictions of the applicant but the objective truth or falsity of his claim that those are his convictions, and that the case at hand is a legitimate and necessary application of them. Even the objective facts about the war (insofar as these can be determined) are not the basic issue but rather the objector's conscientiously determined understanding of those facts.

On such matters it is practically impossible to lie so consistently and convincingly as to deceive an experienced board of examiners. Under present regulations, the danger of fakery is practically nil; were conscientiousness to be understood in the larger and more just way that I propose, the number of conscientious objectors might increase somewhat, but the danger of fakery need not increase at all. The social pressure inevitably applied against every conscientious objector would effectively keep the devious and the cowardly from even seeking that avenue of escape from military service.

Finally, even if it were true that with an enlarged conception of conscientious objection a few were to escape military service by deception who otherwise would not be able to do so, that is a price that can be paid by a society whose first concern is the humanity and justice of its laws. In the criminal courts we apply rules of evidence and procedure which may result in some who are guilty being acquitted, and we do so recognizing this consequence because such rules are essential for the protection of the innocent. To achieve that protection it is necessary that we develop considerable self-restraint in the trial of all persons accused of crime, and it is altogether right and a tribute to our society that we do this. In the context of military conscription, although the issue is not guilt or punishment, the same circumspection is called for. If we are obliged to raise an army by conscripting young citizens, we ought to apply rules and procedures which (although conceivably usable by very artful liars for selfish advantage) are designed to insure the protection and equal treatment of all those whose objections are genuinely conscientious.

The objections to the practicality and desirability of legislation permitting conscientious objection to a particular war are all very weak, and the reasons for its enactment are compelling. There is yet another consideration, however, beyond those already discussed, which weighs heavily in support of this proposed policy. Formally adopted, it would serve as a safety device, not simply for individuals but for the nation as a whole. War is so grave a matter, so thoroughly awful, that every nation needs, and ought to cultivate, the conscientious reflection of its individual citizens upon national conduct having such frightful consequences. Legislation which makes it possible for citizens, in their private capacities, to refuse participation in what honestly appears to them to be recklessness or irresponsibility on the part of their government could become a very wholesome restraint upon the impetuosity of some political leaders. Where there is the possibility that such conscientious objection may be widespread, it may even help to prevent grave international crimes by honorably motivated but narrow-minded or irrational leaders.

That is the really crushing answer to those who say: "If we permit conscientious objection to a particular war, so many may refuse to fight as to endanger the nation." The danger is nil if the nation's cause is just; its citizens will not fail it in time of crisis. But if large masses of citizens cannot conscientiously pursue the nation's course, at least through killing or force of arms, that may be the best of reasons for not engaging in that war, even at the cost of some temporary national loss of face.

Leo Tolstoy wrote, in The Kingdom of God Is Within You (1893):

In early Christian times a soldier, Theodore, told the authorities that being a Christian he could not bear arms, and when he was executed for this the responsible authorities quite sincerely regarded him as a madman and far from trying to conceal such an occurrence, exposed him to public scorn at the execution. But now when cases of refusals of military service occur more and more frequently, these cases are no longer regarded by the authorities as madness, but as a very dangerous awakening from madness, and the governments, far from holding such cases up to public scorn, carefully conceal them, knowing that the salvation of men from humiliation, enslavement and ignorance, will come about not by revolutions, trade-unions, peace-congresses, and books, but in the simplest way—by each man who is called upon to share in the infliction of violence on his fellow men and on himself, asking in perplexity: "But why should I do this?"

A national policy of permitting conscientious objection to military conscription in a given war would be not only eminently just and entirely practical but exceedingly wise. A nation allowing itself to be restrained by such considerations, tempered in its acts by the conscientious concerns of its individual citizens, acquires thereby a deeper and more long-lasting power than any military force can provide.

Black Panthers: The Cornered Cats

MICHAEL HARRIS

Mr. Harris is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

Huey P. Newton, 26, the militant black nationalist who founded the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, is charged with the murder of an Oakland policeman, and what amazes most of the white community is the persistent demand that Newton be freed from jail immediately and without trial. Newton's supporters do not concede that he is guilty as charged of slaying John Frey, a white policeman, in a pre-dawn gun battle last October 28. But for many, the question of guilt or innocence is irrelevant.

Stokely Carmichael said last February at a rally attended by 5,000 in the Oakland Auditorium Arena: "Brother Huey may or may not have wiped out that honkie, but at least it shows a progression. At least we're not getting (executed) for what we say. We're getting (executed) for what we do. When they (executed) Brother Malcolm, we did nothing. If they (execute) Brother Huey we got to retaliate! We got to retaliate!"

The lines had been drawn between the Black Panthers and the Oakland police long before Patrolman Frey saw a suspicious vehicle and radioed the Oakland police dispatcher: "I have a Panther car." For many months Police Chief Charles R. Gain of Oakland had been describing all Panthers as "criminals" and the Panthers had invariably referred to the police as "the pigs." The Panthers are young, they are armed and they are ready, as they have demonstrated, to claim the freedom and manhood they say has been taken from them. Their name, the leaders explain, is intended to be taken symbolically: "The Black Panther doesn't go looking for trouble. But if you corner him and he has to fight, he'll claw you apart."

Though the general public has known of the movement for more than a year, no one yet has offered an accurate estimate of its size. It seems, like so many revolutionary groups, to be rather small. Even the most sheltered residents of Oakland, Berkeley and San Francisco encounter people, white and black, wearing buttons that read, "Free Huey Newton Now," but few of the wearers are Panthers.

Charles Howe of the San Francisco Chronicle, who recently completed a thoughtful study of the Panthers, summarized the organization's goals:

In essence, they are asking for:

Total self-determination; full employment; removal of all white businesses from the ghetto; decent housing; education which teaches black history and "the true nature of this decadent American society. . . ."

Military exemption for all blacks; an end to "police brutality and murder [and] freedom for all black men held in federal, state, county and city prisons and jails"; trial of all blacks by a jury of their peers—that is, poor and black ghetto residents; "We want land, bread, housing, education, clothing, justice and peace."

The Panthers maintain they and the black community have little or none of these things and they want them right now. No lengthy dialogues; no additional statutes on the books; no committees of review; but right now. And if they don't get these things right now, they maintain, the white power structure, by fudging on these requests, will provoke rioting and bloodshed which will, they believe, lead to bloody repression which, in turn, could lead to the liquidation of all black Americans.

This is a frightening program, frightening to the blacks who don't want to be liquidated and frightening to the police who are flabbergasted by the notion that all black men should be exempt from jail. The Panthers claim that they must arm themselves to keep from being gunned down, and the police, white and black, approach them with understandable caution. So it came as no great surprise that the encounter last fall between Newton and the police ended with a man dead in the street.

The minutes of the Alameda County Grand Jury, which meets in the county courthouse in Oakland, report that after Frey made his radio call the police dispatcher sent orders to Patrolman Herbert Heanes to go to the scene as "back-up officer." The jury was told that Newton presented Frey with a borrowed driver's license when he was asked to identify himself, but that Heanes recognized the Panther leader. Newton was ordered out of his car, and then the shooting erupted. Frey was fatally wounded, and Heanes was injured seriously.

There are conflicting reports about what happened in those moments, and Newton's supporters say there was never any proof that he had a gun in his hand. Heanes, the surviving officer, testified that he did not see Newton holding a gun at any time. But according to the grand jury's report, the wounded Newton hailed a black motorist, pulled a gun on him, forced the man to drive to a hospital and bragged, "I just shot two dudes."

A jury of twelve Alameda County men and women will be charged, probably this summer, with the duty of listening to the conflicting stories and deciding where the truth lies. The murder trial has been postponed several times, but there is a reasonable chance that the process of picking jurors, hearing testimony and reaching a verdict will begin on July 8. However, while all of that may settle the fate of Huey Newton, the political arguments will roll on. Charles R. Garry, lawyer for the Panthers, is attempting to make legal history by challenging the right of a grand jury composed almost entirely of upper-middle-class whites to vote indictments on poor blacks.

A lawyer faced with the duty of saving his client's life and, if possible, restoring his liberty must work within the legal forms. On the other hand, the Black Panthers regard the legal forms themselves as part of the enemy apparatus, as straps holding the black community in a state of colonialism. The Panthers look upon the entry of any policeman, white or black, into the ghetto as an act of invasion, and maintain that officers who make such forays do so at their peril. The ghetto dweller has the right to repel the white establishment's policemen, so the argument goes, in the same way that any citizen has the right to fight off a foreign invader. In Newton's words, the police are to be classed as "an army of occupation."

It is a startling concept, and the Huey Newton case is only one of a series of episodes in which the Black Panthers have nonplused the public. The first came on February 21, 1967, when twenty Panthers, armed with pistols and shotguns (carried openly, as required by law) met the widow of Malcolm X at San Francisco International Airport and escorted her through the crowded terminal. No one was hurt, but many were frightened, and some of the most fervent defenders of the constitutional right to bear arms underwent instant conversion to the side of gun control.

Nor did the members of the California state legislature admire the graphic symbolism of the appearance in the Assembly chambers, during a debate on gun control on May 2, 1967, of twenty-six Black Panthers armed with rifles, shotguns and pistols. Legislators scuttled under desks or attempted to flee, and calm was not restored until capitol security officers had seized the weapons and removed the ammunition. The guns were then restored to the Panthers, who trooped out of the building. There was no gunfire, and there was also no doubt as to what the legislature would do about the proposal of the Oakland police to restrict the carrying of loaded weapons within city limits. A new bill was passed, and promptly signed by Governor Reagan.

It was not Newton but Bobby Seale, 31, who led the state capitol invasion. Seale is the Panthers' second in command, in charge of day-to-day party activities while the leader is in jail, and he told Charles Howe that he had not slept at home since the night of January 25 when police walked into his apartment and arrested him and his wife on charges of possessing a sawed-off shotgun. Seale is almost always on the move, showing up at rallies and then disappearing for the night to places where he hopes the police cannot find him.

Bobby Seale is protected by bodyguards and is still alive, but Bobby James Hutton, 17, the party's secretary, is not. He was shot and killed on the night of April 7 by Oakland police, following a running gun battle. Eldridge Cleaver, author of the recently published Soul on Ice [see review by Julian Mayfield, The Nation, May 13], and the party's minister of information, was wounded. Cleaver and seven other Panthers were indicted for attempted murder and assault with a deadly weapon.

Again, there are two versions of the story. Oakland police say that several Panthers have confessed that the officers were lured into an ambush. Police say that the bloodshed began when two patrolmen were shot in the back with shotguns when they stopped to investigate a man crouched behind a parked car. According to the authorities other blacks started firing, and when some ran into a nearby house a ninety-minute gun battle commenced. Officers fired tear gas into the house and set the building on fire, forcing Hutton and Cleaver to leave with their hands over their heads. Police say they held their fire until Hutton broke for freedom.

The Black Panther Defense Fund has issued an account of the events, accusing the police of plotting the battle and of deliberately shooting Hutton when he stepped into a police searchlight. Cleaver, more cautious than Hutton, reportedly emerged naked from the house in order to deprive police of the pretext that he was carrying concealed weapons. He was not injured seriously, nor was either of the two policemen.

It will take some time to sort out the facts about Hutton's death, since it is easy to find witnesses who will relate either version of the story. But there is no doubt that the April 6 gun battle brought a profound change to the Black Panthers. Since then the party has been short of leaders and short of money.

Howe interviewed an agent who penetrated the Black Panthers for a law-enforcement organization. The man concluded, not surprisingly, that the party's ability to screen out potential spies was "not the best." He characterized the men's marksmanship as poor, the quality and quantity of their weapons as inadequate and the financial burdens of replacing lost weapons, raising bail fees and paying legal costs as backbreaking. On April 6 alone, police said they seized three shotguns, five rifles, three automatic rifles and two automatic pistols.

"The night of the shoot-out the Panthers behaved rather badly," the agent said. "They broke and ran and left guns and ammunition scattered over half of West Oakland. This doesn't mean they are cowardly. It does mean that they've had no training and, like most people everywhere, they really don't care much to get killed—or even shoot at police."

None of this should lead anyone, the agent continued, to hope that the Black Panthers will simply vanish. "If conditions get rougher in the ghetto—any ghetto—they're going to get more recruits. Then a hard-core element may escalate the gun business again. If the federal government, on the other hand, makes a serious effort to pump lots of money into the ghetto, you can likely kiss the Panthers, good-bye. You simply can't agitate happy people."

Newton and Seale might, according to the old tradition, have joined the "happy people" themselves. They met as students at Merritt College, a two-year institution in Oakland, from which many graduates proceed to more advanced study at the University of California or a state college. Newton saw, from the example of an older brother who acquired the education he needed to become a welfare department supervisor, that study could bring some rewards. But Newton, who said he became bored with the "cultural nationalism" of black clubs organized by the Negro minority on the campus, was arrested for theft and burglary. In 1964 he was sentenced to a year in county jail for assault with a deadly weapon. Quite proudly, he was a troublemaker in jail, leading riots and food strikes.

When he was released from jail, he and Seale founded their Black Panther Party, taking the name and symbol from the Lowndes County Freedom Organization in Alabama.

Politically, the Black Panthers have allied themselves with the Peace and Freedom Party and have, it appears, achieved a veto power over the larger organization. The Peace and Freedom Party has offered a startling variety of candidates for office. Among them are Mario Savio, who started the "free speech" revolt at Berkeley and who is now running for the state Senate, and Cleaver's wife, Kathleen, competing for the assembly seat of Willie L. Brown, Jr., a talented Negro liberal who has won two terms in a San Francisco district that is believed to be only 26 per cent black. Radicals don't like liberals. Perhaps the most conventional Peace and Freedom Party candidate is its nominee for the U.S. Senate, old-line radical Paul Jacobs who writes books, appears on television, and is invited to parties at the best homes.

For all the excitement, the Black Panthers seem to be a dead-end movement, growing out of the frustrations of life in Oakland, an industrial community on the east shore of San Francisco Bay where few neighborhoods, white or black, are designed to inspire man's soul. It is a town on which the conservative establishment has long maintained a hold, and its slums have produced a force of young men willing to take arms because they are bereft of hope.

The Panthers offer the recruits no "promised land." There is no talk of a return to Africa nor even of a plan to carve out major parts of the United States as a black dominion. "Talk of such things at this time is irrelevant and romantic," Huey Newton said. "We don't want to organize all the blacks. We want to be a vanguard. When the time comes and we are organized, black people will petition the United Nations to hold a plebiscite to see what it is we want and where it is we want to go."

Thus, the most that can be held out is the prospect of still more futile gestures, in the style of the gun-brandishing episodes at the airport and in the capitol—dramatic scenes that produce brief moments of excitement and considerable publicity, but which also assure the Panthers that their movement will some day be crushed. The Panthers, who will not accept whites into their ranks, have won some white cheering on the side lines and a little white financial support. But there is, as Murray Kempton wrote after a visit to Oakland, "something quite disgusting about white kids moved by the high romance of Negro kids getting themselves killed."

JOHNSON'S PLOY

FLIGHT OF THE LAME DUCK

DONALD L. ROBINSON

Mr. Robinson is assistant professor of government at Smith College.

Though Mr. Johnson's decision to withdraw from the Presidency has placed the nation in a perilous position, the dangers of the move have not been properly appreciated in this year of clamorous events.

The central significance of the event derives from the fact that the most powerful nation in the world is now governed, particularly in its foreign affairs, by a man who has placed himself beyond the reach of political accountability. In domestic affairs, the President's power is still considerably hemmed in by a political system that rolls on with a structure and momentum of its own. Congress freely defies a man whose power to affect the fortunes of committee chairmen, or even first-termers, has long since been spent. The bureaucracy pursues its stubborn course, dealing with its clients in the old ways. Domestically, the effect of Mr. Johnson's withdrawal is to deprive the political system of leadership at a time when it needs it most. But we need not fear that a lame-duck President can successfully embark on new adventures for which there is no clear public support.

In foreign affairs, the situation is ominously different; the President's decision appears to have given him a virtually free hand. And when we say foreign affairs in 1968, we mean Vietnam.

Mr. Johnson's decision was hailed at first as an act of courage. An extremely ambitious man had sacrificed his own intense hunger for power to the greater goal of reuniting his divided country. The act was so uncharacteristic that some refused to believe that he was sincere. The President had long been known for cunning; perhaps what he intended was to call the wolves off his back, press hard for some kind of temporary détente in Vietnam, then take the convention in August—and the election in November—by storm.

Bill D. Moyers, who could be supposed to know, spiked this speculation with the assertion that Mr. Johnson really was concerned about the divisions in the country and knew that any eleventh-hour re-entry into the political arena would provoke a shattering reaction. The President's concern about his country was too great for any such strategy of personal gain. He would lose all that he had won by his withdrawal, and more.

But there was more to it than this. Perhaps Mr. Johnson had sacrificed himself, but for what? He himself said that he had acted to restore domestic tranquillity, but Howard K. Smith, commenting on A.B.C. TV, was closer to the truth when he argued that the President had maneuvered, not for peace at home but for power abroad.

Mr. Johnson knew that Senator McCarthy's showing in New Hampshire, as well as numerous other signs, signaled that his chances for renomination and re-election were far from certain. He would have absolutely no chance of winning unless he campaigned fiercely, and his standing with the public was such as to make campaigning awkward. Even then, his re-election would be in such jeopardy that his policies, particularly his policy in Vietnam, would stand suspended until the verdict was in—suspended, that is, as far as their viability was concerned. Their costs would continue to mount, thereby increasing the difficulty of selling them to the American people. So Mr. Johnson did what he had to do to save his policies. He removed himself from the contest.

Indeed, the President acknowledged that he had acted to place himself beyond the reach of public "pressure." "I made my announcement," he told a group of administrative assistants to Democratic Congressmen, so that "no one in the world—no one who sought our treasure or tried to stall freedom—could have any doubt that any person in this country—candidate or noncandidate—could effectively pressure this President and his actions for at least the next nine months." He hoped, he said, that his decision would remove him "from the nose cone of a volcano," so that he could "act independently and with complete liberty, with only one criteria [sic], the great good for the greatest number."

The notion is staggering, when you stop to think about it. Why, in a democracy, should a political leader be permitted to "act independently and with complete liberty"? Perhaps, in a moment of great crisis, a leader deeply trusted by his people might be granted such prerogative. But Mr. Johnson as much as acknowledged that he had been forced to abdicate by the pressure of public mistrust and suspicion.

Plainly, the President's move was a monumental gamble for nine months' time to redeem his policies in Vietnam. To pull it off, he needed two things: a dramatic change in the public mood and attitude toward him, and the cooperation of the other candidates for President. Initially, at least, he got both. The effect of the renunciation on his rating in the Gallup polls was striking. In mid-March, before the announcement of withdrawal, only 36 per cent of the Gallup sample approved of the way Mr. Johnson was "handling his job," while 52 per cent disapproved. Two weeks after the announcement, nearly half (49 per cent) approved, while the disapprovers had fallen off to 40 per cent. A whopping 64 per cent said they approved of "President Johnson's decision to stop [sic] the bombing of North Vietnam." (The way that question is phrased is as significant as the answers it produced.) One suspects, too, that the intensity of public concern over Johnson's performance had fallen off sharply—and if so, that would be even more significant than the reversal in the ratio of approvers to disapprovers.

Gallup's interviewers recorded that the "man in the street" reflected Mr. Johnson's own feeling about his decision. "I think it's a wonderful thing he did for the country. He prevented bitter controversy," said a retired schoolteacher from New Jersey. "He is rising above political considerations," remarked a student from North Carolina. Only 4 per cent attributed the President's withdrawal to a political motive.

Soon it was apparent that the main opponents of his policies would likewise follow his lead, diverting their attention and energies from Vietnam to the circus of the Presidential campaign, and to the innumerable other circuses offered by springtime in Paris and at Columbia and elsewhere. Kennedy told a news conference, "I think Vietnam eventually is going to disappear," and he urged that attention be given to the longer-range problem of economic development in Latin America and Africa.* Nixon declared a moratorium on discussions about Vietnam, to allow time for the President's diplomacy to be tried. Rockefeller rebuked Nixon for the suggestion of a moratorium, but his own speech on Vietnam was so banal as to go almost unnoticed. Even McCarthy seemed to prefer other themes in his quest for delegates. And when the candidates discussed Vietnam, the focus of the discussion was on changes that would come to pass next January and beyond, not on the urgent necessity to change courses now. Vietnam became the nightmare everyone wanted to postpone, if not forget altogether.

Gradually, however, it is becoming apparent that it is the political campaign itself that has assumed a dream-like quality. Reports from Vietnam recently confronted a startled public with the unwanted news that more men had died in the middle two weeks of May than in any previous fourteen-day period of the war. What had earlier been referred to as a "pause" in the bombing turned out to be nothing of the kind. Measured in terms of the number of missions flown, or tons of bombs dropped, or planes and pilots lost, the pace of the air war was virtually undiminished. It had merely been confined to a strategically more critical area, the North Vietnamese panhandle. In almost every way, the "level of violence" in Vietnam was increasing, not subsiding.

*Since this was written, the "circus" of the Presidential campaign has produced the ghastly accident of Senator Kennedy's assassination. Kennedy's death may focus renewed attention on the relationship between the violence in Vietnam and the malaise at home. But the concern of this article—that the conduct of foreign policy by a lame-duck President is not politically accountable—is not affected by the assassination.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

"How Are the Peace—Bombs Away—Talks Going, Averell?"

These facts help to put the President's decision, and the public's reaction to it, into revealing perspective. By withdrawing from the campaign, the President sought to place himself beyond the reach of politics, a process for which he seems to have such contempt these days. The public appears, initially at least, to have acquiesced in this desire. The result is that our military and diplomatic operations over Vietnam are being pursued by a man who is acting "independently and with complete liberty," using his own judgment, which the American people have grown so profoundly to mistrust. And all of this in a political system which prides itself on the accountability of its elected leaders, especially the President.

Mr. Johnson believes, with a passion that is more nearly religious than political, that his policies in Vietnam are right. He is willing to sacrifice a great deal that is dear to him, including his own political career, to the realization of those policies. He has bargained for a nine-month period in which to secure those policies, and to create an atmosphere conducive to the election of his chosen successor. The irony is that a man who was thought to be crudely and totally political has reached for a transpolitical way to secure his policies.

For a time at the beginning of the current year, it appeared that the American people were beginning to view the nation's involvement in Vietnam as "ironic," in the sense in which Reinhold Niebuhr used that term fifteen years ago. That is, we had become engaged in Vietnam out of desire to permit an alternative to communism to develop there, but we were beginning to see that our good intentions were overextended, that we lacked the strength and understanding to accomplish our good purposes. Once irony is recognized, it cannot be endured, and so we were beginning to search for men who could lead us out of our mistaken course.

President Johnson has sought to restore our sense of the tragic with respect to Vietnam. To him, it seems that our good purposes are perfectly capable of achievement, if only we are willing to pay the price. But a leader who tries to transform his nation's ironies into tragedies by the exercise of his own monumental will can only drive his people to catastrophe.

Max Ascoli has argued that the President withdrew in order to recover his consensus, but that in doing so, he gave up his power. In the light of the analysis here, that seems a curious conclusion. Clearly the President has gained freedom for maneuver during the months remaining to his term. Yet in a deeper sense, Ascoli is right. To accomplish his purposes in Vietnam will surely take more than nine months. Unless he plans to bomb North Vietnam back to the stone age, or to hold up a shield while his Vice President, or Mr. Nixon, moves into the White House, there to pursue the same policies for four more years, it is difficult to see what he expects to gain this year.

Surely he cannot defeat the Communists by several more weeks of the war of attrition he has been waging for four years. Nor can he convince Hanoi's negotiators in Paris to agree, this summer, to a division of their country before they have been wiped out on the battlefield. The only way to gain the stated American objectives in Vietnam is to wage a long, gray war, and the only way to do that—assuming for the moment that such a war would win its objective, and that the cost would be acceptable—would be to have the strong support of the American people. And the only way, finally, to get that kind of support is at the polls, after a grueling and forthright campaign that convinced the people that their "blood, toil, tears and sweat" were being shed in a worthy cause.

From this point of view, the President's withdrawal is properly seen, not as an act of political courage but as one of out-and-out cowardice. He urges Congress to "bite the bullet" on taxes, but he himself refuses to face the American people for a referendum on the main policies of his own Administration. The situation created by Johnson exposes a grave flaw in our constitutional "machinery."

The American Constitution is an arrangement for establishing government accountable to the people it governs. The mechanisms by which the people express their consent are imperfect and irregular, as all students of American Government know. Still, the national government exercises few powers that are not "checked," at least by the clientele of the government's policy.

The one major exception is foreign affairs. Here, the objects of the policy have no votes, and no regular or reliable access to the newspapers read by voters. Furthermore, foreign policy is conducted almost exclusively by the Executive branch, and its exercise is effectively judged by the people only on those occasions when the policies go so badly awry that an international crisis erupts, or the country is threatened by war. Even in those cases, the referendum of the public is retroactive, and the verdict on any particular issue tends to be lost in a welter of other concerns.

The fact that the exercise of public authority in the United States breaks down almost completely in the area of foreign affairs is an extremely serious matter, as the current situation makes obvious. It is serious for those who support our stand against communism in Asia and want broad public support for that stand, as well as for those who feel differently.

LETTERS (Continued from page 2)

ing out to the power structure." People influenced by Erikson (like myself) are accused of "making life a lot tougher," presumably because they do not see that all opposition by youth to adults is beyond criticism. Certainly Brossard is not making things tougher; he is making them ridiculously easy. With such uncritical friends young people don't need enemies.

Brossard charges Erikson with being only "rhetorically" engaged with young people. In fact, he has spent much of his life in therapeutic work with them. What are Brossard's credentials for speaking with such righteous assurance about the inner feelings of young people? For that matter a rhetorician who can write without a wince of "operational co-optimism" has dubious credentials for complaining of Erikson's style on the irrelevant ground that it is "bad poetry."

Cushing Strout, Dept. of English
Cornell University

Williamstown, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Human nature being what it is. The Nation's invaluable contributions to enlightenment over many years seldom elicit letters of praise. All readers have long taken this for granted. But when The Nation errs, protest is in order lest the error be repeated.

In the issue of June 3, two "reviewers" have insulted two of the major thinkers and writers of our days: James T. Farrell ("James T. Farrell: An Impossible Comeback" by Peter Clecak) and Erik H. Erikson. The former is one of America's great novelists of the century. The latter is one of the outstanding psychologists and psychiatrists of our time. I know all of their works and have used them frequently in my own teaching, thinking, and writing over many years. Both "reviews" are travesties. Apologies are due to both writers and to all readers.

Frederick L. Schuman
Woodrow Wilson Professor of Government
Williams College

word to the wise

Concord, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Those in Congress who are vigorous in porting or opposing controversial, explosive issues could be the next target for the assassin's bullets . . . If Congress would pass the required gun control legislation, the lives they could save may be their own.

Meldon C. Belknap

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Onlooker and the Insider

THE SEPARATED PEOPLE: A Look At Contemporary South Africa. By E. J. Kahn, Jr. W. W. Norton & Co. 276 pp. $5.95.

THE LONG VIEW. By Alan Paton. Edited by Edward Callan. Frederick A. Praeger. 295 pp. $6.95.

NADINE GORDIMER

Miss Gordimer is a South African novelist. Her most recent book is The Late Bourgeois World (Viking).

It is the proud boast of most serious investigators of the South African scene—politicians, legal experts, distinguished journalists, visiting us from abroad—that they come “with an open mind.” I often wonder why. They all stand for the principles of Western democracy. They have no doubts about that, at home in their own countries; it is their article of faith in the pursuit of the greatest good for the greatest number. And they do not come in ignorance of the policies of this country and its system of government. They know that South Africa is a democracy for 3.5 million white people who elect their white government in a free ballot, and that this government also governs 15 million black and colored people who have no vote. Why, then, the “open mind”? If you believe in democracy, you can be in no two minds about the situation in South Africa, even before you have ever set foot here. To be honest, at best you can say, “I have come to see whether I have to revise my convictions and accept that, under certain conditions and in certain historical situations, there is an alternative to democracy as the means by which the greatest good for the greatest number may be achieved.”

E. J. Kahn, Jr. evidently did not subscribe to the cant of the “open mind” when he came to South Africa recently. He had done some homework; he knew South Africa was not a democracy; using Western democratic principles as the norm of civilized society, he came to record, as precisely and dispassionately as he could, what sort of society he found. His approach is that of the onlooker who sees most of the game; and here we come up against another assumption whose worth needs examining, in the context of the South African situation, not—this time—because it is cant but because one must ask, “How much of the game can the onlooker see?” The difference between Mr. Kahn's book and Alan Paton's personal testimony of the South African situation seen from within becomes a third statement on that situation: life in South Africa is ordered in such a way, by now, that it is quite impossible for even the most perceptive and inquiring onlooker to claim a full and first-hand account of that life. It can be spoken for only from within that situation; no one from outside is let near enough, any more, for him to be able to claim that he has learned what the people think. It is evident that to bear witness, now, one has to do so from the hazardous center of South African society itself; visitors such as Mr. Kahn are kept out by a cordon sanitaire of laws and legislated silences, and kept convinced of the validity of their investigations by having the official blind eye permissively turned just that much when they are gratefully surprised to be able to make contact with such fringe opposition as is left of the great, outlawed liberation movements.

It is a white fringe, of course. Helen Suzman, Progressive Party M.P. and sole vigorous voice of opposition in Parliament; Laurence Gandar, courageous editor of the Rand Daily Mail, awaiting trial on a charge of allegedly publishing false information in an exposé of prison conditions; Alan Paton himself, lone leader of the Liberal Party, decimated by bannings of its leaders; a handful of forthright churchmen, academics, intellectuals, all of us white and walking the tightrope of calculated risk. Through contact with such people the diligent inquirer will see, as Kahn did, the rubber-stamp justice meted out in the Bantu Commissioners' Courts where offenders against the bewildering Pass Laws become statutory criminals overnight; visit the Black Sash organization's offices where a small band of unintimidated white women give what advice and help they can to Africans entangled in the Pass Laws, Influx Control regulations and Group Areas Act that disrupt their lives; talk to those very, very few Africans with whom whites still have contact as equals, and who, by this definition and the fact that they are still at large and willing to talk, have never played a formative part as activists or thinkers in the African struggle for human rights. But there is no way for the visitor to reach the makers of African or Indian or Colored opinion, to hear the voices that have the mandate to speak for the 15 million on the dark side of the color bar.

It is understandable, then, for Kahn to dismiss the Africans as a people with never “more reason to be angry” and yet so “placid.” He did not, could not, meet Nelson Mandela, Walter Sisulu and Govan Mbeki, leaders of the African National Congress, Robert Sobukwe, leader of the Pan-African Congress, and the other political prisoners on Robben Island (more than 800 in 1967). The only conversation with an African he records having had “at length” is a talk with a Soweto housewife (Soweto is a complex of African segregated townships that serves as a dormitory for Johannesburg's black labor force). It was impossible for him, as for any other visitor, to canvass informed or politically aware opinion among Africans.

There is less excuse, however, for his failure to relate the ruthless legislation and secret police surveillance (he describes it and mentions in passing that African leaders are in jail) that has crushed the African and Indian opposition movements, and that outlaws even so much as a private discussion group, let alone any political gathering of any nature, to that “peace of the grave” he found prevailing in place of African resistance to apartheid. What he found here was not the peace of the grave but the silence of a people under the enormous weight of the Suppression of Communism Act, which has stripped them of their leadership down to the last humble organizer of the smallest group and which provides stiff sentences for anyone even advocating social change of any nature. Young Africans, Indians and Coloreds who were teen-agers when non-white political organizations were banned have perforce grown up without any political education whatever—except the conditioning to acceptance of apartheid disseminated in their history textbooks and other media controlled by whites. It is difficult to see how new leadership can come from them. This situation is very much part of contemporary South Africa.

Kahn quotes the opinions canvassed from Indian merchants (“keep your nose clean”) as the current attitude of this minority group on the dark side of the color bar, and sums up their reaction to the Group Areas Act (which declares areas white and removes the Indians—business, household, lock, stock and barrel—from premises they have owned and occupied in some cases since the days of the Kruger Republic) with the laconic “they are not very happy about it.” It is extraordinary that he should present this picture of what the Indian people have been reduced to without mention of the Indians’ legal battle against Group Areas, going on in our courts every day, but even more extraordinary, from the essential point of view of perspective, that he should do so without a single mention of the role the Indian people have played in the struggle against apartheid since the early part of this century. It was under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi himself, then practicing law in South Africa, that South African Indians initiated the passive resistance movement that became the basis of the African Congress movements. In the great Defiance of Unjust Laws campaign of the 1950s, the South African Indian Congress provided leadership along with the African National Congress, and hundreds of Indians went to prison. Indian leaders have been prominent among the accused in political trials from 1959 to 1966. A number of them are political prisoners now; is their enforced silence not to be reckoned with, by visitors, as part of Indian opinion?

As for radical white opposition, Kahn dismisses Abraham Fischer in one sentence, referring to him as “one South African Communist,” and remarks that the $25,000 Lenin Prize awarded Fischer last year “will probably do him little good since he is over sixty and serving a life sentence (for political offences) in Pretoria jail.” However opposed to communism he might be, no man of liberal opinions (which is the point of departure for Kahn’s inquiry) living within the South African situation could dispose of Abraham Fischer like that. In the context of our separated people, Fischer is not just “one South African Communist” or even just one South African man. Unlike Anton Rupert, the Nationalist cigarette millionaire to whom Kahn gives fascinated space, Abraham Fischer has not been satisfied to get rich and advance the chauvinism of the Afrikaner people to which both Rupert and he belong but, whatever his political ideology, has sacrificed his own personal privilege and freedom as a white man in the attempt to free Africans from the color bar.

Mandela, Sisulu, Mbeki, Sobukwe, Fischer—they are in prison but they are still with us. The weight of their presence is hardly to be ignored by anyone who reports on the situation in South Africa today. One realizes that Kahn did not set out to write a history of South Africa, but some background information from the immediate past is necessary to penetrate the appearance of the contemporary scene.

This is the best and most intelligent book about South Africa to be written by an observer for a very long time, yet just how successfully a man as generally fair-minded and astute as Kahn can be kept gliding over the surface is shown again and again. For example, he falls for the old fallacy of comparing the standard of living of black people in South Africa with that of Africans in the rest of Africa, whereas the real comparison is with the living standard of the white South Africans. South Africa is the richest country in Africa; the true measure of the South African black man’s share is how little he gets of his own country’s wealth, not how well off he is in comparison with the people of immeasurably poorer countries who happen to share his skin color. Kahn discusses “Bantu ability” (“We have been inclined to underestimate Bantu ability simply because we have been accustomed to him doing unskilled work,” the director of the Bantu Wage and Productivity Association recently said”), and explains the system of Job Reservation (whites only for skilled jobs), but does not mention the fact that, in modern labor relations, would be seen to inhibit the black man’s development in industry; under the Industrial Conciliation Act, black men are deprived of the right to strike, or bargain with their employers. Only two years ago—just about the time Kahn was in South Africa—an official of the white Mineworkers’ Union was sworn into office on the oath that he would resist with all his strength “the onslaught of Kaffir, Moor and Indian on the white working community.”

But the real reason for the blur between cause and effect in Kahn’s view of the separated people is that like all on-lookers who come to South Africa now, he was viewing the situation from the confines of the enclave of 3.5 million whites. All he really learned was what we—the whites, Nationalist, United Party, Progressive Party, Liberal with both small and large “L”—think about them, the 15 million on the other side of the color bar. The black people of South Africa remain, silent and in shadow, on the periphery of this book.

Alan Paton’s book is the record of the thought and action of a man of decent liberal opinions in a situation where those opinions have either to be abandoned or put to the test of translation into a daily way of life running counter to that of the society in which he lives. In the first essay he describes a coming to the end of color prejudice:

“I was no longer a white person but a member of the human race”; and that conviction, once arrived at, is for the liberal in South Africa at the same time the beginning of his active role; his goal; and, maybe, the only achievement he can count on at the end of his life.

Alan Paton is a Liberal with a large “L”—he has been chairman or president of the Liberal Party almost since its inception in 1953 until a new piece of legislation, outlawing racially mixed membership in political parties, put an end to the Liberal Party only a few weeks ago. But the account of the fate of liberalism in South Africa that emerges from his essays and public addresses from 1958 to 1967 is the fate of all liberals here, whether or not they were actually members of the Liberal Party. It is at the same time a candid, sober, absolutely honest and exhaustively informed account of the total South African situation, written with the sense of proportion that paradoxically, as I have remarked, can come only from one who lives on embattled ground at the center of it. Alan Paton is not a black man, but as one who lives definitively as a member of the human race, he has seen the black man’s disabilities as his own. There is no them, in his viewpoint, only an us.

What people who shared this viewpoint wanted for South Africa was a nonracial democracy. There were never very many of them among white South Africans. Among black South Africans a long and hard-earned distrust of white motives, and an equally well-established distrust of white trusteeship for African aspirations, meant that black men felt they ought to free themselves, as black people, from a white supremacist rule, before working with whites for a non-racial democracy. Whites were not accepted as members of the African National Congress; and the Liberal Party, although it stood for one man, one vote, and had no color bar, never attracted more than a token African membership. It was formed at a time—significantly—when the nonwhite peoples of the country were seeing the necessity for a united front. The Defiance Campaigns of the early fifties were a successful combination of the African and Indian Congresses (which had cooperated since 1946) with a token white participation. The Liberal Party made a bid for the wider necessity—a party of people of all colors in opposition to apartheid, which would cooperate with nonwhite organizations. This was still practicable, in the fifties; it looked, for a short time, as if it might be possible to form a united opposition composed of all races. In 1957 it was still possible to hold a Multi-racial Conference, attended by 500 delegates of all races, in Johannesburg. The conference could and did call for a re-

"Aarrggh!"

Above is the verbatim testimonial of a typically confused subscriber who can't tell our journalism from our satire; as a matter of principle there are never any labels in The Realist because we prefer readers to dig their own incredibility gap. Below are the highlights of our five most "Aarrggh!" issues; they cost $1 or they're free with a subscription.

The Parts That Were Left Out of the Kennedy Book—the feature that caused the largest number of subscription cancellations in 9 years; plus "Case History of the Manchester Caper"—a follow-up on the background and repercussions of that feature.

*Cartoons—the offensive ones by pros like Ed Fisher that get rejected by commercial periodicals; and spreads created specifically for The Realist—the Disneyland Memorial Orgy, the Junkie Battalion, Ed Sorel's I've Got Rhythm movie poster.

The Cynic Route from Crazy SANE to Loving Haight—all about cheerleaders at a peace rally; the LSD game; behind the scenes with the Diggers, the Joe Pyne show and the League for Sexual Freedom.

*Celebrity Mucking—"An Impolite Interview with Woody Allen"; Steve Allen describes a bizarre dinner with William F. Buckley; "Dick Gregory and His Mississippi Airlift"; Norman Mailer's speech at Berkeley.

Legal and Actual Concentration Camps in America—a legacy of the McCarran Act, still ready and waiting—revisited by Charles R. Allen, the man who first broke the story in 1952.

Blow-Up, Psychedelic Sexualis and The War Game—three contemporary films and how they relate to Great Moments in Violence, from Tompkins Sq. Park to LBJ's $1000-a-plate bash; latterday hedonism, from hippyland to the Renaissance Pleasure Faire; and infamous personalities, from Mort Sahl to Herman Kahn.

*Soft-Core Pornography—the obscene telephone calling service; the homosexual editor of a girlie magazine; in defense of those little comic books that men like.

*Old Fashioned Exposés—The President's ranch holdings; Hell's Angels as patriots; secret budget for CIA expenditures; Marvin Kitman's advice to the veteran-lorn; the sex life of J. Edgar Hoover; the future of flag-burning; Who Killed Adlai Stevenson?

*Sacrilegious Dept.—The Americanization of Zen; The Devil's Visit to New York; Little Orphan Annie's campaign against Mental Health.

*Inside Reports—from Hanoi, the Dominican Republic and the final Bratwurst Festival in Sheboygan, Wisconsin.

The Realist, Dept. N

595 Broadway

New York, N.Y. 10012

Enclosed please find:

- ☐ $1 for the five most "Aarrggh!" issues as described
- ☐ $3 for a 10-issue subscription plus those 5 issues free
- ☐ $5 for a 20-issue subscription plus those 5 issues free

Name

Address

City State Zip

examination of South Africa's policies on social equality and voting rights.

Against this background, Paton wrote of concrete circumstances arising from the apartheid legislation that was piling up during the years before Sharpeville—what happened to actual villages such as Charlestown, where the Africans were evicted under the Group Areas Act, what an increase of basic tax meant to a black man whose income was less than $504 a year, how the Group Areas Act affected 60,000 Indians in Durban—and the evolution of liberal thought in relation to the white supremacist position at home and the attainment of black independence in the greater part of the continent. This thought was based on the premise of a nonviolent, all-race struggle against apartheid.

After 1960, after Sharpeville, two things happened—clearly reflected in depth by the essays in this section of the book. Whereas in the first section Alan Paton was evolving the ethics of a pressure group, in this second section he is dealing with the liberal's moment of truth in South Africa: the moment when it became clear that from then on he could "fully expect violence to be a feature of the struggle." The exponents of peaceful change found themselves imprisoned, in the months of the State of Emergency, along with black revolutionaries. On the one hand, the state and its all-purpose instrument, the Suppression of Communism Act, saw no distinction between violent and nonviolent opposition to the regime, but outlawed both indiscriminately. On the other hand, Africans had already, with the break-away of the Pan-African Congress from the African National Congress, begun to turn to militant black nationalism. Seeing the state's answer to nonviolence in their people shot in the back at Sharpeville, their organizations banned, they resorted finally to sabotage (Umkonto weSizwe—"Spear of the nation") and terrorism (Pogo—"Go it alone").

Paton said to the congress of his party, held during the State of Emergency in 1960: "We must not yield ourselves to that pessimistic theory which maintains that the history of the impending future will be that of one violent force against another and that all peaceful people will be crushed between them." But what emerges, in spite of himself, under the bright light of his honest mind in these essays and those of the final section of his book, is certainly the crushing of that "nonviolent third force" that he saw as the only role for just and humane people. What emerges is the jettisoning of the liberal by South Africa; by the whites who want no conscience over the means they are prepared to employ to extend their overlordship as long as possible, and by the blacks who see him, ineffectual as an influence on the intransigence of his own racial group, increasingly as—in the words of the African political thinker, Nsopho Majeke—"the conciliator between the oppressor and the oppressed."

Liberalism has failed in South Africa. Just as there has to be a revolutionary situation before a revolution can succeed, so there has to be a certain flexibility in social relations as a precondition for the liberal to fulfill his role as liberator of both the oppressor and the oppressed. He failed to win the whites away from fear, whether he appealed to them on the realistic level of an Alan Paton—"You will never know if the man outside is a friend or an enemy until you open the door. But if you do not open the door, you can be sure what he will be"—or on the wishful level of the Progressive Party's enlightened self-interest in offering the black man a foot in the door—carefully limited franchise. And a white group that could not persuade the whites in power to open the door even that much became yet another indication to the black man outside that if he is to get in, it will be on his own efforts, of whatever nature the resistance of the door calls forth.

So between white nationalism and the black nationalism it created and now holds desperately at bay, with guns and ever more restrictive laws and, above all, at the cost of brutalizing the humanity of the whites, the liberal has been made expendable. Some are embittered, because what has been revealed is the soft spot that perhaps always was there, in the general liberal position in South Africa. A brave white man, who has suffered in his person from government persecution, because of his active opposition to apartheid, said the other day: "What has disillusioned me is not what has happened to me but the fact that multiracialism is failing everywhere." What did he mean by "multiracialism"? Did South African liberalism go no further than envisaging Africans having a share in the government of the country? Did it not face the fact that the liberal standpoint accepted, by definition, a black majority government in which the white and other minorities, as such, might or might not have a share, since there would be no representation of them as separate entities but merely as part of a polyglot population with an identity of interests? Did they envisage a "parity" of power on the lines of the Rhodesia Constitutional Commission's recommendations for that country—"parity" meaning as many white as black members of parliament, with every white man's vote worth twenty black men's votes, no matter what level of civilization the black man might reach?

Alan Paton has never had that soft spot. Liberalism is frequently sneered at from Left and Right as dewy-eyed, but the fact is that a real liberal has fewer illusions than any other political animal (perhaps that is why he has fewer successes, too; popular support is fed on illusions). Paton says in retrospect, of his essays:

I wrote, inter alia, of the time that must elapse and the work that must be done before the new nations of the world, and especially those of Africa, could achieve stability. I recognised that the ending of colonialism would be followed by a period of instability. It now seems to me that this period will be longer and more unstable than I thought. This has another consequence. It means that white South Africa will be given a period longer than I thought to abate the hostility of the outside world. If the conservatives inside the ruling Nationalist Party do not succeed in their struggle to gain control, the Government will go ahead with its plans to permit racially mixed teams to go to the Olympics [the Olympic Association has since stated that they will not be permitted to attend], and to accept Maori rugby players in the visiting New Zealand teams, and to relax apartheid restrictions for any black diplomats sent to South Africa. But simultaneously there will be made an intense effort to hasten the pace of separate development within the country, and to prove to the world that it can actually work, and can bring advantages to non-white South Africans. In other words, the disarray of the African nations and the impotence of United Nations have given the Government time, and the whole aim of Government policy will be to make that time as long as possible. That this time would be so far extended was something I did not foresee. I am still of the opinion that neither separate development nor apartheid can endure, but they are going to endure longer than I thought. In order to use this time without hindrance the Government has given itself totalitarian powers over those who might oppose or delay the implementation of their plans.

Whatever has happened in the Congo or Nigeria or, indeed, in Memphis, cannot alter his belief, along with that of other liberals worthy of the name, that "injustices are intrinsic in any programme of separate development, for the simple reason that separate development is something done by someone with power to someone without power."

How does a white man whose liberal position has failed to meet the historical pressures of his time answer, in the South African situation today, the question, "Is it worth trying to last?" Alan Paton writes: "People answer this question in different ways. Some leave the country.

Some stick to their course, even if they expect certain consequences. And even this last group is diverse, for some would face any consequences and some would not.

"What is my own answer to this question? I must give my own answer, because I would not dare to answer it for anyone else. I think it is worth trying to last. It is worth something to me, even if it apparently achieves little.

"If someone were to ask me, 'What would you and your wife do if you had young children?' I would answer, 'We would have two choices: to stay here and to give our children a father and mother who put some things even above their own children's safety and happiness, or to leave and to give them a father and mother who put their children's safety and happiness above all else.' Which would I choose? They are both good courses, are they not? I hope I would choose the first."

Here is the only justification for the liberal presence in South Africa at present. That in the midst of the defeat of all he has hoped and worked for, the liberal sees himself still as "no longer a white person but a member of the human race."

Even that, living where we do, is an achievement, not only for himself but for the human race.

Haunted by Himself

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BERTRAND RUSSELL: 1914-1944. Atlantic-Little, Brown. 418 pp. $8.95.

MAX BYRD

Mr. Byrd is a former editor of the Harvard Crimson who has written for journals in the United States and Britain.

Bertrand Russell whirled through a life of almost unbelievable achievement, a kind of circus of glamour and variety. In vain one looks through his pages for some one he has not known, some place he has not been, and one marvels at so frenetic a philosopher. And yet in such storms of energy a certain still center of ego is clear. Russell was, quite literally, haunted by himself.

Many times in his text and in the letters at the end of each chapter he returns to the theme of his own ghostliness. He tells how he has loved a ghost, and in loving a ghost my inmost self has itself become spectral. I have therefore buried it deeper and deeper beneath layers of cheerfulness, affection, and joy of life. But my most profound feelings have remained always solitary and have found in human things no companionship. The sea, the stars, the night wind in waste places, mean more to me than even the human beings I love best, and I am conscious that human affection is to me at bottom an attempt to escape from the vain search for God.

In a footnote he adds, "This and what follows is no longer true (1967)." But few readers will assent. A ghostly chill clings faithfully to him. Those who recall his account of the end of his first marriage in Volume I will not be surprised to find a new chapter beginning abruptly: "When I left Dora, she continued the school until after the beginning of the Second War." Or to learn of the death of his older brother only through a stray sentence in the letters.

Yet the sheer fascination of the narrative claims our attention far more insistently than the puzzle of his detachment. The longest and best of the chapters, nearly one-third of the book, takes him through the years of the First World War—his opposition to the war, his term in prison, and the subsequent loss of his Cambridge Fellowship, his affair with Lady Constance Maleson ("We talked half the night, and in the middle of talk became lovers"), and his books, especially Principles of Social Reconstruction. As before, he writes sharply and frankly about his galaxy of friends. D. H. Lawrence, whom Russell came to despise, is brushed away as a Fascist. Ramsay MacDonald he finds notable for his dull Scotch jokes. And T. S. Eliot appears as the recipient of both Russell's charity and his advice. "After seeing troop trains departing from Waterloo," he recounts, "I used to have strange visions of London as a place of unreality." And goes on in a footnote: "I spoke of this to T. S. Eliot, who put it into The Waste Land."

Some of these sketches were published earlier in Portraits from Memory (1956). Others, like his marvelous picture of Wittgenstein at tea (as told to him by Whitehead), are new and just as good:

... he appeared scarcely aware of the presence of Mrs. Whitehead, but marched up and down the room for some time in silence, and at last said explosively: "A proposition has two poles. It is apb." Whitehead, in telling me, said: "I naturally asked what are a and b, but I found that I had said quite the wrong thing." "a and b are indefinable." Wittgenstein answered in a voice of thunder.

After the war ended, Russell traveled to Russia and, with Dora Black, to China

harper TORCHBOOKS

Recently published

KENNETH B. CLARK

Dark Ghetto

Dilemmas of Social Power

Foreword by Gunnar Myrdal

"A brilliant diagnosis of the White problem in our society. . . . Bound to make a mark on the thinking of Americans." — ROBERT K. MERTON

TB/1317 $1.75

HERBERT HILL, Editor

Anger, and Beyond

The Negro Writer in the United States

"Important and absorbing. . . . A measurement of how far we all have come in the revolution of self-awareness." — ELIOT FREMONT-SMITH, The New York Times

A Perennial Library Book.

P/120 $1.45

JOSEPH P. LYFORD

The Airtight Cage

A Study of New York's West Side

"Places the urban poor in the full setting of their impotency with impressive reportorial skill." — NATHAN HENTOFF, The New Yorker

A Harper Colophon Book.

CN/127 $2.25

GILBERT OSOFSKY

Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto

Negro New York, 1890-1930

"Provide[s] a significant historical dimension to the present plight of the urban Negro and the impact of his deprivation." — ELLI GINZBERG

illus. TB/1381 $1.95

To be published in September

GILBERT OSOFSKY, Editor

The Burden of Race

A Documentary History of Negro-White Relations in America

"The best single collection of documents . . . covering the whole period of race relations in the United States." — JAMES W. SILVER

TB/1405 $3.75

1817

Complete catalog of Harper Torchbooks (538 volumes now in print) available on request from Dept. ST, HARPER & ROW, Publishers, 49 E. 33rd St., New York, N. Y. 10016

for a year. With his marriage to her and the advent of parenthood, he turned away from the academic life, and to support his family began to write what he calls "pothoilers," like A History of Western Philosophy and The A.B.C. of Relativity. Together they also began an experimental school, a project that collapsed into disillusionment and near bankruptcy (though a delightful exchange of letters between Russell and A. S. Neill of Summerhill comes out of it).

He was in Los Angeles teaching and lecturing when the Second World War broke out, and circumstances kept him in America until 1944, when this installment ends. In these years Russell returns to the despairing note he first sounded in 1914. "Throughout my life," he had written earlier, "I have longed to feel that oneness with large bodies of human beings that is experienced by the members of enthusiastic crowds." Reluctantly he supported the war against Nazism, still conscious of his own solitude, his distance from the great crowds. Again and again he lashes the universal madness of his times, the wars and politicians, while once more an almost mystical sense of personal isolation both troubles and sustains him. Paradoxically, "the truth is spectral, insane, ghastly: the more men see of it, the less mental health they retain." But as he says, "for my part I would rather be mad with truth than sane with lies."

Such integrity, which it would be pointless to call conceit, has borne Bertrand Russell through a rare life. But in some regards it has also brought him up halt. To read V. S. Pritchett's recent memoirs, for example, next to Russell's Autobiography is to feel how clipped Russell's human vision is. At the center of his book stands his own personality in all its splendid moods. But at the warm center of Pritchett's book is a man's experience of life, felt and passed on. For Russell, "I must, I must, before I die find some way to say the essential thing that is in me, that I have never said yet—a thing that is not love or hate or pity or scorn, but the very breath of life, fierce and coming from far away, bringing into human life the vastness and the fearful passionless force of non-human things." To Constantine Mollen he writes: "I know that I have struggled all my life to say something that I shall never learn how to say." Despite his eloquence, one is moved to agree.

code was established and the formation of unions allowed; social security was begun; Arevalo, an educator, threw himself into a flurry of school building and literacy programs. While paying the obligatory respects to these innovations, Rodman comes up with three points with which to quibble: Arevalo grew critical of the good old U.S.A., allowed Arbenz to become President, and acquiesced in the murder of armed forces chief, Francisco Arana.

In making his case, Rodman ignores the temper of U.S.-Guatemala relations through the period—exemplified by U.S. Ambassador Richard Patterson's chronic plotting to overthrow Arevalo—since to deal with it runs the risk that Arevalo's growing anti-Americanism might make sense. To examine the alternatives to Arbenz, likewise, might be unnerving. To link the killing of Arana to a cluster of plots against the regime might damage the argument.

Rodman accepts the tradition that links the Arbenz regime, through a careful selection of facts, to communism. There were no Communists in Arbenz's cabinet, as even the most rabid anti-Communist writers have admitted, nor was there anything remotely resembling communism in his program. Though political freedoms continued and though the government concentrated on a restrained but effective agrarian reform program to expropriate idle land on large estates, Rodman calls it a "Dictatorship of the Left."

Meanwhile, according to Rodman's scenario, United Fruit officials traveled in sackcloth and ashes. "United Fruit's 'image' could not be lived down by penitence and good works," he writes, "not even by giving its employees unprecedented social benefits" (which the "now all-powerful unions" apparently had not thought to demand) nor "by giving up its stock ownership in the International Railways of Central America to bury the charge that it was a stockholder and preferred customer at the same time."

Rodman has a habit of reducing plain facts to "charges." That the railway was in effect a subsidiary of the fruit company is pivotal to an understanding of one of Guatemala's central problems: interlocking foreign control of basic transportation and communication.

Though the author spares no pains in detailing the company's selfless devotion to the people of Guatemala, Guatemalans enigmatically continue to hurl rocks through the United Fruit Co. windows. Can we attribute this to ingratitude? Not totally. Though Rodman refuses to allow that the Guatemalans may have a legitimate grievance, he explains it by "psychological" factors—the fruit company executives live in larger homes, etc.

In the neatest trick of the book, Rod-

United Fruit Country

THE GUATEMALA TRAVELER: A Concise History and Guide. By Selden Rodman. Meredith Press. 127 pp. $5.95.

WARREN SLOAT

Mr. Sloat, a newspaper man who has published in Liberation, Ramparts, the Saturday Review and other publications, is gathering material for a book on Guatemala.

Next year Guatemala will celebrate the fifteenth anniversary of its deliverance from what Secretary of State John Foster Dulles liked to call "the yoke of communism." If there is any celebration it will be arranged where most of Guatemala's affairs are arranged, in the United States.

When the Central Intelligence Agency, the United Fruit Co., and Guatemalan rightists teamed up to overthrow the progressive regime of President Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán in 1954, it was hailed in the United States as the first cold-war victory. Lobbyists talked it up for injecting the little Central American nation with economic miracle juice. What more appropriate showcase for the cornucopia of good relations with the United States than the country that "came back from communism!"

Yet despite considerable aid, including string pulling at the World Bank, Guatemala "has known little but stagnant dictatorship and corruption since 1954," as Dan Kurzman wrote in The Washington Post in 1966. Two Maryknoll priests, expelled for aiding leftist guerrillas, have called it the next Vietnam. It has become trapped in what the Guatemalan revolution, which ended with Arbenz's overthrow, sought to eliminate: political repression, illiteracy and landlessness, economic imperialism.

One would never know it, however, from reading the latest work of Selden Rodman, former nemesis of nonrepresentational art and now an author of nonrepresentational history. His factual errors (such as making a colonel of Jorge Toriello, a civilian leader of the 1944 revolution) are evidences of his haste in turning out his series on Latin America. But more important is his blend of liberal cant about the need for reform and his attack on any authentic reform in a book suffused with the anti-Communist mentality.

From the election of Juan José Arevalo in 1945 until 1951, Guatemala underwent a little New Deal. A new constitution guaranteed civil liberties unprecedented in most of Latin America; a labor man omits any mention of the single most important act of the Arbenz administration—the expropriation of 413,573 acres of idle fruit company land. This move, coming shortly after threatened oil expropriation in Iran, was the core issue that brought about a U.S.-Guatemala confrontation.

The issue can be developed in various directions. A pro-Guatemala view might trace the multifarious connections between the fruit company and U.S. policy makers—beginning with two former Wall Street lawyers for United Fruit, John Foster Dulles and his brother, Allen, then CIA chief. A pro-fruit company view might stress the compensation offered for the land or the debilitating soil disease that made large reserves necessary. Until now, the rankest apologist for the company never considered ignoring the issue. Its omission renders the entire course of events incomprehensible, but perhaps that is Rodman's intention.

Back to "the hysterical Arbenz," who by 1954 was "mouthing . . . stock international deceptions" of his Commie pals, "including such farfetched ones as the charge that the United States was using bacteriological warfare in Korea." Want to hear three other "deceptions"? Arbenz said (1) that the anti-Communist furor was a mask to destroy the gains of the past decade; (2) that the CIA was plotting to overthrow Guatemala; (3) that the United States was primarily concerned with the expropriation of fruit company land and, by extension, American involvement in Latin America generally. Since these bear directly on the issues, Rodman omits them. Instead, he singles out an irrelevant issue that Arbenz never personally raised, though some of his Communist advisers did.

Backed by Trujillo (as Robert Crassweller reports in his biography of the Dominican dictator) and the CIA, opposed by a half-hearted army and an unarmed populace, the counterrevolution invaded Guatemala and took power. Its leader, Col. Carlos Castillo Armas, promptly named as head of the secret police Col. Jose Linares, a noted testicle specialist who had filled the same job under the last dictatorship. Two thousand people were arrested, many of them killed. With the labor movement crushed, the foreign companies avenged themselves on troublemakers. The expropriated land was returned. Civil liberties were abolished and 73 per cent of the population disenfranchised. With the secret ballot abolished, Castillo had himself elected President in a one-candidate plebiscite by voice vote before armed soldiers. The CIA's boy won, as Eisenhower states in his memoirs, "by a thundering majority." With the "dictatorship of the Left" thus brought down, Rodman says, Castillo

THE BIRDS ON THE MORNING OF GOING

If I can say yes I must say it to this and now trying to remember what the present can bless with which I know

*from all other ages how little has come to me that is breath
and nothing that is you* *now I can see

I have been carrying this fear
a blue thing
the length of my life asking in this its place bringing it here*

in the singing of these brightening birds

they are neither dead nor unborn

a life opens it opens it is breaking does it find occasions for every grief of its childhood before it will have done

oh my love here even the night turns back

W. S. MEREDITH

"gave Guatemala a second chance to achieve social revolution without totalitarian interference: a chance to become a democracy."

In the succeeding years, the United States has labored to sustain right-wing dictatorships in Guatemala. One was Gen. Miguel Ydigoras Fuentes, who let the CIA use his country as a training base for the invasion of Cuba and was protected by the CIA in 1962 when demonstrations threatened to topple the government, but he failed to work out.

The catalyst for his overthrow was the terrifying announcement in 1963 that Arevalo, a genuine alternative to the present regime, had slipped into the country to campaign for the Presidency. Arevalo, Rodman admits, is the most popular President Guatemala has had—though in his monomania he attempts to turn even that into an attack on Arbenz. The CIA lost its patience. With the help of Ambassador John O. Bell and the military, it engineered a coup. Since Rodman omits the role of U.S. intervention from this episode, we assume that Bell, who is listed in the book's acknowledgments for his help, neglected to mention it.

The military junta of Col. Enrique

Peralta Azurdias that followed wore on for three years, one solid year under a declared state of siege with all political freedom suspended. When Peralta consented in 1966 to allow elections, as a parting shot he sent twenty-eight leftists to the wall. Rodman calls the dictatorship "heir to the same problems that beset Ydigoras and Castillo Armas" (e.g., the obreros and campesinos want their revolution back) and it "faced them with as much honesty as the latter and more dignity than the former." Though one killing blew the whole thing for Arevalo as far as Rodman is concerned, his patience with repression and terrorism for the succeeding thirteen years appears inexhaustible.

According to official government figures of 1966, this nation of 4.5 million people has 68,000 landless families and 75,000 families living on minuscule plots. The peasants are prisoners of 80c-a-day migratory farm work. Despite the annual announcement of forthcoming agrarian reform, the big estates remain untouched.

Rodman has reservations about the "mercurial" leaders of the timidly reformist Revolutionary Party that won the 1966 elections. He mentions the revolutionaries operating as guerrillas, but ignores the new anti-Communist groups that have been terrorizing the populace. "Estimates of the number of persons actually killed [by rightists], some after torture, have gone as high as 1,000," Henry Giniger reported in The New York Times on July 15, 1967. The right wing is killing an average of one per day, including officials of the party in power.

The Big Black Bag

THE BAG. By Sol Yurick. Trident Press. 476 pp. $6.95.

MARTIN TUCKER

Mr. Tucker is an associate professor of English at Long Island University and the author of Africa in Modern Literature (Frederick Ungar Co.).

The Negro has largely been an outlaw in past American fiction. The novel about him has centered its action around the tracking down of this sympathetic criminal; but hunted down and executed he has been, no matter what glory might attach itself to his abortive death. Richard Wright in the 1940s produced the best example in Native Son of the Negro criminal and society's injustice to him. After that, Wright fled to Paris in his spirit as well as his physical being; it was an attempt to prevent the American prison of his skin from stretching taut over the free associations in his mind. To some extent he failed, since Wright did not know how to deal with the Negro in America except as an outcast—an enraged one, but still a member denied by his society. James Baldwin and Ralph Ellison followed in the footsteps of this tradition, but they also indicated the change that was to come: their heroes are allied, however tentatively, with a growing movement of intellectual awareness. Baldwin compounded the idea of the outcast by identifying his heroes as homosexuals and involving them in interracial love affairs; Ellison enriched the complexity by showing that a white man's ignorance of the moral law is indeed an excuse for his indecent behavior.

Now a work of fiction has appeared that augurs the shape of the new novel about the Negro. Sol Yurick is a white, Jewish, possibly lapsed bourgeois writer, whose talent and beauty of compassion are magnificent. In The Bag, his third novel, he writes about many people all caught up in the blackness of New York City and its sick welfare system. Only some of his characters are Negro, but the ambience of the Negro scene colors every page and is indivisibly tied to Rodman's pretense at being pro-reform adds a note of hypocrisy to the book. Otherwise it is in the same bag as most books about Guatemala, which the fates have consigned to CIA-kept academics and publicists for political opportunists. The lack of substantive information, the distortions, as well as the insistence on making "communism" the central issue, goes on.

Yurick's conception of New York. No longer is the violence abortive or repressed: it is there, and it seems the only way out, a cleansing away by blood bath. In this use of the riot scene, Yurick's novel seems like so many African novels of the past decade. The moderates, the ones willing to see both sides of a neighborhood, are crushed, while the extremes—corrupted and expedient—survive to fight their coming battles.

Yurick's ability to capture the Negro mood is only one of his achievements, for the novel treats many problems and characters from the New Left scene, all of them tied to frustration in one or more of its guises. Some of the characters appear exaggerated, at times merely symbolic exploitations. Faust, the landlord, who survived the Nazi horrors, is presented as a complicated creature driven by base and high motives, but he never comes wholly alive. Nor does his daughter, a Lesbian who almost loses her girl friend to her father, though she does add a gratuitous touch of corruption in the high places of Central Park West.

Yurick is also unfair to the literary patronage milieu. He condemns the system by making every one of his editors, agents, even the hero's wife who is a literary person (a poet who sacrificed her career for her husband's), horrible people. They are all aggressive, cold, avaricious, inhumane—almost caricatures.

In his major characters, however, Yurick is successful, particularly with his hero-writer, Miller, who is dismayed by the acceptance of his third novel. Expecting a rejection, he learns that his editor thinks it superb; Miller now is convinced that he has sold out. He takes back the novel, quits his part-time teaching job, and moves into the Welfare Department to find his wholeness again—to rewrite his novel as it should be. How he never quite makes it is the tale of the book. What he accomplishes is a confrontation with the Negro side of himself—that compulsion to know what it is a Negro must feel. Miller becomes the lover of one of his Negro clients, and finally—in one brilliant scene—talks and acts (as he sees it) like a Negro to his cold, bitchy white wife. It is a horrifying and fascinating parody.

Shortly after this descent—or black illumination—occurs the riot in which Yurick brings his characters together and tries to resolve the many problems he has ambitiously shouldered. He does not succeed in the riot resolution, but his book is an achievement. The writing is an amalgam of styles over which Yurick rarely loses control—lyric, dramatic, rapacious, and numbing by turns. His novel lives in magnificent individual scenes—it angers, frightens, entertains (much of it is high satire of the New Left, from an old beat poet to young revolutionaries), and finally it simply gives, as Yurick says, "till it hurts good."

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Spain is a church-ridden country and Luis Bunuel a bitter adversary of that institution. Given those circumstances, Nazarin is a slashing film, and if it was ever shown in Spain in the ten years since it was made, the impression must have been sensational.

But with us the circumstances are different and so must be the impression. The film preaches very directly: if a man of our time were to attempt truly to walk in Christ's footsteps, he too would be crucified—and most probably by those calling themselves Christians. The indictment is scarcely new; indeed, it has long been a stock item in the furniture of social cynicism. So an audience not electrified by overt thrusts against the dignitaries of an official church is apt to pay more attention to the second moral that Bunuel has embedded in his picture: when a man has his heart set on martyrdom it is hard to deprive him of his goal.

The difficulty is that, dramatically, these two messages tend to be mutually reductive, with the result that the viewer is relieved of commitment and finds himself associating most vividly with the scenery. In short, Bunuel is so implacably estranged from every aspect of his problem that the film turns out to be primarily a beautiful travelogue (Mexico, 1900).

For though the young priest of the title may indeed have been a thorn in the sides of the powers temporal and religious, states considerably more humane than that of Porfirio Diaz, and churches appreciably less authoritative than the Roman Catholic, frown upon the hiding of murderers. And though it is no doubt wicked to suspect a priest of lechery, young clerics have some responsibility not to encourage the notion by consorting with young women whose religious fervor seems to spring in large part from sexual hysteria. When Bunuel's priest goes into the exile of pilgrimage in company with a prostitute who has killed one of her professional sisters in a knife battle and with a girl who has sublimated her lust for a brutal horse trader into dubious adoration of her confessor's spirituality, the ensuing debacle is not entirely the fault of a myopic, rigid and evil-minded society.

Bunuel was angry and, as can happen in that state, called down plagues on every house in sight (also a literal plague, whose victims the simple saint and his two awkward disciples minister to quite ineffectively). Of course, since it was Bunuel who made it, the film is a work of cold-eyed elegance, the actors going about their work with laconic eloquence punctuated by violence. But when everyone in a film is coarse, insensitive, foolish or half crazy, and when the director has a good word to say for no one except a robber of alms boxes with an itch for redemption (and even in that case, I suspect contempt), the action is apt to meander in a gloomy way, and the only possible hero, given an effective locale, is the cameraman. In the case of Nazarin, Gabriel Figueroa is that hero.

Peulia is about how people—damn it all!—don't communicate with one another. That is a modish theme and Richard Lester has directed it in a jangle of Pop attitudes that is not absolutely up to date only because the social gestures of our day don't last long enough to get a film from the studio to the theatre (a pair of hippies smiling through the smoke of pot no longer stamp avant-garde on a film and topless waitresses were last fall's sensation).

Was George C. Scott, the famous surgeon, willing to take up with Julie Christie, recently escaped from her sadistic young husband, the scion of Joseph Cotten, who here impersonates the entire Birch Society? We never know, for the principals are so intent on not tipping their mitts to each other that they quite fail to tip them to the audience. In the event, she goes off on a yacht with her menacing beauty boy spouse (Richard Chamberlain) into what looks to be the start of a very promising horror story.

That is the real trouble with Peulia—it is full of promising starts, but too much absorbed in psychedelic flash and deracinated editing to get on with any of them. There is much to be said for odd characters, and this picture offers more than the average; and there is something to be said for keeping the audience alert by doling out essential information in arbitrary fragments. But all this skittish behavior with people and their histories makes one wonder how the story line would shape up if you could get a good look at it. With Peulia, I am reasonably confident that there is more soap in the pop than Mr. Lester would care to admit (the real question for Scott is what would Dr. Kildare do). The acting is athletic and lachrymose, the props are kooky, the music is bright, the domestic sets are suitable for the reading of Playboy, there is an adequate amount of surgical duress. Given such attractions it is perhaps churlish to pine for the antique virtues of a beginning, a middle and an end.

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVICK

Mr. Novick's Beyond Broadway: The Quest for Permanent Theatres, based on a series of articles which appeared originally in The Nation, has just been published by Hill & Wang.

In The Bacchae, Euripides is telling once again a familiar story: a man, in the pride of his manhood, defies a god, and is struck down for it. The moral, at first glance, is a familiar moral: God is not mocked. But the god in this play is no dignified Olympian, not Zeus or Apollo but Dionysus, that newcomer to the pantheon, the god of intoxication, of irrationality, of ecstasy, of blowing your mind. Today, when Western man is engaged in a tremendous effort to come to terms in a new and (he hopes) healthier way with the tempting and terrible impulses that well up from inside him—the impulses for which "Dionysus" can be taken as a metaphor—The Bacchae is the most urgently contemporary of all Greek tragedies. It shows in superb and violent images just how tempting, and just how terrible, the Dionysiac impulse is; and it suggests, as Freud suggested, that Dionysus is most dangerous to those who try to deny and suppress him altogether.

But because it deals with ecstasy and frenzy, The Bacchae is perhaps the least suited of all Greek tragedies to the stodgy, stately, pompous sort of performing—a style inherited not from Aeschylus but from Max Reinhardt—which usually passes for Greek classical tradition in our theatres. A radically different approach is needed, and one such approach has been found. At the Performing Garage on Wooster Street in New York, a group of young actors under the direction of Richard Schechner are presenting something they call Dionysus in 69, which they advertise as being "somewhat like Euripides' The Bacchae." Mr. Schechner is the editor of The Drama Review, which devotes considerable attention to the work of Artaud, Grotowski, Kott and the proponents of happenings, environments and improvisation. All these influences, along with some others, mingle in Dionysus in 69, but Mr. Schechner and his colleagues are not merely playing around with this year's modish theatrical techniques. They are for the most part remarkably faithful to their incomplete, even distorted, but still cogent conception of what The Bacchae is all about. And they have made a disturbing and fascinating piece of theatre.

There are no seats at their Performing Garage; spectators sit where they choose, either on high platforms built here and there, or on the floor. The actors range all around the room, over and under the platforms, but they return at moments of crisis to the center of the floor, which the audience, without being asked, has left vacant.

Into this central space, after a few preliminaries, comes an unlikely looking figure: a tall, skinny, mild-mannered

AUTHORS WANTED BY NEW YORK PUBLISHER

Leading book publisher seeks manuscripts of all types: fiction, non-fiction, poetry, scholarly and juvenile works, etc. New authors welcomed. For complete information send for booklet 103. It's free. Vantage Press, 120 W. 31 St. New York, N.Y. 10001.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 7-8-68
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $8

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

young man, with shaggy hair, a scraggly mustache and yellow-tinted, wire-framed glasses. "Good evening," he says. "I see you've found your seats. My name is William Finley." We check the program, and sure enough, there is a William Finley among the performers. Mr. Finley goes on to tell us, quite calmly, how he realized at an early age that he, William Finley, was the god Dionysus; he is here, it seems, to proclaim his divinity and establish his rites and rituals. He clashes a set of finger bells and dances off, like some hippie Pied Piper. The performers join the dance, girls in black briefs and loose little red tunics, boys in jockstraps only. A happy revel ensues, to the music of bells, flute and drum; a number of spectators join in. Then suddenly the dancing stops. Pentheus, ruler of Thebes, is standing atop the highest platform, shouting through a bullhorn, denouncing Dionysus and his rites, ordering everybody to get dressed and behave.

The performers, however, are not to be daunted so easily; they disperse among the audience, and defy Pentheus with mirth. They keep breaking out into song: words from a chorus of The Bacchae ("Laughter to the flute, Laughter to the flute") to the tune of Three Blind Mice.

PERSONALS

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled Pro editor-writer aids authors in revising Mss. for publication. Box 612, c/o The Nation.

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors. Indigenous designs, free catalog. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 333 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10004

INVEST INTERESTED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

EPISCOPALIANS — Join a radical-Christian peace-making organization. For details write EPISCOPAL PEACE FELLOWSHIP, Box 101, 229 E. 59th Street, New York, N.Y. 10022.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

HELP FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instructions $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. 9123C, Bridgeport, Conn. 06601.

I WANT TO MEET RUSSIANS FACE-TO-FACE ON JULY 21* THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

as a step toward
preventing nuclear war
■ Week Study-Exchanges

*Leave NYC: July 10, 20, 30 ■

Aug. 23 or MEET CEC in Moscow

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N-7/8, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036

WRITE-WIRE-CALL (212) LT 1-8113

Pentheus, enraged, dashes and climbs from platform to platform, trying to silence them.

Finally he turns to confront Dionysus himself, who is now sitting in the middle of the room, quietly nodding his head to the music; the scene that follows is, in outline, very close to Euripides. Dionysus' lines, however, are adapted into contemporary idiom. When Pentheus asks Dionysus about his mysteries, the latter replies, in William Arrowsmith's translation, "I am forbidden to say. But they are worth knowing." In Mr. Schechner's version the reply becomes, "Mysteries are very hard to describe—but they're out of sight." Pentheus, on the other hand, is even more stilted and formal than in the original: he says things like "You shall regret this pernicious sophistry!"—to which Dionysus, with amused irony, replies, "You're beautiful." Dionysus, the master of the revels, the inspirer of frenzy, keeps control of the situation by remaining mischievously, paradoxically calm: Pentheus, the apostle of rectitude and order, is strained, wrought up, practically vibrating with tension. It becomes clear that Pentheus' need to conquer Dionysus and extirpate his revels is a profoundly neurotic compulsion; Pentheus is afraid of his own passions, and must fight desperately to suppress them. Dionysus is a threat to his tenuous control, not only over his city but over his agonized self. Furiously, he orders Dionysus to be imprisoned in the stables. "Okay," says the god. "I'll go down to the stud stalls. But I won't suffer!" Here as elsewhere, the contrast between Dionysus' unassuming appearance, manner and idiom on the one hand, and his tremendous pretensions on the other, make Dionysus in 69 the funniest Greek tragedy I ever saw; but Mr. Finley never becomes a buffoon, and the play is never mocked.

It is not long before Dionysus returns from the stables to exact his revenge. Pentheus is repelled by sensuality, but fascinated too; indeed the intensity of his revulsion is caused by the intensity of his fascination. In the Euripidean text, Pentheus wishes to see the Bacchae, the women possessed by Dionysus, at their rites, and Dionysus persuades him to dress up as a woman. Here this becomes metaphorical: Pentheus is to become a woman for Dionysus by submitting to him sexually (off-stage—the performance doesn't go all the way). The other performers now divide into two groups, with both sexes represented in each group. Each group surrounds a man chosen out of the audience, and begins touching him, caressing him, pressing against him, slowly, calmly, astonishingly. The play proceeds on three levels: Pentheus is challenged, the actor playing Pentheus is challenged in a Pirandellian subplot, and the spectators are challenged too. (Pentheus has earlier caressed, and then rejected, a female spectator.) From one point of view, of course, Mr. Schechner and his friends have some hell of a nerve; who do they think they are? This is outrageous. But that is the point—Dionysus is above all outrageous—and this strategy serves to bring it strongly home. We are forced to recognize our inhibitions, clutched about us like fig leaves, and perhaps to inquire what these inhibitions conceal.

Then it is time for Dionysus to show his other face. He and Pentheus emerge, laughing intimately together. Suddenly Dionysus dabbles his fingers in a fountain affixed to the wall, and marks the neck of Pentheus with blood. Soon all the performers are streaked with blood. Most of them end up in a pile of bloody bodies, looking far more like the heap of disjointed limbs the Euripidean text calls for than anything a prop master could construct: two actresses, each playing Pentheus' mother Agave, brandish bloody hands proudly in the faces of the spectators, each proclaiming (in the words of Euripides, as far as I could tell) her success at hunting, not realizing that her quarry is her son.

Triumphant in the midst of horror, Dionysus says to the audience, "Pentheus, like you, blasphemed William Finley"—and announces his intention of running for President: Dionysus in 69. It is an effective ending, but, I think, a cop-out; it tends to discount the horror, to dissipate the sense of the atrociousness of Dionysus that is an important element in the impact of The Bacchae. It is the only point at which this production flinches from the turbulent power of the play.

Of necessity, much is lost in such an adaptation as this: the specifics of Euripides' thought, and of his poetry. But of the latter, at least, how much comes through the double screen of translation and performance? I would much rather hear a fragment of a chorus whispered urgently in my ear, as happens in Dionysus in 69, than hear the whole thing laboriously intoned, accompanied with the usual arm motions and footwork. This production, moreover, is not enthusiastically sloppy, as experimental theatre so often is; it is vigorous and firmly disciplined. William Finley as Dionysus and William Shepherd as Pentheus are beautifully cast for contrast, and both of them perform with remarkable precision and strength. Above all Dionysus in 69 is important as a strikingly powerful contribution to the great work of exploring (here I quote from Robert Brustein's exegesis of Artaud) "the hidden links that exist between every successful work of art and the deep sensual life of every spectator."

Crossword Puzzle No. 1256

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 See 10 across
6 This at battle? (A group of cells, possibly of bone.) (4)
10 and 1 across "Marche Lorraine"? It's most important, of course! (5, 2, 10)
11 One might be to get up, but not frightened so. (7)
12 You could expect to find a Salk the type sought by alchemists to create a solution. (8)
13 Lad in trouble with a girl? (5)
15 More easily frightened away, like a horse may be? (5)
17 Commercial rating? (Marking a formal pronouncement.) (9)
19 Spread out when passed around, or just spread out? (9)
21 See 23 across.
23 and 21 across The dashing sort, typified by bittersweet. (10)
24 Put your name on a bad deal, as indicated. (8)
27 What prompts a person to put it back in shifts? (7)
28 Mill output was political this. (7)
29 Bird talk? (4)
30 Not fancy-sounding woods, Handel's "Largo" being about one. (5, 5)

DOWN:

- 1 Transported when packaged in sound fashion. (4)

- 2 A bad poet? Hell, yes! (7)
3 The whole shebang? No, no good away from it in the old country. (5)
4 Relating to one of the things you first learn. (9)
5 Handled by some sailors with dexterity. (5)
7 Oilman's Turkish counterpart. (7)
8 Made limp. (10)
9 They're wound up by envoys. (8)
14 Is nothing forceful when characterized by equal intensity? (10)
16 Pertinent to your mother-in-law, perhaps. (8)
18 Become exhausted over the place for putting color? (4-5)
20 Gas up with it, at climbing near Aquila. (7)
22 A single shade of colorless liquid. (7)
24 Used for making ropes and sails? (5)
25 Where hay might be put up? (5)
26 A single confirmatory sign, or several of them? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1255

ACROSS: 1 Lo and behold; 9 Flat; 10 Weeds; 12 Tapered; 15 Demurred; 16 Damask; 18 Beef up; 21 Mark down; 24 Stemmed; 26 Imparts; 28 Whitt; 29 Syria; 31 Four-posters. DOWN: 2 On the cuff; 3 and 30 Now hear this; 4 Brew; 5 Husband; 6 Lodes; 7, 11, 19 and 13 Please Don't Eat the Daisies; 8 Angers; 14 Adams; 17 Mad Hatter; 20 Presser; 22 Rampant; 23 Within; 25 Motto; 27 Argot.

PUBLICATIONS

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of Significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco. Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.
Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine 04642

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woer, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Enfranchising. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 382 7th Ave., N.Y.C. Not to win, but to fulfill his mission as the first of an endless line of Symbolical World Presidents. Bin Dir Woer has announced that he is a life-long candidate for the presidency of the United States, and of the as yet unborn, just and humane World Democracy.

FREE PAPERBACK LISTS. Write, inquire how thousands save! PAPERBACKS, HARDBOUNDS, RECORDS. Fast service. New York Book, 48 West 43rd Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

ABAS magazine begins publication in September. Satire, articles, fiction, more. $2.50 per year, single copy 25c. We also need writers. Send for more details. ABAS, 400 Summer Avenue, Newark, N.J. 07104

PSYCHEDELIC LIGHTING MANUAL! Make Light Machines, Strobes, Color Organs etc. Send $2 to: LIGHTRAYS, 713H Pine, Philadelphia, Pa. 19106.

15c LITTLE BLUE BOOKS, 1900 titles, all subjects. Catalog 14c. LARSON'S BOOKS-N, 410 Minn., Cannon Falls, Minn. 55009.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium, and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

VACATIONS

OVER 200 acres on private lake. Excellent swimming, boating-fishing. Golf, summer theatres, restaurants and Long Island Sound nearby. Rooms with private baths. Charming house. Breakfasts only. Tel: 649-2465. Cudroff.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

How Will America Vote This November?

Be your own computer.

Pollsters and computers now dominate the field of political intelligence in the many months before conventions, during the weeks of the election campaign and during Election Day. Predictions are based on analyses of voting in areas selected as "barometers" of national sentiment.

HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS, compiled each election year by Dr. Louis H. Bean, graphically represents the patterns of voting in the United States during the last ten Presidential elections (1928-64), and how the major issues are reflected in these changing percentages from election to election.

HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS can be purchased from The Scarecrow Press, Inc., Metuchen, New Jersey. It will be a free gift for any new one-year NATION subscriber who acts now.

NEW MEXICO AND THE U.S.

As New Mexico goes, so goes the nation. Except for the two elections of 1932 and 1948, when New Mexico exceeded the national Democratic percentage by 4 and 5 points, it has closely approximated the national Democratic vote.

FREE WITH EACH NEW ONE-YEAR SUBSCRIPTION

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

- ☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free, HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.
- ☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N7-8

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

BURLINGAME

JUL 21 1968

SOVIET-AMERICAN SOBRIETY

THE LIBRARY
NATION

JULY 22, 1968 35 cents

POLLS
and the RIGHT TO 'NO'

DON M. MUCHMORE

Symbolic Speech

The Draft Card Burners

PETER W. MARTIN

Rito Digs the Students CAREY McWILLIAMS

Liberation—Not Frustration

NAT HENTOFF

Nuts, Bolts and Blue Sky WILLIAM B. ROLLINS

5-69R PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

Buffalo music center

The following comments on a music column by Benjamin Boretz [The Nation, June 17] were collected and forwarded by Mrs. Renée Levine of the Center of the Creative and Performing Arts, State University of New York at Buffalo.

Editor

DEAR SIR: Our university has put the Center of the Creative and Performing Arts on a permanent basis because of its contribution to new music, its record of capacity audiences, and its consistently high performance standards.

Center of the Creative and Performing Arts
State University of New York at Buffalo

... I find it difficult to put much stock in Mr. Boretz's concern over the new music situation in Buffalo. The mere fact that he did not take time to ascertain whether or not the Buffalo Center will or will not in fact continue (which it most certainly will), shows that there is a good chance that he doesn't know what's happening with other groups outside New York City either ... I am beginning to wonder if perhaps New York City isn't too small a town for new music.

Jan Williams
Center Percussionist

Composers and performers have come to Buffalo over the past four years from Los Angeles, San Francisco, Urbana, Boston, Ithaca, Louisville, Kansas City, Boulder, Washington, D.C., Milan, London, Copenhagen, Berlin, Paris, Rome and Tokyo. Next season (our fifth), new members from Canada, the Netherlands, California and New York will participate in the Center.

Renée Levine
Center Coordinator

... The importance of generous and widespread encouragement to gifted young performers and composers inclined toward the contemporary field, the desirability of acquainting a large and unfortunately largely ignorant public, etc., has escaped Mr. Boretz, who appears to have taken sanctuary in a kind of chauvinism unfit for one in his position. Mr. Boretz is obviously carrying a torch, and his column with all its erudition duly noted smacks of sour grapes.

Charles Haupt
Center Violinist

I recommend that Mr. Boretz spend some time here in Buffalo and witness the amount and quality of preparation involved in the Center's programs.

Edward Burnham
Center Percussionist

In my opinion, the Buffalo Center is the only contemporary group sponsored by the Rockefeller Foundation that has done what it set out to do. The others thrive on traditional conventionality.

Paul Fromm, President
Fromm Music Foundation

Our Center is guilty of only one thing—a catholic representation of all schools of forward-looking new music. My advice: It is not necessary to attack one group in order to build up another. Our cause needs everyone.

Lukas Foss
Co-director

Mr. Boretz replies

New York City

That my publication of an apparently authentic but, as it now appears, incorrect report of the termination of the Buffalo project has caused such obvious embarrassment to the musicians there is a matter for serious regret. My information, however, seemed quite unimpeachable: one of my sources was in fact a senior faculty member of the

(Continued on page 52)

EDITORIALS

Revolutionary Age

In one of the more perceptive commencement addresses of the year, Franklin D. Murphy, retiring as chancellor of the University of California at Los Angeles, stressed some of the consequences of the fact that we live in an age of change, a truly revolutionary age. The by-products, as he said, are incredibly complicated and the pace is incredibly swift. Five years ago we could speak of the "generation gap"—the inability of parents to communicate effectively with college-age children. Now, Dr. Murphy finds, there is almost as great a gap between the freshman student on the one hand and the senior student on the other.

The change most difficult to grasp and assimilate—and also the most important—is a change in public consciousness. Suddenly millions of people have begun to think and feel differently. While it seems as if it had happened overnight, this is an illusion. An overwhelming disgust with the old politics has been developing within the American electorate for a long time and is now surfacing.

Don Muchmore, one of the most accurate of the pollsters, remarks on one manifestation in this issue (p. 40). He notes that the polls show a remarkable "negativism," a massive withdrawal of support from the Johnson-Humphrey Administration. They also show a remarkable increase in political information, coupled with a growing dissatisfaction with politics as usual. The professional politicians, supposed to be sensitive to widespread changes in public mood, are among the last to grasp the change and what it implies. They have finally been forced to concede—grudgingly—that a man named McCarthy is a serious candidate for the Presidency. At the same time, with perverse stupidity, they keep trying to crack the whip on delegates, as though this were 1940.

It is not 1940. It is not even 1960. A new wind is blowing. One does not need a scientific survey to sense that the old electoral mores are dying; spot observations are evidence enough. Hubert Humphrey flies into the Cleveland airport and his security detail has been advised to prepare for a crowd of 3,000 to 5,000. The actual turnout, by a generous estimate, is 500—and that, as Warren Weaver, Jr. writes in The New York Times, includes a band, cheerleaders and hostile pickets. The following afternoon, Mayor Carl B. Stokes and the local Democratic organization promised Humphrey 2,000 to 3,000 people for a coffee-and-cookies reception in a hotel ballroom. Once again 500 of the faithful showed up, and an embarrassing number of them drifted out while Mr. Humphrey was speaking. (Presumably they had partaken of the coffee and cookies and had nothing else to stay for.)

Richard Nixon is just as bad—some would say worse. But on a realistic basis what is there to choose between these two? Both have functioned in the Vice Presidency, hardly an office requiring a giant to fill it. Both have been around far too long; both are has-beens. Does anyone seriously believe either could lead the nation in a revolutionary age? All they can do is plunge the country into an electoral college stalemate of the most dangerous kind.

A revolutionary age does not necessarily require a revolution, but it does require revolutionary politics. The latter is not uncommon in American history; it is, in fact, a recurring phenomenon. Harvey Wheeler lists four American political revolutions—Jefferson's, Jackson's, Lincoln's, and Franklin D. Roosevelt's. In the Yale Review John Rodgers discerns seven, adding the revolt of the American colonies, the William Jennings Bryan campaign of 1896, and the one now gestating.

As Rodgers sees it, one of the major causes of the current revolution is that "we have forgotten to provide young men and women with the opportunity to feel that they too can accomplish something of major value in the society, instead of just preparing themselves to become minor cogs in a great machine, in which, if they are very good and very diligent, they may ultimately be allowed to turn a somewhat larger wheel, but the direction of which neither they nor anyone else . . . can hope to change." Only the very timid and the very repressed among our young people (and the very regressive) can be expected to submit to such a prospect.

Can Humphrey or Nixon, or anyone of their lackluster type, hope to ride out the coming tempest? Does anybody think they can? If they think so themselves, they must be as blind as the hack politicians who support them, hoping in turn to be supported. But the coattails of two such nonentities will not support minor candidates hungry for office, nor will the anti-Communist posturing of both, which has been their stock in trade, enchant the voters this November.

The new mood on the part of millions of heretofore apathetic voters requires, as Walter Lippmann notes, a broader choice in time of crisis. The choice which the machine politicians think to offer them is too dismal to be tolerated. And if that is all these blind party hacks can offer, a sizable number of voters will turn to a third party or a fourth—coupled with an upsurge of movements, action politics and demonstrations—which if it cannot prevail in 1968 will pave the way for rational, radical change in 1972 (provided the fat has not gone into the fire by then).

What Black Power?

From an NAACP convention which exhibited signs of stress, strain and disunity, Roy Wilkins went to address the CORE convention to plead for unity. At the latter convention Whitney Young made a remarkable speech in which he expressed misgivings, bordering on despair, about the response of white Americans. The CORE delegates loved it and shouted, "The brother has come home!" The next day a number of CORE chapters walked out in disagreement with the policies of the national office. All this follows in the wake of the sad, sad breakup of Resurrection City, and stories of the deepening divisions in the nonviolent movement.

These events call for a retrospective view of Black Power. The Nation has never had any quarrel with the basic concept: all minorities have had to augment their power in some such fashion. But there are aspects of the

IN THIS ISSUE

July 22, 1968

EDITORIALS

34

ARTICLES

40 Polls and the Right to "No"

Don M. Muchmore

42 Symbolic Speech:

The Draft Card Burners

Peter W. Martin

46 Military "Software"

Charles Rabb

48 Tito Digs the Students

Carey McWilliams

51 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

53 Liberation—Not Frustration

Nat Hentoff

53 Landlord (poem)

John Engels

54 The Evidence of Their Lives

D'Arcy McNickle

55 A Tragedy of Errors

Richard J. Walton

55 Indian Painting, Probably Wasco, in a Cave Near Madras, Oregon (poem)

Jarold Ramsey

56 Magic, Vision and Dream

Jerome Rothenberg

57 Home Town (poem)

George Hitchcock

58 The Flatulent Poet

Robert K. Morris

58 Book Marks

Sara Blackburn

59 Nuts, Bolts and Blue Sky

William B. Rollins

60 Films

Robert Hatch

61 Theatre

Robert Pasoli

63 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
FELT KERRY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESQ; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. F. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright © 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 207

No. 2

post-1966 development of the Black Power idea that, in our judgment, throw light on the divisiveness so clearly apparent. The noisier the talk about Black Power, the less unity there has been and the less effectively have blacks been able to marshal such power as they possessed. The points we would make in relation to this overall situation are these:

(1) Whenever a minority of a minority begins to use inflammatory revolutionary rhetoric, it is a sign either that agents provocateurs have moved in or, worse, that sincere fanatics within the movement are functioning as spies, stool pigeons and infiltrators. Currently there is every reason to believe that this has happened with many Black Nationalist groups. Revolutions are not made by talk alone. In the classical sense revolutions are very complex phenomena, involving theory, preparation, a weighing of values, considerations of strategy and tactics and (in this respect Marxist doctrine is sound) a situation in which the ruling class is no longer able to rule. The flamboyant speechmaking of some Black Nationalists has not only alienated elements that might conceivably have augmented Black Power; it has contributed to the disunity that exists among black Americans. A Negro leader who does not indulge in this kind of oratory is likely to find his leadership challenged by one who does. The effect is to create a competition in demagoguery.

(2) Gunnar Myrdal was not the first to point out that the American dilemma is created by the circumstance that the Negroes are a minority. The colonial or liberation analogy does not apply—certainly not tactically—because the blacks are not about to oust their white colonial oppressors. While black revolutionary activists can cause considerable disorder, they cannot subdue the white majority. Moreover, there is a large—and growing—Negro middle class, not bewitched by Black Nationalist proposals and promises, and highly unlikely to follow such leadership now or in the future.

(3) It is quite true that some of the forms of cooperation, coalition politics and the like, are outmoded. But in the absence of a practical program, of a theory of action, the rhetoric of Black Power leads increasingly to concepts that are equally outmoded and illusory. One of these is the repeatedly discredited notion of a sovereign Black Power republic, which became the Communist Party line of the thirties after Stalin's famous pamphlet on the minorities question. It was never accepted by the bulk of American Negroes for two sound reasons: it was impossible of achievement and even if it had been possible many would not have cared to live under it. The Communist Party finally abandoned this chimera, although there was some attempt to revive it on the left-wing cocktail circuit in the postwar period. It is most depressing, then, to hear a dissident CORE leader seriously propose the formation of a black republic embracing all the south-eastern states, including Maryland, Virginia and Kentucky. The talk about an autonomous black republic is as irrational as the notion of "black capitalism" in the Negro ghettos, and stress on control of ghetto institutions phrased so as to imply an apartheid "solution."

(4) Fortunately there are indications that in the wake of the post-1966 detour there could be a return to sanity.

The new head of SNCC, Phil Hutchings, 26 years old, sounds as if he might have the qualities the times call for. He is reported to be quiet, thoughtful, the kind of man who does his homework. In his first post-election speech, he talked about Socialist revolution rather than black revolution. He is quoted as saying, "We want to put something in [the Negro's] head before putting a gun in his hand, as Chairman Mao said. . . . We must get angry and smart at the same time. The man wants riots. . . . He has armed his police force and he would welcome the chance to kill black people. We've got to move on all levels and on all fronts—angry but smart." Obviously Mr. Hutchings is not pussyfooting, but he seems to know the score.

The Innocents

Periodically a high West German official tries to explain why he joined the Nazi party and how guiltless he was in the Nazi extermination of 6 million Jews. In the latest such episode, the Chancellor himself offered his apologia.

The occasion was the trial of Fritz Gebhard von Hahn, accused of complicity in the murder of more than 30,000 Bulgarian and Greek Jews in 1942-43, when he was a member of the Jewish department of the German Foreign Ministry. Hahn's lawyers called the Chancellor as a witness to establish that Hahn could not have known the Jews were being murdered. Herr Kiesinger was glad to oblige, since the East German press agency had been accusing him of participation as "an active and convinced" Nazi, and the trial afforded him a forum for his own defense.

During the war years, the Nazi Foreign Ministry had a radio-monitoring department that recorded foreign broadcasts, including those which dealt with what was happening to the Jews in Germany and in countries which were on the German side or had been invaded by the Germans. Kiesinger was deputy chief of that division.

"Naturally," he testified, "I heard reports about the fate of Jews from many sources during the war. In the beginning I found these reports incredible, but I gradually began to realize that something was not right about what was happening to the Jews" (New York Times, July 5). Until this revelation dawned on him, he assumed the Jews were being sent to work "in munitions or places like that." On the basis of Kiesinger's testimony, the defense argued that Hahn could not have known the Jews he was transporting to Treblinka and other camps were going to their deaths.

Either the good Germans who were only doing their duty during the war years are lying now, or else they were astonishingly stupid then. Hitler and Goebbels had made it perfectly plain that they were planning the "final solution" of the "Jewish question" and were only awaiting the war to put the plan into execution. As long as they were not actually stationed at an extermination camp, the Germans involved in the disposal of the Jews have pleaded as one man that no suspicion entered their heads (until Germany was losing the war and they knew an explanation might be required) that mass murder was afoot.

In their association with the Nazi party they were all equally innocent. Kiesinger explained that he had joined in 1933, "but not out of conviction or opportunism." If it was not conviction, what else could it have been but opportunism? Every German politician not an unquestionable anti-Nazi has represented himself as a good man led astray. It has become the most tiresome act in the world, and the Chancellor is no better in the role than the small-time Nazis who have played it before him.

The Sluggish Logistical Tail

Sen. William Proxmire called the attention of the Congress to the most recent issue of the Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report which, he said, "makes clear beyond doubt that the fiscal 1969 defense budget can be cut by at least $10.8 billion without impairing in the slightest way our level of national defense. Indeed combat effectiveness is being held down by extraneous equipment and a sluggish logistical tail." [See also article by Charles Rabb, p. 46 this issue.]

This figure is not something conjured out of thin air. The writers were from their data to high-ranking logistics officers in the Pentagon, some of whom are not without conscience. These sources suggested the following breakdown of cuts which would actually improve combat capability (amounts given are in millions of dollars):

Anti-ballistic-missile system (ABM)	1,100
Bomber defense system (SAGE)	1,000
Surface-to-air missiles	850
Manpower (all four services)	4,200
Tactical aircraft programs (Army, Navy, Air Force)	1,800
Anti-submarine carrier forces	400
Attack carrier forces	360
Amphibious forces and fast deployment logistic ships (FDLs)	500
Manned orbiting laboratory	600
Total	10,810

The cuts are based on elimination of what the CO sources described as "fat"; overlapping weapons systems, or those of doubtful combat effectiveness, surplus manpower, etc. SAGE, for instance, continues to be deployed against "weak and outmoded" Soviet bomber forces and is for the most part itself outmoded—if it ever was operative at all. Separate helicopter fleets are maintained by the Army and the Air Force.

As for manpower, the Army alone has a total strength of 1,550,000, with 360,000 in combat units, 1,080,000 in support roles beyond those in direct support of combat units, and 110,000 classified as "transients," men en route between assignments. CO's sources argued that the "transient" category should be eliminated; as one well-placed civilian put it, "let them take it out of their hide as a corporation would." That reduction, plus a 10 per cent reduction in support forces, would yield a reduction of 218,000 troops, with estimated savings of almost $2.2 billion. Equivalent cuts in the Navy would save $900 million, in the Air Force $675 million, in the Marine Corps $400 million.

A Pentagon source cited the current stationing of three carriers in the waters off North Vietnam as an illustration of "irrationality" in carrier deployment. Two carriers must be kept in support for every one on line—a total of nine attack carriers tied up in the war. "We could phase out six of those carriers," the source said, "by pulling only two out of Vietnam, leaving one there for the purpose of keeping Naval Air current in combat experience. Then, at far less cost, we could achieve the same aircraft strength by redeploying land-based aircraft from areas throughout the Pacific."

But will these savings be effected? Judging from past experience, only a fraction of the cuts will be made. Most of the fat will remain. Defense Secretary Clark M. Clifford told a June 20 press conference that the Administration would probably impose cuts of $2 to $3 billion, as part of the $6 billion reduction in the 1969 budget imposed by Congress. One Pentagon source in favor of the $10.8 billion cut found it surprising that Clifford would accept any reductions at all, in view of "pressures from the military and defense industries to keep the budget intact."

Pressures from the old-line politicians are in the same direction. Richard M. Nixon, for instance, denounces the Administration for encouraging Americans to believe they could "go on enjoying guns and butter," but he regards any defense budget cuts at all as "irresponsible and dangerous."

The irresponsibility and the danger lie in the existence of a fantastically overgrown military establishment, able to resist any attempts to cut it down to a reasonable size, despite the recognition by officers that the logistics are indefensible. In the meantime the cities are starved and the social disorganization of the entire country grows apace.

Soviet-American Sobriety

The first direct linking of New York and Moscow by commercial flights represents the latest of many bridges constructed between the two countries in recent weeks. Probably by prearranged signals, the adoption of the non-proliferation treaty by the UN General Assembly opened the gates to a series of moves designed to explore further the areas of mutual U.S.-Soviet interest and to promote agreements likely to stabilize the overall world situation for some time.

The most spectacular aspects of the current Russian mood for a détente are the quick answer of Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko to President Johnson's proposals to reopen bilateral negotiations on offensive and defensive missiles (aborted over a year ago for lack of a Soviet response) and the prompt and businesslike release of the American transport plane bound for Vietnam, which wandered over the Kurile Islands. Likewise, the appeals for a better relationship with Moscow made by President Johnson cannot be ascribed merely to a desire on his part to leave his mark on history as a man dedicated to peace despite the Vietnamese War. Neither can one pass over the quick acknowledgment by Washington of the faulty course of the DC-8 troop transport, or the purely formal nature of the protests made by the U.S. Government over the new East German regulations limiting freedom of access to West Berlin.

There are many other signs. Working relationships between the American and Soviet delegations at the United Nations have been—from the account of the participants themselves—cordial and fruitful. The Soviet memorandum of July 1 opened new avenues on the subject of disarmament, not so much in terms of new proposals as in the seriousness of the tone used and the concrete nature of the points made. After the treaty banning nuclear weapons from outer space, the Soviet Union has joined the United States in the search for ways of preventing military use of another new environment, the sea bed. U.S.-Soviet collaboration in atomic research seems likely in the near future, as American physicists prepare to work at the world's most powerful atom smasher, near Moscow.

Perhaps more important for the present, both the United States and the Soviet Union have started anew to push for a solution to the Middle East problem. While the new American representative to the UN, Ambassador George Ball, has left on a trip to Israel and to three Arab capitals, the Soviet memorandum of July 1 promises negotiations with the West to limit the arms race in the Middle East—a pledge which is conditional, however, upon the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Arab-occupied territories, as President Nasser demanded during his recent visit to Moscow. This is a case where the two superpowers, no matter how eager to reach a settlement, may not be able to bend their client states to their wishes, but they seem determined to try, step by step, in all earnestness.

UN observers attribute this remarkable trend to a number of factors. The first is, of course, the initiation of peace talks on Vietnam, with the cautiously confident hope that they will lead to a settlement. Present American politics and public opinion must reassure Moscow that not even a change in the administration next January could reverse the trend, and that no matter who occupies the White House he is not likely to involve the country soon in another adventure of this type.

Moscow, always fearful of escalation in Vietnam, cannot be more intransigent than the representatives of Hanoi, who are themselves defying Peking in holding talks with U.S. ambassadors-at-large. The North Vietnamese, incidentally, also met in Paris with UN Secretary General U Thant, to whom the People's Republic of China had insultingly returned, unopened, a friendly message a few days before.

Peking's increasingly menacing posture toward the Soviet Union, its systematic isolation from all international intercourse, and its reported recent achievements in the field of intercontinental ballistic missiles all certainly play a large part in Moscow's present moves toward a détente with the United States. On the American side, the danger to the dollar, increased by fantastically large military spending, prompts a reassessment of the orientation of the economy, especially with the themes of poverty and racial unrest beginning to rival Vietnam in the Presidential campaign.

Regardless of the different values in the United States and Russia, there is a need felt in both countries to consolidate the established order, as opposed to "adventurism." In terms of the present philosophy of the Kremlin, adventurism may well be applied to the lonely attempt of Che Guevara and his band to implant armed revolutionary struggle in Bolivia and other parts of Latin America. It can also be a label for student uprisings against the Establishment, in France as well as in countries of Eastern Europe. In contrast to irresponsible dogmatism, a "responsible" policy requires "responsible" actions, based on the solid foundations of power and peace. For the United States, responsible conduct means the yielding of slogans and ideological crusades before the realities of a runaway economy and civil strife.

ANNE TUCKERMAN

Those Idle Millions

In The Nation of October 23, 1967, Steve Pelletiere of the San Francisco Chronicle reported on a campaign that the Registrar of Charitable Trusts of the state of California was then conducting to force the local division of the American Cancer Society to stop hoarding funds it had received as gifts or bequests and start spending more of these funds for the purpose intended—namely, research or aid to cancer victims. In the wake of this article the national board of directors meeting in New York passed a resolution, binding on all affiliates, which limited their yearly reserves to an amount not exceeding 10 per cent of their latest annual crusade income.

Not only has the San Francisco division now distributed a $1.5 million Program Supplementation Fund, referred to in Mr. Pelletiere's article, but it has assured state authorities that the so-called Dernham Funds—a $2 million bequest of some years back—will be fully committed by 1976.

The success of this effort by a vigilant state agency, under the able direction of Frederic C. Auforth, suggests that if similar action could be initiated at the federal level it might stimulate the flow of charitable funds to the projects for which they were intended. As the California authorities point out, the issue has never been one of malfeasance but of overcoming the innate tendency of fund-raising organizations to nurture "reserves" which just might be useful, on some rainy day, to pay salaries, pensions and other administrative expenses.

Flying Young Man

Toronto

"This election has been a disgraceful surrender to a puffed-up radical after a campaign consisting entirely of adulation and idolatry. The nation has given itself up to a man it does not know and should not trust." "This election shows that Canada is imbued with a new sense of purpose and direction; it shows that the spirit of Expo has taken hold and has flowered into a new vision; it shows that Canada is prepared to gamble, to change, to look to the future instead of the past."

The truth is . . . the truth is that both of these composite quotations are true, for political truth is, after all, relative to the position of the observer. And in Pierre Elliott Trudeau, 48, Canada's Liberal Party leader and

Prime Minister, Canadians can see many truths, almost as many as there are observers.

For the old guard, and the old-style politicians in particular, the election was indeed a disaster. For them the Trudeau style is anathema. It holds nothing for them; it is too new. His sex appeal—it has been the subject of fascinated and learned debate in Canadian political journals—is alarming; his mastery of the media (his manipulation of his television "image" is complete) is to be distrusted; his pragmatism and eschewal of old-line labels and dogma are distasteful. Why, look at the man: a bachelor, an unconventional dresser, a kisser not of babies but of blondes, a wearer of sandals and a driver of fast cars. Why, he's actually been to China!

To the Conservatives (and conservatives) these things are suspect. They disdainfully called him Plaza Pierre, from his campaign tactic of impromptu meetings in shopping plazas. Whispering campaigns denounced by the hierarchy circulated, hinting at his own lack of morals and his "pinkish" political complexion.

These were some of the reasons why the Conservatives didn't like Pierre Trudeau before the election, but after the vote was counted they had more compelling reasons: Because he showed them that they were wrong, were out of date. He left the Conservative Party (led by Robert Stanfield, a nice, solid, respectable man from Nova Scotia) in ruins. He reduced it from a potent national force to a disgruntled agrarian rump. He swept all its most articulate spokesmen from Canadian cities. He even made inroads into the old Tory strongholds on the Prairies. He gathered in enough votes to form Canada's first majority government (155 seats in a 264-seat House) for ten years.

The Trudeau administration will have no problems with the Conservatives. His majority is large enough to enable him to govern effectively without too much hindrance. His real problems will come from his own followers—from the emotion he has generated among the alienated and disaffected. His personal magnetism has swept up the youth of the country and has delivered them into the political mainstream. His problem will be to keep them there.

During the campaign Trudeau made few specific proposals, delivered few of the specific promises to individuals and pressure groups that have hobbled many a politician before him. He came to power unencumbered by political debts. But these are the old-style debts, the old-style pledges. To his followers he has delivered another pledge, a far greater pledge, that of a new style, a new spirit, a new and exciting sense of purpose and of destiny. He has caught up a new generation of young Canadians in an outburst of enthusiasm far greater than anything Canadian political life has known. It will be difficult to deliver what they want.

Whatever the outcome of the election, there was bound to be some disillusion. If Trudeau had lost, it is possible—and likely—that the youth of the country would have turned their backs on the political process and their leader as thoroughly as the youth of the United States seem to have turned their backs on President Johnson. Now the young have their hero, with no clear idea of what they want him to do. The parliamentary system, even more than the Presidential system, does not encourage heroics.

Trudeau is aware of this, and to some extent welcomes it. It was reported that he was becoming uneasy about the hysteria of some of his young admirers. Uneasy and a little scornful: the man does not suffer fools easily. But he cannot afford to thwart the revolution of expectation entirely, either for his own sake or for that of the government. Involvement in the political process has been one of the main themes of his campaign and now he has to make it work. Watching to see how and if he achieves this goal will provide much of the political interest here in the coming months.

When Parliament resumes in September, Trudeau will have to deliver specific answers to special problems. Somehow he will have to juggle the specifics of inflation, unemployment, a national housing crisis, and an unwilling, cumbersome, traditionalist bureaucracy against his own remarkable personal prestige and come up with answers that promise to continue the sense of renewal he has started. If he succeeds—as he may—none will quibble; if he doesn't, his critics (and his followers) will cut him down at the polls next time as they have cut down other leaders in the past who opened a road they were unable to travel.

MARQ DE VILLIERS

Advice to Hacks and Radicals

On both local and national levels, political machines tend to run the most respectably conservative and issue-shy candidates that they estimate their constituents will tolerate. To them the "lesser evil" epithet rings like "safe and sound"; to them the victory of a candidacy based exclusively on political principle would bring a reassignment of power within the party—a possibility too anxiety-producing for career politicians to consider.

A New York State Democratic Committeeman was elected June 18 whose campaign might serve as lesson and example to both party hack and radical: To hack: it can be advantageous, electorally speaking, to stick your neck out and suicidal not to. To radical: you can succeed in electoral politics without compromising on the issues. Michael Colen, a member of Students for a Democratic Society at Columbia University, and occupant of Fayerweather Hall during the Columbia rebellion, won 60 per cent of the vote in the Manhattan Democratic primary against a candidate of the Riverside Democrats. Although a Reform club, it has enjoyed hegemony over Morningside Heights as safe as that of any old-line machine in Brooklyn.

Mr. Colen, who is working for a doctorate in political theory at Columbia, studied the "educational campaign" of Ramparts editor, Robert Scheer, who in 1966 ran for Congress in California and got 49 per cent of the vote. Fifteen months ago, Colen founded the Morningside Independents, which ran him for District Leader on the then radical platform of disendorsement of Johnson and immediate withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam; he received 30 per cent of the vote against the Riverside candidate. MI canvassers were instructed to include "immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Vietnam" in their opening statement to voters, and to limit discussion to issues and ideology.

POLLS AND THE RIGHT TO 'NO'

DON H. MUCHMORE

Mr. Muchmore is chairman of the board of The State Poll (syndicated by the Los Angeles Times). Opinion Research of California, Opinion Surveyors and Market Surveys. As a confidential political pollster he has worked with hundreds of candidates, ranging from Republican to Democrat, and Liberal to Conservative. He also has been a professor of political science and the vice chancellor of the California State Colleges.

Anyone who had received a nickel for every statement by political observers that nothing is predictable in election year 1968 would by now be a very rich man, even given the state of the current inflationary economy. It has become a cliché that where this year's politics are concerned, all bets are off, anything goes. The very concept of political predictability has come to be regarded with a jaundiced eye.

Such an attitude is understandable enough. An election year which has seen abrupt withdrawals, re-entries and reassessments by major political figures, third party candidacies, the refusal of an incumbent President to stand for re-election, and the assassination of a second Kennedy, is certainly a year in which predictions about the future are perilous indeed.

The results of many Congressional primary contests—the Lausche, Morse and Kuchel elections come particularly to mind—have served to confound the prognosticators further. A major television network with a long record of correct election night projections failed badly for the first time in the Kennedy-McCarthy contest in the California primary.

As a result, the notion has arisen that in political 1968 all is indeed chaos, that there is a total resistance on the part of the political processes to conform to any rule at all; or rather, the rule seems to be that there is no rule. But, as poets and politicians often remark, things are not always what they seem. So it shouldn't be surprising that in the midst of what seems to be total anarchy, a reliance on predictability on the part of political professionals should be one of the salient, if unsung, features of the current political scene.

What I refer to is the developing importance of the political poll to the political process. The pollster's public role is well known. In the present campaign Governor Rockefeller has made particular use of the polls to try to gain momentum for his candidacy. What is less generally known is the role opinion samplers play as private polling services for political clients.

Using increasingly sophisticated methods, a profusion of polling and sampling concerns has arisen, with the usual motive of providing candidates and professionals in the political field with information about the attitudes of the electorate. The demands placed on such pollsters by the needs of professional politics have necessitated a much greater sophistication about the kinds of information pollsters can provide for their clients. Accuracy is generally higher than formerly, especially among analysts working for candidates rather than for the news media. (An error of prediction may be embarrassing to a newspaper; it can be fatal to a candidate.)

Today's pollsters are concerned with more than immediate statistical information (so-called "position" statistics, ranking candidates on the basis of raw popularity and potential electability). What is demanded by office seekers, and what must be provided by pollsters, are sophisticated and subtle analyses of the whole spectrum of voter response. In addition to the determination of the candidate's image among his electorate (almost the least important factor to be determined), the pollster must provide a thoroughgoing analysis of the issues likely to be involved in the campaign.

The identification and development of issues becomes a key aspect of the opinion analyst's assignment. The analyst must combine expertise in the development of issue-oriented information with extensive knowledge of practical politics and campaign strategy. In addition, each pollster has his own emphasis which supplements and illuminates the purely quantitative.

As polls and opinion samples have gained in importance, the inevitable charges of manipulation of the public have been made. The notion that a politician, by determining through confidential polling exactly what his public wants to hear, can then cynically dispense those statements to gain maximum support—thus proceeding from one "rigged" victory to another—has gained currency in certain quarters. But politicians willing to tell the public only what it wants to hear have always been with us and probably always will be. To dispense with a useful tool, simply because ill use is made of it by some, seems shortsighted.

To a political leader of strong commitments to the democratic process, the confidential poll can be a useful tool. Polls give him extensive knowledge of the public frames of reference in which his ideas will be received. It is an obvious help to a politician to know in what terms to communicate his ideas, not only for his own benefit but also for the benefit of his listeners. Obviously, successful politics—successful democratic politics at any rate—involves a rapport between representatives and the electorate.

But how can anyone communicate with such a vast electorate as now exists? Sheer numbers present a communication barrier. Public opinion surveys can thus help inform a representative of the beliefs and attitudes of his constituents.

A properly constructed, issue-oriented public opinion survey will reveal the beliefs and attitudes of the population under scrutiny, its deep-seated convictions and hostilities. Such gut responses are critical to political planning because they reveal basic attitudes, subject to change only over considerable periods of time.

Sampling experience has shown that such bedrock response has a natural tendency to be negative. People generally become more involved in protests against rather than in support for particular issues or policies. Such negativism was shown, for example, in the "carpetbagger" issue that played a prominent role in the 1964 California Democratic primary. In the contest for the Senate, Pierre Salinger took heavy punishment on this count. Californians evidently being resistant to the idea of electing an "outlander." It wasn't until a confidential poll made clear what was occurring that Salinger was able to blunt the edge of this issue by repeated reference to his early years in the state.

Most gut issues are generally negative in character. Polling experience merely shows that endemic negativism is a natural feature of any political landscape. What seems to be out of the ordinary in the current political landscape is the presence of a radical epidemic negativism, virulent and extensive. For some time the electorate has vacillated in a mood of uneasiness, out of which this epidemic negativism has emerged.

Such negativism is expressed clearly in an examination of current political involvement. Although knowledge among the national electorate has increased substantially, personal involvement is on the decline. For instance, one survey indicates that three times as many people can identify their Congressmen today as could twenty years ago, but survey results in the same area show a decrease of 33 per cent in active involvement. In addition, the responses to polls and surveys have shown another significant change in character in the past two years. Whereas responses previously contained an element of problem-solving suggestions in areas of national life with which the persons polled were dissatisfied, current responses in these areas are almost totally negative. The American people seem less disposed to suggest alternative programs, but more disposed to verbalize their lack of satisfaction. The total effect suggests general and negatively oriented confusion.

A number of observers have noted this negativism. Kingman Brewster, Jr., president of Yale University, made some cogent remarks in connection with the assassination of Senator Kennedy when he referred to a "pall of negativism" sweeping the nation. "It is so much simpler to mobilize a legion under a negative slogan than to organize agreement on one out of an infinite number of affirmative possibilities."

Wherever such a widespread phenomenon as this negativism occurs, it is likely that at least part of the motivation for it lies particularly close at hand. In the present case, public opinion surveys show that American negativism is in part a result of the recent performance of the national government—in part a "spontaneous withdrawal of the mandate to govern" from the present Administration.

The Lausche, Morse and Kuchel experiences further indicate the public's no-confidence mood. Here were three veteran, highly regarded legislators, each favored to keep his seat in the Senate. But two of them were defeated, while the third, Morse, barely survived. The three are of disparate backgrounds, with disparate political views, running against different kinds of opponents; their chief point in common was their incumbency. And the public is displaying little confidence in incumbents, whatever their political stripe.

Although this negativism has already produced some "positive" results—the "resignation" of the President and the national Administration, the primary defeat of some incumbent legislators—its net effect has been generally disruptive. This is particularly true of the relationship between our adult middle class and its youth. The actions of college students, of young people parading in the streets, reflect repeated expressions of negativism at the middle-class American dinner table. Withdrawal from active politics by the adult community produces the appearance (if not the reality) of inadequacy in the normal political process.

The obvious result is the frustration of young people brought up to believe in a world susceptible to change. This leads inevitably to immediate, less constructive forms of political action. Hence sit-ins, draft card burnings, riots. It seems likely that such unorthodox political action will continue until there is a return of the general electorate to the normal political processes. In that connection the increased self-knowledge and understanding made available through the public opinion poll can be of service to the electorate.

There are some likely dangers connected with such knowledge. As an earlier observer pointed out, "An increase of knowledge increases sorrow." But without an increase of knowledge, together with the commitment that might follow from it, sorrow is not merely likely to result. It is certain to.

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated August 5, August 19 and August 26.

THE DRAFT CARD BURNERS

PETER W. MARTIN

Mr. Martin is associate professor of law at the University of Minnesota. From 1964 to 1967 he was an officer in the Air Force, assigned to the Office of the General Counsel to the Secretary of the Air Force.

Toward the end of June, a remarkable demonstration took place in Washington, across the street from the Supreme Court building. Twelve women, standing in a circle and holding hands, burned a dozen draft cards furnished them for that purpose by male anti-war protesters. Burning one's own draft card is no longer a phenomenon. This variation on the familiar ceremony is explained by the participants' desire to condemn not only the war and the draft but to protest as well (and perhaps circumvent) a recent Supreme Court decision, United States v. O'Brien. In that case, the Court upheld against constitutional challenge the puerile dare to dissenters issued by Congress in 1965: "Burn a draft card and you face up to five years in jail and a fine of $10,000."

The Columbia University uprising catalyzed a flood of commentary on the permissible limits of civil disobedience. Although much of it has come from lawyers (including such prominent men as Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas, Solicitor General Erwin Griswold, and ABA President Earl Morris), judgments about the propriety of civil disobedience—conduct that is by definition illegal—necessarily derive from moral rather than legal principles. Before an act of protest raises moral issues, however, it must be clear that it is in truth civil disobedience and not the perfectly lawful exercise of the right of free speech guaranteed by the First Amendment. The definition of this boundary of civil disobedience is a legal problem and was the task addressed by the Supreme Court in the O'Brien case.

The boundary is not so easy to discern as many statements of the issue would suggest. The typical, too-simple approach is epitomized by this comment of a judge, made while sentencing a convicted draft card burner:

You have the right of dissent. You have the right to disagree with those in authority. . . . But you have no right to violate the law simply because you disagree with it. If you have that right, then so does every other citizen. Instead of a free society, we have anarchy.

The dichotomy here drawn between dissent and violating the law is deceptively sharp. Concealed is the fundamental conflict which exists between the individual's right to all effective means of expression and society's interest in prohibiting harmful conduct, a conflict that demands some mutual accommodation.

The complexity of the issue not only marks it as an important constitutional question but also has relevance to moral judgments on borderline protest activity. As the moral logic of an individual's decision to disobey an unjust law is most often described, it requires weighing the fundamental value which the disputed law offends against the citizen's moral (not merely legal) obligation to adhere to laws established by democratic procedures. To the extent that the First Amendment casts doubt upon the illegality of the contemplated conduct, this moral dilemma is eased.

A citizen enjoys no automatic immunity when he disobeys a law because he considers it unjust. He does have a right, though, to ignore a law that is invalid because contrary, either generally or specifically as applied to him, to some superior law. Since there is no single definitive source of law under our form of government, such instances of invalidity are not unusual. With protest demonstrations the potential for conflict is particularly high because of the First Amendment's protection of speech. The guarantee of the right of free speech extends not only to traditional forms of expression, written and oral but also, to some extent, to conduct which symbolically expresses a point of view. It is this range of First Amendment protection that makes it no easy matter to distinguish civil disobedience from constitutionally shielded dissent.

On March 31, 1966, David O'Brien, then 19 years old, burned his Selective Service registration certificate, standing on the steps of the South Boston Courthouse before a sizable crowd that included members of the press. He was subsequently convicted of violating the criminal provisions of the Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1948, amended by Congress in 1965 to provide a $10,000 fine or five-year prison term for anyone who "knowingly destroys" or "knowingly mutilates" his registration certificate or classification notice (the "draft cards" of common parlance). O'Brien appealed, arguing that the First Amendment barred Congress from punishing his conduct. After mixed success in the U.S. Court of Appeals, his case reached the Supreme Court. Rarely has the Court had a better opportunity to clarify the relationship between free speech and civil disobedience.

The purpose of O'Brien's act was to communicate. He told the jury that he burned his draft card publicly "so that other people would re-evaluate their positions with Selective Service, with the armed forces, and re-evaluate their place in the culture of today, to hopefully consider my position." On the other hand, the statute in question merely prohibited conduct which arguably interfered with the administration of the Selective Service System, a matter of legitimate concern to Congress.

The Supreme Court's decision, written by departing Chief Justice Earl Warren, began by reiterating the Court's consistent unwillingness to recognize conduct as falling within the concept of "free speech" merely because its performance reveals a clear intention to convey an idea. As other courts speaking to this same issue have pointed out, using an example to which nerves are now only too sensitive, the political assassin surely cannot be permitted to argue that his act—expressive of deeply felt political views—is therefore immune from punishment.

But an equally intolerable extreme would be the view that nonverbal conduct, no matter how communicative, can be regulated or prohibited without regard for the First Amendment. The social importance of nonverbal protest has led one commentator to call it, quite aptly, the "poor man's printing press." And in any event, the Supreme Court is committed by precedent to a broader interpretation of "speech." Picketing and the display of a flag, for example, have been held to be protected forms of communication. Consequently, in the O'Brien case, the Court would have found it difficult to affirm the statute simply by labeling draft card burning "conduct" not "speech." Chief Justice Warren assumed for the purpose of the decision that under the circumstances O'Brien's act had enough of the elements of speech to compel consideration of the First Amendment.

The assumption that First Amendment interests were at stake by no means assured constitutional protection:

This Court has held that when "speech" and "non-speech" elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms.

A balance between the two interests, individual and governmental, must be struck. The balancing formula outlined in the O'Brien decision is comprised of three steps. Conduct which combines "speech" and "nonspeech" elements can be restricted or prohibited by Congress if: (1) the governmental interest supporting the regulation is "important or substantial"; (2) this same governmental interest is "unrelated to the suppression of free expression"; and (3) the restriction on expression is "incidental" and "no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest." It is difficult to fault this as an abstract statement of the balance which must be struck if the umbrella of the First Amendment is to be extended (as it must be) beyond pure verbal communication. Where the O'Brien opinion falls down is in its perfunctory application of this formula. In each step, the Court ignored factors which common sense insists are relevant.

The first two steps are closely intertwined: is there a governmental interest, unrelated to the suppression of expression which lies behind the statute forbidding the destruction of draft cards, an interest which is substantial, compelling or cogent? As the Court reaffirmed, Congress has authority to make all laws necessary and proper to the raising and supporting of armies, including laws providing for the registration and induction of individuals for training and service. From this base, the Court jumped to the following conclusion:

The issuance of certificates indicating the registration and eligibility classification of individuals is a legitimate and substantial administrative aid in the functioning of this system. And legislation to insure the continuing availability of issued certificates serves a legitimate and substantial purpose in the system's administration.

More precisely, what is this substantial purpose? O'Brien's attorney had belittled the importance of the requirement, on which the Court here relies, that a registrant keep his draft cards (both registration certificate and classification notice) in his possession at all times. The Court found the purpose, or rather purposes, in some of the suggestions made by the government attorneys arguing the case. The requirement permits, it was urged, a suspected delinquent to prove compliance with the law in a manner convenient both to him and the Selective Service System: it operates as a safeguard against mix-ups in the registrant's file; in the event of national emergency, the cards permit a rapid, on-the-spot call-up no matter how far the registrant is from his local board; they facilitate communication between registrant and the Selective Service, cutting down on unnecessary reference to files, furnishing the registrant continual access to his Selective Service number and local board's address—and so on.

The Court's pliant acceptance of these speculative justifications for the law would perhaps be appropriate in the case of a regulation under attack solely for an alleged lack of reasonable legislative purpose; but it is much too superficial for a major confrontation between the First Amendment and Congressional power. There are few prohibitions for which a set of theoretically plausible purposes, unrelated to expression, cannot be spun. On past occasions, the Supreme Court has been more ready to see through such fabricated "governmental interests" when First Amendment freedoms were in jeopardy.

Like so many features of the Selective Service System, the regulation that a registrant keep his draft cards continually in his possession is a thoughtless carry-over of a policy which originated several wars ago. Under the Selective Service Act of 1917, regulations required the possession of either the registration certificate or final classification card. Registrants had the duty to show the card to Selective Service or police officials when called upon to do so.

During March of 1918, nine months after the initial registration of 10 million men, the Justice Department organized the first "slacker raids" in Pittsburgh. "Slackers," those unpatriotic enough not to register, were rooted out. They were identified by their inability to produce a draft card. The greatest and last "slacker raid" took place in New York City, the first week in September, 1918. The Nation reported (September 14, 1918):

Men were torn from their wives' sides in the theatres, yanked out of street cars, pulled off milk-wagons and trucks of all kinds, which vehicles were left to stand where they were abandoned. Men from up-State and New Jersey—and there were thousands of them—who had no warning of the raid and had left their cards at home—were first taken to police stations and then to an armory, where everything was utter confusion and where many spent the entire night upon their feet. Numbers were held by the police who showed their registration cards, but were without their classification cards, which have never been issued by the draft boards of many up-State towns.

An estimated 75,000 were "arrested" in New York and near-by towns, fewer than 3 per cent of them turning out to be men who had not registered. Spurred by public outrage, President Wilson ordered an inquiry, and Congress condemned the raids.

Throughout World War II, the Justice Department was extremely careful to prevent a recurrence. Even during the concentrated delinquency campaign in early 1943, U.S. Attorneys were instructed that

Mass raids, large-scale arrests, and indiscriminate challenging of men of selective service age are not warranted in view of the relatively small number of reported delinquencies and because of embarrassment and inconvenience to law-abiding citizens which such practices would entail.

But the possession requirement was not dropped.

Then, as now, willful nonpossession of a draft card, being the violation of a regulation, was a crime. But during the war, of 15,758 convictions for draft law violations, only 255 were for failure to possess draft cards. The 1946 annual report of the director for the Federal Bureau of Prisons describes those guilty of these technical violations as "mostly socially inadequate individuals of low intelligence who were simply careless about their obligations under the act. Many of these came to the attention of the authorities through arrests for vagrancy or on other minor charges, and, because they did not possess draft cards, were given Selective Service Act violation sentences."

In short, from the suspension of "slacker raids" in World War I until the burning and returning of draft cards became a common form of protest against the war in Vietnam, the duty to keep them on one's person amounted to an atrophied regulation, and found its only vitality as a snare for a few unfortunates. Under such circumstances, a strong presumption is cast against the claims of those who find underlying it a "compelling" governmental interest.

Current treatment of the regulation by the government suggests that the major effect of the requirement is to provide a means of punishing those who violate the regulation as a form of dissent. If there were any significant concern with the sorts of problems enumerated by the Court, one would expect that violations by nondissenters would be taken more seriously. Yet neither the regulation nor supporting criminal provisions are systematically applied against the large numbers of American men who fail to carry their draft cards. In the first draft card burning case, U.S. District Judge Harold Tyler, Jr., conceded: "... almost certainly thousands of men in recent decades, including the writer, have unwittingly failed to carry their cards at all times without ever having been called to show or produce them." The government's true view of the regulation (until dissent clouds the picture) is that it is a mere technicality. If the registrant who has violated such a technical provision of the regulations is willing to cure his "delinquency" the Justice Department, as a general rule, does not prosecute. No doubt a principal reason for the lack of across-the-board enforcement is the severity of the penalty. The fact that there is no reluctance to apply the sanction when nonpossession is part of protest activity reveals the actual interest served by the provision, which is very clearly the punishment of protest and the suppression of dissent.

O'Brien's argument on this score relied on two other points, the circumstances under which the bill was enacted and statements made by the bill's supporters, which betrayed a desire to limit dissent. He cited Congressman Bray's diatribe on "Beatniks and so-called 'campus-cults'" who had "been publicly burning their draft cards to demonstrate their contempt for the United States and our resistance to Communist take overs," and the "filthy, sleazy beatnik gang led by a Yale University professor" which "just yesterday" demonstrated in Washington for the Vietcong.

The Supreme Court rejected this evidence of motive with a statement of its traditional, and justifiable, reluctance to strike down legislation on the basis of what some of the legislators may have said before voting. The Court's detached search for a governmental interest seems just as unacceptable, however. To consider the circumstances of enactment as evidence of the governmental interest embodied in a statute is not subject to this same objection. And unless examined, symbolic protest activity is in jeopardy. A legislative body that chooses statutory language with care to avoid a prohibition which "on its face" is aimed at expression and to lay the foundation for a colorable claim of "substantial governmental interest" can vitiate First Amendment rights unless subject to deeper judicial scrutiny.

It is hard to imagine a case in which the events surrounding enactment could speak more clearly of the actual interest served by the legislation. Draft card burning emerged as a form of protest in the summer of 1965. When U.S. troops entered openly into the Vietnamese fighting in June and the force level rose, the draft and military recruitment became natural foci of anti-war sentiment. On July 29, 1965, about 400 people protesting the war picketed an army recruiting center in New York City. During the rally, several young men burned their draft cards. A week later, Rep. Mendel Rivers introduced a bill to make destruction of draft cards a crime.

There seems little doubt that the draft law already furnished a means of punishing this form of protest. After burning his draft card, the protester had no way of complying with the regulation's command that he keep his card in his possession at all times. For willful violation of that regulation he faced criminal penalties. Nevertheless, Congress recognized a serious threat to the war effort and moved with unprecedented dispatch to pass the Rivers bill.

Before a month had passed, it had been enacted into law.

The fact that certain conduct has gained widespread use as a symbol of protest before restrictive legislative action occurs cannot, of course, be permitted to tie the hands of Congress where there is truly "compelling" governmental interest in controlling the conduct. But it should lead a court to demand greater evidence of a substantial interest unrelated to the suppression of expression than could be offered for this statute.

The ultimate disappointment of the O'Brien decision is its failure to give any serious discussion to the final stage in the balancing formula initially set forth by the Court, i.e., whether "the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedom is no greater than is essential to the furtherance" of the governmental interest underlying the regulation.

No doubt the Supreme Court considered this "an indirect and minimal abridgment of speech," to adopt a phrase used by the U.S. Court of Appeals (second circuit) in another draft card burning case. Yet for a number of reasons this mode of communication has great value, particularly to the American male under 21, so that its prohibition is no minor limitation on expression, notwithstanding the continuing unrestricted right "to criticize national policy as vigorously as [one desires] by the written or spoken word." O'Brien was denied direct participation in the democratic processes of change. He was too young to vote. The issue he addressed is one of the most momentous this nation has ever faced. Of course, he had the right to write and speak; but access to large-scale communication media in America comes at a high price. The failure of Congress to confront the issues of Vietnam made the need for a forceful appeal to the public all the more urgent.

Nor should it be forgotten that O'Brien, like most protesters against the war, sought to raise not just points of national policy (and morality) but also to challenge U.S. conduct on legal grounds. The courts, in which the Southern Negro found redress, have consistently closed their doors to arguments that the war is illegal in terms of our own constitutional processes and applicable international law. They have characterized these as "political questions" which are therefore nonjusticiable. Judge Ford refused to admit evidence or argument on the legality of the Vietnamese War in the Spock-Coffin conspiracy trial for precisely these reasons. Because of this doctrine of abstention, unrepresented young men are being required to serve in a war that they consider not only immoral but illegal, and are denied the opportunity to have their legal questions dealt with on the merits.

In this context, to characterize the restriction on expression which flows from the prohibition of draft card burning as "incidental" is unrealistic. Congressional reaction to a handful of burnings attests to the power of the symbol. The public burning of a draft card expresses with unique force the individual's stand on the Vietnamese War and the draft.

The misfortune of the O'Brien opinion is not to be found in its effect on David O'Brien. Nor does the misfortune lie in the decision's effect on future draft card burners. To the protester who makes the difficult decision to engage in dissent by returning his draft card or burning it, the moral issue is now only somewhat sharpened by the certainty that such conduct is not protected by the First Amendment and thus must be undertaken as a true act of civil disobedience. Instead, the misfortune, felt by the entire public, is that the country is now denied uninhibited expression of important views on a crucial issue in a singularly dramatic form. Added to this specific loss is the long-term danger that Congress and state legislatures will take the O'Brien decision as an invitation to eliminate other unpopular techniques of protest.

This last worry is not farfetched. On June 25, Congress, likely encouraged by the O'Brien case, passed a bill prohibiting the burning or other deliberate mutilation of the flag. Fortunately, the Supreme Court has an immediate opportunity to halt this ripple effect; it has already agreed to review a New York Court of Appeals decision which upheld New York's flag burning statute against the challenge that it violated freedom of speech.

Completeness requires the final, probably futile, observation that Congress could undo the foolishness of the present draft card law. Should it ever get around to acting on Sen. Edward Kennedy's thoroughly commendable proposed revision of the Selective Service Act this is one more item that deserves attention. Senator Kennedy's bill makes no change in the criminal section of the Act. It should. The Act ought to be amended to distinguish the serious offenses of attempted evasion and deceptive use of draft cards from minor technical violations like non-possession or destruction. The latter hardly warrant punishment, at most a small fine. Better still, the anachronistic possession requirement ought to be eliminated.

MILITARY 'SOFTWARE'

CHARLES RABB

Mr. Rabb is a reporter in the Washington bureau of the New York Daily News.

While campus militants mount protests against university research to aid the Vietnamese War, the Pentagon's non-military research program continues to thrive in virtual anonymity. Project Camelot—that abortive Pentagon study of revolution in Latin America—was only a quick glimpse beneath the surface. In fact, so little is known about defense research in the social and behavioral sciences and foreign policy fields that recent disclosures about the extent of the program came as a surprise to Senators who have been voting money for it for years.

Operating under the protective umbrella of national security, the Pentagon can usually get what it wants from Congress. Thus, it is able to finance a wide-ranging "software" research program—projects, that is, apart from its basic and weapons research—which frequently has little relevance to defense needs and might more usefully be carried out by other agencies of government.

Much of this research—underwritten at premium prices—appears to be tied more closely to a researcher's interest than to a military need. Some of it is of dubious quality or merely self-serving.

That is the pattern that emerges from a recent study of the Pentagon's nonmilitary research program by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The indictment falls most heavily on the Defense Department, but does not exempt the Congress, which uncritically votes Defense funds, or the many social, political and behavioral scientists who are willing beneficiaries of the Pentagon's largess.

The record of lavish Pentagon spending for non-military research was compiled by the committee under the direction of its chairman, J. William Fulbright. It is part of what may be the most determined effort since post-World War II days to challenge some of the basic policy underlying multibillion-dollar defense programs.

The challenge is a symptom of frustration over the war in Vietnam and the Senate's inability to gain an important voice in shaping the spiraling Defense budget. The showdown will come some time this month when a bill to provide the actual money for the $21.3 billion military procurement authorization for fiscal 1969 reaches the Senate.

Of these targets, the non-weapons research program is probably the most vulnerable. The skirmishing over research spending started with Fulbright and other war critics trying to pick holes in the Defense budget, but has now enlisted a growing number of Senators who are disturbed by the size and sweep of Pentagon research.

Sen. Karl Mundt (R., S.Dak.), seldom found in the company of doves, says he is "disenchanted with the way they have roamed all over the countryside with research money. It's pretty hard to justify in terms of national defense or any other activity." Mundt views the research budget as a member of the Foreign Relations and Appropriations Committees. It will be up to Appropriations to trim off some of the fat before the military bill reaches the Senate floor. Sen. John Stennis (D., Miss.), manager of the procurement authorization bill, indicated in floor debate his ignorance of the scope of the Pentagon's non-military research, and acknowledged that it had not been studied in detail by the Armed Services Committee before it approved the Pentagon's procurement figures.

According to varying Defense Department figures, either $34 million or $41 million is being handed out this year for nonmilitary studies in the social and behavioral sciences. Next year the Pentagon would like to increase the amount to $50 million. Senator Fulbright estimates current Pentagon spending for foreign policy studies at $27 million. This compares with a puny $125,000 State Department research budget. A spokesman says State is requesting the same amount for the new fiscal year and adds: "We'll be lucky to get that much."

The prospect of Pentagon generosity for such projects as "Experimental Study of Development of Consensus" ($20,000), "Great World Issues of 1980" ($49,782), "Porter-International Self-Help Study" ($252,949) and "Social Bases of Stable Political Systems" ($232,300) draws researchers like a magnet. By the Foreign Relations Committee's last count, more than 250 colleges and universities are involved in Department of Defense nonmilitary projects, despite Vietnam-inspired doubts as to whether the academic community should be so dependent on Pentagon benevolence.

And under Project Themis—a sort of research share-the-wealth program—forty-two institutions in thirty-one states were provided with long-term Pentagon financing in fiscal 1967, the first year of a program to develop fifty new research "centers of excellence" in areas not now getting substantial support. A total of 173 schools submitted 483 proposals in the hope of qualifying for "the minimum critical funding" of $200,000 annually.

It is difficult to imagine what use the Pentagon can make of many of the "software" studies it finances. Take, for example, "Quantitative Political Science." This project, the Pentagon says, "attempts to relate information about attributes of nations, such as size, population, gross national product, educational level, number of radios and number of farmers to other characteristics of nations such as occurrence of riots and revolutions and participation in external wars." Its chief sources are newspapers, the New York Times Index and the International Yearbook. For this, $595,000 is being paid to research teams at Hawaii, Southern California and Yale Universities.

Or consider "Comparative Research on Behavioral Change," now under way at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. According to Frederick W. Frey, the M.I.T. political science professor directing the project, it is a study of how individuals in different cultures respond to major social changes. Planned as a five-year $4 million project, it will include studies of three developing and two European societies, as well as the United States. It may be socially useful, but is somewhat remote from the responsibilities of the Defense Department.

Called before the Foreign Relations Committee to explain the Pentagon's need for many of these "software" studies, Dr. John S. Foster, Jr., director of Defense Research and Engineering, reasoned as follows:

Opportunities and capabilities for progress emerge from an understanding of how to deter war and build a peaceful world. Part of this understanding comes, in turn, from social and behavioral sciences research and foreign area assessments related to any contingency and area in which a substantial American commitment might occur. Research to support national security cannot be defined meaningfully in any other way.

This could be interpreted as meaning that, because U.S. troops might go anywhere, the Pentagon could justify almost any study. Or, as a Defense social sciences panel put it in a report to the Pentagon last year, "the Department of Defense must now wage not only warfare but peacefare as well."

Irving Louis Horowitz, author of The Rise and Fall of Project Camelot, called the panel's report "a statement that can easily be read as the ominous conversion of social science into a service industry of the Pentagon." Horowitz, a professor of sociology at Washington University, St. Louis, continued: "Most of the scholars who prepared this report have one striking similarity—they have powerful and simultaneous academic and government linkages. They move casually and easily from university to federal affiliation—and back again to the university."

Misgivings about the Pentagon's research role can also be found in the ranks of the military. Vice Admiral Hyman Rickover believes the military's emphasis on social science research detracts from its efficiency. There is, he feels, a too great tendency among military and other government people to "abrogate their technical responsibilities under the theory that their job is to manage, not to do technical work." Except at the top levels, he finds, there is very little service demand for nonmilitary research.

A substantial portion of the Pentagon research pie is divided among the "think tanks," which offer policy, planning and technical advice, mostly to government clients. Sixteen of what are classified as Federal Contract Research Centers receive at least 85 per cent of their funds from the Pentagon. These establishments, among the biggest of which are RAND and the Institute for Defense Analysis, will take in $294 million for "software" and "hardware" research this year and expect to be given $304 million next year. Seven of the sixteen have either a president or a vice president who came from the Pentagon payroll. Ivan A. Getting, former head of Air Force planning and development, earns $90,000 a year as president of Aerospace of Santa Monica, Calif., which is doing a business of $74 million a year, all but $1.8 million coming from the Pentagon.

IDA, a neighbor of the Pentagon in Arlington, Va., takes in $10.6 million from its fiscal 1968 Defense contracts. It earns less than $600,000 from other government and private clients. IDA's president, at $49,200 a year, is Gen. Maxwell Taylor, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and ex-Ambassador to South Vietnam, as well as a principal adviser on Vietnam to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson.

It was an IDA study that led to a tug of war between the Pentagon and Fulbright. The Foreign Relations chairman sought to make the Pentagon turn loose an IDA study of the national military command and control center operation during the Tonkin Gulf crisis. The study includes a general description of the Tonkin events—a subject of close scrutiny by the committee. The Pentagon doubted it would interest Fulbright since, it explained, the study was not an analysis of the whole situation and the author was thus not given information on official decisions. However, as an analysis of command and control operating procedures, the Pentagon added, "it proved quite useful and fully justified its cost of approximately $26,000."

Since last October Fulbright has also been trying to get the Pentagon to release a declassified version of "Pax Americana" ($89,500), later renamed "Strategic Alignments and Military Objectives." The Douglas Aircraft Company has been privately circulating its own unclassified version under the title "Projected World Patterns—1985." Fulbright, who has seen a classified version, says the study "recommends that large numbers of American troops be stationed abroad for the next decade."

If it were only a case of Pentagon dollars bankrolling questionable research, that would be serious enough. Actually, Defense contracts now current have the potential to become further Camelots, repeating the embarrassment caused the United States three years ago when it became publicly known that the Pentagon was underwriting an "internal-war" study in Chile and three other Latin American countries, much to the surprise and anger of the U.S. Ambassador in Chile.

Gerald D. Berreman, a University of California anthropology professor, withdrew from the Himalayan Border Countries project when he learned that it was being underwritten by the Pentagon ($282,840). In a letter to Fulbright, Berreman quoted an unnamed Indian "committed to furthering social science research in India" as saying that Pentagon sponsorship was "like sitting on dynamite."

While the sums involved may seem relatively insignificant in an $80 billion defense budget, the loosely supervised funding of research is an indication of how Congress votes Defense dollars. Apart from lacking the information necessary to resist effectively the pleas of the Pentagon's corps of specialized personnel, Congressmen show an obvious political reluctance to be on fighting terms with the Defense Department. As former Sen. Paul Douglas once remarked:

We are always afraid that if we vote for a reduction in a given expenditure, not only will our friends in the Defense Department criticize us but our opponents in our states and in our Congressional district back home will say: "When you voted to cut back the appropriation, you voted to weaken the preparedness program of the United States."

Thus, even Fulbright, who faces a troublesome challenge in the Arkansas Democratic primary, will fight to cut research and then wind up voting for the total procurement package. Senate Democratic leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) cast one of three dissenting votes against the procurement authorization when it passed the Senate in April by a lopsided vote. It was his way of protesting "the wasted billions which I believe are embodied in this measure."

There is no doubt that much of the responsibility for the Pentagon's growing social research program falls on the Congress, which is prodigal when voting research money for Defense and skinflint when supplying funds for other research. A bill to create a National Social Science Foundation, with federal support of $20 million a year, is still languishing in the Senate Government Operations Committee more than a year after Sen. Fred Harris (D., Okla.) and twenty other Senators introduced it.

The Senate could begin to correct this curious double-standard bookkeeping before the month is out. Thanks to Senator Fulbright and a few of the legislators who share his views, the Senators now have enough facts. It remains to be seen how much courage they have.

TITO DIGS THE STUDENTS

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Belgrade

Now that the tumult and the shouting have subsided—for the time being at least—it is possible to take a closer look at the week-long student protests which erupted here on June 2.

The Belgrade demonstrations were triggered by a relatively insignificant incident. An out-of-doors combination jazz concert and variety show had been scheduled for the evening of June 2, a Sunday. It had been planned primarily for the entertainment of "brigade workers," a young people's volunteer work corps, then engaged on a construction project near one of the student centers. At the last moment, because of bad weather, the concert was held indoors and, since seating facilities were limited, university students were not admitted. Very much annoyed, a crowd of students gathered outside and began to throw rocks at the concert hall; soon brigade workers and students were mixing it up in a lively fashion and the police were summoned. The next day the students staged a huge demonstration in the center of the city which was marked by considerable police brutality and a large number of arrests. But student-faculty action committees promptly took charge and the protests then assumed the form of more or less continuous talkathons in the several schools or "faculties," as they are called, of the university. At these sessions, the immediate issue—police brutality—was soon forgotten and the discussion ranged far and wide. The sessions were quite orderly; there were no further disturbances, but classes did not meet that week.

Then on June 9 Tito addressed the nation on television—the first time he has used television for an address of this sort. A real tour de force, the address was entirely conciliatory. Tito readily acknowledged the existence of legitimate grievances, promised that they would receive prompt attention, and conceded that the regime had for too long neglected student and university affairs. Apparently he had decided to use the demonstrations, which by then had received strong support from other university centers, from intellectuals and various groups—even the brigade workers sent a message of solidarity!—as a means of resuming his attack on conservative elements in the party. This campaign had been stalemated since July, 1966, when Alexander Rankovic, a former close ally and rumored successor, had been ousted. Prior to Tito's address, the Belgrade and Serbian authorities, including the police and the news media, had been hostile to the demonstrations. But after he had spoken, these elements promptly got into line. Although a handful of political dissidents had tried to exploit the demonstrations for their own ends, the students had made it clear, from the beginning, that they were not attacking the regime but were merely prodding it to make good on the reforms it had promised. Their demands had strong backing not merely from the faculty, including professors who have been critical of the regime from an orthodox Marxist point of view, but from many elements who were pleased to hear such demands voiced. Tito's address was hailed by the students as vindication of the protests; classes were resumed and final examinations proceeded on schedule. But while Tito's speech was politically astute—his reflexes are still quick and sure despite his 77 years—the basic issues have not been resolved and a second round of protests may well take place in the fall when the new term commences.

The formal demands of the students that emerged from the week-long sessions, and the response to these demands by the Central Committee, state the issues but do not get at the underlying causes. One of the editors of NIN suggested to me that these causes were primarily sociological in character, which is true—up to a point.

In the upsurge of national pride and aspiration in the postwar period, the Yugoslavs determined to have a university and college system second to none. Today the country ranks well toward the top of the list of nations in terms of the number of students enrolled considered as a percentage of total population. This remarkable expansion was not carefully planned. Little thought was given to the type of skills needed at this stage of the nation's development. For example, in terms of national needs, too many architects were graduated and not enough engineers and agronomists. To make matters worse, the expansion was superimposed on an archaic university structure jealously guarded by the usual academic vested interests. Age-old disciplines were emphasized; faculty salaries were low; classes were too large. Organizationally Belgrade University is a hodgepodge. Various schools or "faculties" are scattered about the city, each faculty being more or less autonomous. A discipline such as mathematics is represented not in a Department of Mathematics but by assignment of professors to the various schools or faculties. With approximately 40,000 students, many of them nonresidents, inefficient organization was a cause of mounting friction and dissatisfaction. The university has what is called a Student Town in which many of the poorest out-of-town students live. Officially it is supposed to accommodate about 8,000 students but 12,000 would be a more realistic estimate of the number actually living there.

Students and nonstudents arrive in Belgrade, cannot find accommodations, and simply move in with students they know who have been admitted to Student Town. Such conditions make for a high level of general confusion and dissatisfaction. Then too, students have been given only a peripheral role in university organization and administration. In brief, an explosive situation had been building up for quite some time. The regime admits that it had neglected students and university affairs largely because of the pressure of what seemed to be more urgent matters. More particularly, the regime concedes that it had lost touch politically with student opinion. But at several meetings this past spring, speakers had stressed the need for university reform and more attention to student problems. In fact the Central Committee had been studying these matters before the protests occurred, and one of Tito's criticisms was that the party had not sufficiently publicized the fact that such studies were being made.

At this level, therefore, the primary causes of the protests were sociological: a greatly enlarged student population, archaic university structures, and a failure to re-examine the aims and purposes of university education in the context of present-day Yugoslav conditions. But these causes have economic and political aspects. For one thing, the regime has not been able to provide adequate occupational and career opportunities for university graduates. Many (an estimated 70,000) of those who have received professional training have emigrated, not merely because better opportunities existed abroad but because, in many categories, there was little hope of immediate employment in Yugoslavia.

The general lack of occupational and career opportunities has an added sociological-political dimension which is itself a basic cause of student unrest. There is no room at the top or, as the students put it, there is a "block at the top." The undereducated bureaucrat who had a fine record as a partisan is not eager to retire in order to make way for a much better trained university graduate and, besides, he has friends and connections. A particular "self-management council" may be well aware that the aging partisan veteran should be replaced, but how is this to be done unless some other place can be found for him? Students feel that they are better prepared than many of those who now hold what are regarded as good positions; on the basis of merit, in terms of social efficiency, they feel that many of these "political" appointees, who have grown fat and complacent, should be removed, retired or reassigned. They do not object to high salaries; they object to the deadwood which is too often found in the upper reaches of the bureaucracies.

This general state of affairs is aggravated by other factors—for example, the generation gap. The older generation likes to indulge in memories of heroic wartime adventures. Today's students have little remembrance of the struggles of the partisan period; they are more concerned with the present and the future than with the glorious past. To many of them the struggle with Stalin is about as real as the depression is to most American university students. Here, too, a special irritant may be noted. Yugoslav educators did not revise the line of political instruction after 1948 so that many of today's students have been instructed in orthodox Marxist principles, not the revisionist variety. Many of them are more Marxist than the party Marxists; they take the promises of the revolution quite literally and see no reason why these promises should not be fulfilled here and now.

But it is much easier to define the causes of student unrest than to find solutions, for the regime is caught in a basic contradiction. Like the other East European countries, Yugoslavia must expand its trade if the economy is to expand. Since the early 1960s a major objective has been to make Yugoslav prices competitive on world markets. This means increased productivity, lower costs, greater operating efficiency and, eventually, convertibility. In a sense, today's unemployment and underemployment are consequences of these policy objectives. It is difficult to estimate how much unemployment exists since officials concede that the volume is greater than government statistics indicate. Of a population, say, of 20 million, Yugoslavia had a total of 3,560,000 gainfully employed in May, 1967, and estimates of 260,000 unemployed; but the unemployed figures rose to 338,000 in March, 1968, and to 350,000 in May, 1968 (these are official figures). But only those persons are counted as unemployed who had a job but are presently without one. The estimates do not include university graduates who have never held a job. Nor do they include the more than 350,000 Yugoslavs who are now working abroad—in West Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Sweden (notably in the Volvo plant), and other countries. For the time being the regime looks with favor on such employment as a stop-gap "safety valve"; many of these workers are learning important industrial skills and they transmit, as a group, large sums to relatives in Yugoslavia (the families remain at home). But since they are not immigrants but merely temporary residents of the countries where they are employed, it is assumed that they will return at some future date and that, when they do, jobs will have to be found for them. Nor do the official estimates of unemployment take into consideration the number of peasants who would like to take jobs in the cities if jobs were available. In prewar Yugoslavia the rural-urban ratio was 90 to 10; today it is approximately 50-50. The regime does not encourage rural-to-urban migration but, under a free labor policy, it cannot prevent it.

The Belgrade economists and social planners contend that it would be relatively easy to deal with unemployment if the regime could afford to change or modify present policy objectives. They argue that a closed Socialist society—that is, a society with strong centralized planning and controls—can simply create jobs by directing various state agencies and enterprises to add more workers. But in Yugoslavia the regime stresses decentralization and self-management. The self-management councils are eager to make a good record; they seek to increase productivity and minimize costs. Since this is exactly what the regime has directed them to do, it cannot ask them to add unneeded workers. Then, too, the self-management councils want to protect the interests of their members; adding new employees might increase competition within the council or disturb vested interests or reduce earnings.

There is, of course, a great need for public works but—so the planners say—the kinds of projects most needed involve the expenditure of relatively large sums for materials and equipment, much of which would have to be purchased abroad. And the benefits to be derived from these projects might be long deferred. Most officials agree that the best prospects for increased employment, consistent with present policy objectives, would be to pension older, less skilled workers and replace them with younger, better trained personnel; expand employment in the tertiary categories, services, trade, etc.; assist more workers to seek stop-gap employment abroad; and, finally, encourage foreign investment under laws recently adopted with this aim in mind. In the end, one is told, adherence to present economic policies will make it possible to expand employment opportunities to meet present needs. For the time being, however, the regime is caught in a short-term contradiction: it cannot deal adequately with existing unemployment and underemployment and at the same time pursue present policy objectives. No doubt the regime intends to cope with student demands for adequate job and career opportunities but will it be able to realize these goals soon enough to reduce existing tensions?

The student demand for the elimination of inequities—favoritism and the like—is, in a way, related to the issue of unemployment. When an educated elite is denied adequate career opportunities, it will naturally magnify existing inequalities. In many of the week-long meetings, students would cite examples of how this person or that had made enormous sums through illicit means. Stories were told of men who had somehow managed to acquire "a hundred trucks," etc. A recurrent charge was that the relaxation of travel restrictions—passports can be obtained from any travel agency—had made it possible to import goods which were then sold on the local market for exorbitant profits.

No doubt there is a measure of truth in these charges. But there is also little doubt that many of them are exaggerated. In certain sessions, faculty members were able to demonstrate that stories of great profits could not be reconciled with the facts recited. Favoritism and corruption exist. The lack of strong centralized controls creates opportunities for all kinds of conniving and finagling. But, say the planners, a systematic effort to eliminate such abuses would require reimposition of strong centralized controls and an end to the relative "openness" which exists today. And it would not be easy to reimpose tight controls; once started the trend toward an open society is difficult to reverse. In Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia the danger is not so much that relaxation of controls will create openings for "bourgeois" tendencies to surface as it is that a failure to make the reforms work may give the orthodox hard-line Marxists a chance to return to power.

On balance it is perhaps a good thing that the student protests occurred when they did, shortly before the examination period, for it gives the regime an opportunity to speed up implementation of promised reforms before the new term begins. But it will not be easy to abate student unrest for it requires, as Tito has said, "a faster and more resolute settlement of a large number of burning questions," few of which are directly related to university administration. In addition, one gets the feeling that the regime does not fully appreciate the magnitude of the task of university reform and reorganization that confronts it. Because the causes are so deep-seated, the last word has not been heard on student unrest in Yugoslavia; a second round is clearly foreseeable.

In an interview, D. Belovski, Assistant Secretary of Foreign Affairs, stressed the point that Yugoslavs want outsiders to take conditions as they find them, the failures as well as the successes, the unsolved problems as well as the quite solid achievements. And this seems to be the prevailing attitude. Little effort is made to minimize existing problems or to offer alibis for mistakes or shortcomings. This realism is a good omen. So, too, is the fact that through the student protests some of the country's more urgent problems have received a thorough airing and the discussion of them has by no means abated.

Despite a readily acknowledged agenda of unsolved problems, the regime has many significant achievements to its credit. It is a force for stability in the Middle East. It pursues an astute and even-handed foreign policy. It has achieved a substantial measure of national unity under extremely difficult circumstances. A genuine "openness" does exist. The week-long discussions are proof of that. By East European standards, the stores are well stocked with consumer goods in most categories and the supply seems to be increasing. I found it difficult to take the self-management councils at full face value; concept and practice seem somewhat divergent. But the new arrangements seem to be working reasonably well. Considering its bloody and complex history, its ethnic diversity, and the fact that it is still a poor country, one is impressed with the measure of economic well-being and political stability that Yugoslavia has achieved in the postwar period. A good measure of the latter is to be found in the fact that the regime did not feel it necessary to move against the student protests but accepted them as justified. The protests were unexpected but the regime did not crack down. It permitted the discussions to run their course. It may have been out of touch with student sentiment but it was not isolated. It knew it had popular support in the universities as the response of the students to Tito's address clearly demonstrates. Other regimes, in countries with long-established democratic traditions, have shown far less maturity and confidence in dealing with student protests.

HARRY GOLDEN

○ N June 15, George Wallace, ex-Governor of Alabama, read the platform on which he wants to run for President to a cheering crowd of 7,500 in the Coliseum at Charlotte. He came to North Carolina to lend impetus to an organization dedicated to obtaining the signatures he needs on petitions for his inclusion on the November ballot. "The federal government," shouted Wallace, "is usurping the rights of the individual citizens." He described the newly passed Open Housing Act as one which puts people in jail if they sell or rent their houses to people they like. Mr. Wallace asked rhetorically what the law had to do with discrimination, which was personal preference.

Mr. Wallace is talking to people who are not used to wearing neckties or reading the texts of federal laws. For that matter they said not to reading newspapers either. To prove that he's not a racist he said in reverent tones that his deceased wife, Lurleen, polled more Negro votes in the gubernatorial race than both of her opponents put together. He neglected to mention that Lurleen, a woman, couldn't "holler nigger" as loudly as the two men could holler. Neither did Wallace bother to inform his enthusiastic audience that Alabama is as much a federal preserve as Yellowstone National Park. Alabama draws $4 billion every year from the United States Government in the form of farm subsidies, Social Security, pensions, Area Redevelopment Administration funds, Army posts, a space center at Huntsville, and welfare assistance. What Wallace did remind his audience was that the federal government is too big.

He drew loud hurrahs when he accused "pointed-headed professors who can't park their bicycles straight" of favoring communism. If elected, he promised to seek indictment of all professors who support a Communist victory in Vietnam. Wallace is referring directly to the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill where controversy over our involvement in Vietnam has been aired for the past two years.

"I couldn't care less what schools you have," said Wallace, "when I am President I shall turn back complete control of the schools to you." This was simply a reminder of the infamous compromise of 1877 when Hayes took the office of President from Tilden who had won the popular vote. To secure the Presidency the Republicans returned the education and the life of the recently enfranchised Negroes back to the states. The audience knew exactly what Wallace meant.

Before the speech the candidate entertained several hundred guests at the fund-raising dinner held in the Heart of Charlotte Motel. Invitations cost $25.

Wallace is not going to become President but he is going to campaign. He would have campaigned in 1964 except that his most ardent backers, real conservatives all, dissuaded him. They did not want him taking votes from Barry Goldwater. This time his backers are urging him on. I rather suspect that, in North Carolina at any rate, he will get more Republican votes than Democratic. But maybe that is what George Wallace and his financial backers want.

There is a significance to his campaign and his willingness to exploit the fears and confusions of Americans today. His performance is professional and adept. He is a master at exploiting unease. There is no doubt that he will complicate the 1968 campaign and increase domestic tension. The Charlotte Observer commented: "This country has coped with spellbinders before. The country will cope with George Wallace."

Incidentally Wallace, in his Charlotte appearance, was guarded by twenty secret service men, as well as a cordon of police.

LETTERS (Continued from page 34)

very university involved. But naturally, I am pleased to set the record straight and even more pleased that the severity of the problems discussed in my column is, if only to this extent, less than I had feared.

As for various other allegations in the Buffalo document—notably interpretations of implication (such as that attempts at serious critical evaluation constitute "attack") and imputations of motive (such as that such critical remarks are made about something only to promote something else or to vent assorted geographical spleens)—aside from their purely ad hominem aspect, and that they do not appear to bear on any of the substantive issues I discussed or even to be intelligibly inferable from anything I did say, they seem so obviously subject to Mr. Foss's own "advice" that it seems counterproductive for me to attempt to add any further admonitions of my own.

Benjamin Boretz

where it's at Springfield, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Re John Gabree's interesting article on rock music ("Serious Rock," The Nation, June 24): in my opinion the Mothers of Invention are less "Brechtian" than sophomoric with their indiscriminate and unrelieved satirizing of second-level clichés (a kind of adolescently arrogant, put-on "wit" concerning people, ideas and music). I agree with Mr. Gabree that the Buffalo Springfield is a decent group, but I must dispute his estimate of the Electric Prunes's Mass in F Minor as a lemon, by stating that it is actually a plum of lovely, properly both groovy and reverent, entirely tasteful (in the best sense) and moving music.

And the Beatles, as I believe even the youngest rock musicians know, along with being "innocent" and "good-humored" not only remain where it's really at but continue with their remarkable synthesizing and creative power to invent and define and to indicate where it's going. As far as I can tell, they are always on the point of the avant-garde.

Bernard Frederick Juul

rationality rampant

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Michel Crozier's article "The Lonely Frontier of Reason" (The Nation, May 27) contains a fundamental flaw that causes him to miss both the point of the protest movement and the meaning of the "problem of America." He fails to see the crucial distinction between the application of reason to special problems and part processes and the question of the values that direct the whole. The dichotomy between the "rational" American Establishment and the protest movement of people in quest of "spontaneity" is a false one. The vast bulk of protesters in America are reacting against the use of reason and power for purposes of individual and national aggrandizement and domination, not against rationality per se. They are not objecting to the application of rationality in constructing an anti-missile system; they don't like the value system reflected in such a choice. And although America is feared for its competitive power in business in various parts of the world, it constitutes a major "problem" because the rationality and efficiency of its parts are contributing to the power of a machine that is clearly out of control.

Edward S. Herman

joiners

New York City.

DEAR SIR: After the June 4 dual graduation ceremonies at Columbia, I noticed a group of rather plainly dressed men standing around, each person wearing a four-colored square enamel pin in his left lapel. When I asked what the insignia stood for, one man told me: "It's the Square Club—a branch of the Masons." Others told me they were members of the Columbia faculty; when pressed to specify which department the lapel pin indicated one said he couldn't reveal that information because it was secret. May I suggest that the Masons and the Columbia faculty either acknowledge these members or else investigate the unauthorized use of their names by the police department?

Eve Merriam

footnote review

College Point, Md.

DEAR SIR: H. R. Wolf ought to be congratulated for his lengthy analysis of a footnote I wrote [see "An Uneasy Alliance," The Nation, June 24]; it may very well represent an innovation in the style of critical writing. But there is one defect. If Mr. Wolf is going to review footnotes, he ought to do them in their entirety. I include the second half of my remarks on the CIA and intellectuals to clarify what I actually said about the issue:

Moreover, the discussion of intellectuals (to extend and broaden the problem) and their participation in government institutions belongs in another place and perhaps in different hands. The issue goes well beyond the C.I.A. and any conscious or unconscious acceptance of its stipends. Men and their ideas must be considered for what they are and what they mean, not for who pays their bills. Views are most often engendered historically, and only very rarely may we catch them wearing a price tag. The important thing is that a good many intellectuals and America's leading spy agency came to the same conclusions at much the same time about America's role in world society. That event is fraught enough with historical questions to keep historians away from the pitfalls of easy explanations for a long time.

Finally, if Mr. Wolf plans to repeat his new style of reviewing books, he ought to refresh himself on the use of footnotes: (1) to clarify or identify sources; (2) to include material not sufficiently important to place in the body of a book. For any second thoughts I may have had about what I wrote, I refer him to my preface.

James Gilbert

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Liberation—Not Frustration

LOOK OUT, WHITEY! BLACK POWER'S GON' GET YOUR MAMA. By Julius Lester. The Dial Press. 152 pp. $3.95.

NAT HENTOFF

Mr. Hentoff's most recent novel, Onwards! (Simon & Schuster), was published this spring. His other books include The New Equality and Call the Keeper (both Viking Press).

In the summer of 1966, the television cameras came in pore-close on Stokely Carmichael as he roared the call, "Black Power!" It was more effective than air conditioning in the nation's (white) living rooms. The New York Times was appalled. Roy Wilkins was grim: "Black Power can mean in the end only black death." Two years later, the Times editorializes about "constructive" Black Power. Whitney Young announces a program to build "ghetto power." Roy Wilkins still doesn't understand, but then he could never see what the war in Vietnam had to do with domestic poverty and powerlessness. Wilkins aside, Black Power as a term has become rather respectable. Even Richard Nixon uses it. Look out, SNCC and all other brothers! The next President may take "We Shall Overcome" out of his inaugural address and put in "Black Power" instead.

The substance of Black Power, however, is still obscure, I expect, to most whites. Why are black high school kids organizing to change curricula and boot out principals and teachers? Why are black parents so immovably set on community control of schools? What is all this talk about whites being "culturally disadvantaged"? And why does "Integration Now!" sound so bizarrely dated?

For those who don't comprehend the extraordinary sense of community rising among blacks—a swirling ferment of pride, increasingly disciplined rage, and very concrete programs from neighborhood corporations to community schools—Julius Lester's book should finally make it all clear to just about anybody. Now 29, a field secretary for SNCC, a photographer, a singer (with two powerful but oddly hidden albums for Vanguard), Lester writes with spare, idiomatic directness—angry, jaunty, sure of himself and of what has to be done. It is a book that ought to be the basis for a whole year's work in every high school in the country, black, white, Puerto Rican, Mexican. It won't be, except in a few rooms with young teachers now coming in to radicalize the system, and except in the first of the community schools. But the book will get around, more widely and rapidly than Fanon's, because it is so specifically relevant to where this country has been and to what the options are now.

Lester describes the change in The Movement from a Friendship Contest to a War of Liberation, explaining in the process that "Black Power was merely the next step in a logical progression, not the outpouring of frustration that the press tried to make us believe when they couldn't explain it away. It was new in the context of 'the movement' of the 1960's. It was not new in the context of the lives of the black people." There follows a scouring review of black American history that includes what might be called a corrective to William Styron. Quoting from Vincent Harding's yet un-

LANDLORD

*We rented here.
The only house
Was the village madman's,*

*Very cheap.
Being strangers,
We tried not hearing what*

*The neighbors told:
Locked up tight
For fulfilling a few town maids,*

*He never came around.
We used the place,
And one day*

*In a seethe of July dust, all
Tags and tears, the town
Dogs in a fury at*

*His heels, we found him
Grinning at the door,
As we discovered we*

*Had often feared.
"Welcome!" he said.
It appeared*

*We were from the very first
Not far from his thoughts,
Never wholly absent from his heart.*

JOHN ENGELS

published essay, "Black Radicalism in America," Lester should, I hope, shake up those reviewers who were so quick to swallow Styron's soggily written fantasies whole: "... what of others who led no rebellions, who marched to no Jerusalems, but who nevertheless broke pointedly and sharply with the patterns they were called upon to live? Should the poisoning of the masters' food be classified as black radicalism? What of the burning of their barns? How shall one judge the many black mothers who smothered their own children in infancy rather than allow them to grow up as slaves? Were they black radicals who, instead of slashing at their masters, cut off their own fingers and arms? Was it black radicalism that led many persons to commit suicide rather than kill or live as slaves?"

There's more history in this book that has yet to be taught in most schools—the insistence, for example, of the Abolitionists that they knew better than Frederick Douglass and other blacks how to direct the latter's fight for their own liberation. (Or, as Lester puts it, "White folks know better than niggers."—White folks' saying, circa 1619-1968.") That history does go on into the present: "Whites can never be accepted as allies with blacks until they get rid of that arrogance which leads them to think that they are greater authorities on blacks than are blacks themselves, until they stop going to the Daniel Moynihans to learn about blacks, but come to the ghetto to learn for themselves. (We'd prefer to send them letters, however.)"

Along with history, Lester focuses on cultural nationalism and black consciousness. It's a sketchy section, but gets to the roots and can be supplemented with LeRoi Jones's Blues People and Black Music (William Morrow). I remember Whitney Young a few years ago telling black parents they ought to uplift their children with Bach and ballet because blues and boogie-woogie, he went on, weren't the way UP. Whitney Young ain't talking like that no more.

For whites, and especially young whites, there will be one chronic question as they read the book. Are we honkies too? Lester's answer is similar to Eldridge Cleaver's in Soul on Ice (McGraw-Hill). It depends on you. "Black Power," he writes, "is not anti-white people, but is anti anything and everything that serves to oppress. If whites align themselves on the side of oppression, then Black Power must be antiwhite. That, however, is not the decision of Black Power."

The testing ground for the white young now in dissent and rebellion is whether they remain radical as they move into their 30s and beyond. Radical in the sense that William Sloane Coffin uses the term—the liberal feels other people are in trouble; the radical knows he's in trouble too. If they can remain free of the auto-anesthesia of their liberal elders, there may be possibilities for alliances with blacks for particular goals. But even then, Lester concludes, "we will always want to preserve our ethnicity, our community. We are a distinct cultural group, proud of our culture and our institutions, and simply want to be left alone to lead our good, black lives."

Can they preserve their ethnicity and culture in a country set up—from schools to other complexes—to erase authentic differences? It's going to be a hell of a good try, because Black Power and Black Consciousness are the only ways to their survival, both in the denotative and other senses.

The Evidence of Their Lives

INDIAN ART IN SOUTH AMERICA.
By Frederick J. Dockstader. Photographs by Carmelo Guadagno. New York Graphic Society. 222 pp. 250 plates. $27.50.

D'ARCY McNICKLE

Mr. McNickle is a member of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai tribes of Montana. He is a professor of anthropology at the University of Saskatchewan, Regina Campus.

In this companion volume to two earlier publications, Indian Art in America and Indian Art in Middle America, Dr. Dockstader completes a notable survey of aboriginal art forms in the Western Hemisphere. As director of the Museum of the American Indian, Heye Foundation, the author had full access to the magnificent treasures of that institution and most of the material in these volumes is drawn from that source. This may have been an embarrassment as much as an advantage because of the very volume of material from which to choose.

The complex civilizations that matured in South America are virtually unknown, except for the Andean region ruled over by the Incas at the time of the Spanish conquest. The present collection is accordingly an attempt to acquaint the reader with as broad a spectrum as possible, within available materials, of the indigenous art expression of the southern continent. The aim is laudable, even though it produces an uneven document, with some materials perhaps included only because they are representative of a region or a culture, while some of the richest cultures are scantied in favor of these less exciting but regionally important forms. This results in understating the case for indigenous art, and in this respect the collection is somewhat of a disappointment. The two earlier volumes are more consistent in evoking a high level of wonder and delight.

What is really remarkable about this or any similar collection is that any of these specimens should have survived. Indian art, like so many other aspects of native culture, suffered heavily at the hands of hostile, uncomprehending or merely avaricious white men. A Bishop Landa in Yucatan destroyed temples and stone carvings and burned an entire library of Mayan manuscripts—in the name of the Holy Inquisition. The few manuscripts surviving this holocaust are in European libraries, not in the land which produced them. In Panama a single grave site plundered by a troop of Spanish explorers yielded a variety of gold ornaments weighing altogether 355 pounds. Dockstader reports that the ransom paid in gold and silver for the release of Atahualpa, the last Inca ruler, was of such quantity that the Spaniards were occupied for a month in melting the treasure into solid bars. After which Atahualpa was executed as a nonbeliever.

Such plundering still occurs, even though most American republics now have laws protecting their antiquities. Private collectors, as well as respectable museums, will purchase whatever comes on the market, however it was initially obtained. What is regretted in these transactions is the indifference and ignorance of the pot hunter who, by removing articles of material culture, reduces the evidence for the context in which the first Americans fashioned their lives.

The present volume offers a sympathetic if very brief summary of the prehistory of South America, the beginnings of which go back at least to 14,920 B.C., according to one established Carbon-14 date, and may eventually be extended to 25,000 B.C. The chronology will not be fixed with any certitude until a great deal more has been learned from systematic archaeological investigation, not in South America alone but along the entire route of migration from northeast Asia down through the American continents. Much of what is now known is derived from the intensive study of a comparatively few regions or individual sites, usually the dramatic classical monuments. For every such major center, there are thousands of traces buried in desert or jungle, observed and reported casually but never dug out, for lack of time, money or interest. They are not likely to contain desirable collectors' loot. The ultimate story of America lies buried in these lonely sites.

Dockstader limits his purview to examples of ceramics, weaving and metalwork, in all of which the South American native craftsman was pre-eminent. Pottery may be the oldest of these arts, or it may be only that pottery survives the elements better than weaving. A pottery-making culture existed in northern Colombia (Puerto Hormiga) by 3100 B.C. and in Ecuador (Valdivia) at about the same time, yet cultivated cotton appears in the archaeological record of central Peru as early as 3600 B.C. Fibrous mats and cotton fish nets may have been made in this earlier period. By 3000 B.C. on the southern coast of Peru (Paracas Peninsula) objects interred with the dead included twine-woven cloth, nets and textile bags. In time, the art of weaving achieved a technological brilliance and beauty of design unsurpassed anywhere in the ancient world. Every type of weave was known and produced on a simple heddle loom, from the most delicate figured gauzes to rich tapestries and embroideries. Specimens have been recovered in which a thread count of 250 to the inch allowed the weaver to execute exceedingly fine design details.

The development of ceramics was equally impressive. The author comments that the florescence of the Mochica culture in northern Peru (about 200 B.C.) resulted in "an art form that includes some of the finest plastic sculpture in the history of ceramics. The smoothly finished, carefully modeled vessels are particularly intriguing for their reflection of everyday life, making them veritable esthetic documents."

The Mochica craftsmen, moreover, may have been among the New World's earliest erotic artists, as many of their clay vessels depict in line drawing and plastic modeling lively scenes of sexual activity.

The last of the arts to develop was metallurgy, and the greatest craftsmanship seems to have been achieved in Colombia, where gold work was unrivaled. Dockstader observes: "Today it astonishes us to realize that not only did these ancient craftsmen understand the many forms of casting (including the cire-perdue process), mise-en-couleur, soldering, inlay, and related techniques, but were able to achieve heat sufficient to cast platinum, whose melting point of 3191 degrees Fahrenheit makes it among the hardest metals to fashion. . . . The very few examples of metallurgy which escaped the melting pot amply support their reputation as the finest goldworkers of ancient America."

These arts did not exist in isolation as individual expressions of a craft worker, but they were rather associated with and grew out of communities of people that had developed into incipient civilizations by as early as 1800 B.C. By that date massive pyramids and temples were being constructed, with details of architectural sculpture. The author omits these basic features of cultural adaptation and growth, and so makes it difficult to evaluate his claim that "the Inca Empire of 1525 was at a more advanced stage of civilization than the nation that Francisco Pizarro represented."

One would like to accept the author's judgment, but with the wish that he had supplied the evidence, if necessary, from materials not included in his museum's collections.

son for the United States to embark on the program of implacable counter-revolution that reached its peak, or nadir, at the Bay of Pigs two years later, a program that beyond its inherent wrongness hurt America in the eyes of much of the world, permanently stained the reputation of President Kennedy, and led to the nuclear brink in 1962.

Ruiz also illuminates an aspect of the Cuban Revolution that has long troubled many American liberals, even those sympathetic to Castro: his relationship with the Soviet Union and the Cuban Communists. He points out that the Soviet-American rivalry gave to Castro an opportunity that no other Cuban revolutionary had ever had. All the others, sooner or later, had to make their peace with America because Cuba could not exist without U.S. help, for there was no one else to turn to. But Castro knew that Russia would help, whether out of conviction or to embarrass the United States, and he was right.

As to welcoming the Cuban Communists into the revolution, Ruiz says that Castro had no choice there either. Although the Communists had little use for Castro during his struggle—they regarded him, not without some justice, as a bourgeois romantic—and though Castro was clearly a Martí Populist and not a

A Tragedy of Errors

CUBA: THE MAKING OF A REVOLUTION. By Ramon Eduardo Ruiz. The University of Massachusetts Press. 160 pp. $6.

THE ECONOMIC TRANSFORMATION OF CUBA. By Edward Boorstein. Monthly Review Press. 303 pp. $7.95.

REVOLUTIONARY POLITICS AND THE CUBAN WORKING CLASS. By Maurice Zeitlin. Princeton University Press. 306 pp. $8.50.

RICHARD J. WALTON

Mr. Walton is the author of The Remnants of Power: The Tragic, Last Years of Adlai Stevenson, to be published in October by Coward-McCann.

Taken together these three books add further documentation to what has long been unmistakable: that liberal, democratic America should be deeply shamed by what it has done to Cuba both before and after the revolution.

A history professor who has taught at United States and Latin American universities, Ramon Eduardo Ruiz wrote Cuba: The Making of a Revolution with scholarly detachment but with a most unscholarly simplicity. This is a splendid short account of the revolutionary movements in Cuba from the struggle for independence from Spain in the 1890s to Castro's victory in 1959 that were the inevitable counterpoint to America's economic domination and political and military interventions. He makes the essential point that the Cuban Revolution was against the United States fully as much as against Batista for, as both Boorstein and Zeitlin agree, the two were economically and politically inseparable.

At the time of the revolution many of us who were instinctively for Castro hoped that the United States would offer him aid, but our hope was romantic not realistic. It was organically impossible for Castro to ask for American aid—however much he wished for and welcomed the support of individual Americans—because he realized that Cubans would never be masters in their own land until they broke their economic dependence on America. And it was just as impossible for the United States, unless it made a shattering change in a policy of economic and political colonialism of sixty years' standing, to offer aid. But if it was too much to hope for American aid, there was no rational rea-

INDIAN PAINTING, PROBABLY WASCO, IN A CAVE NEAR MADRAS, OREGON

*Over a trail glinting with flakes
Of half-worked arrowheads, jasper, obsidian, flint,
I follow an Indian entirely to stone.
His cave clenches itself around me,
I am the eye of the cliff come back to its socket
To spy on this hillside of animals breeding and dying
And boulders losing their balance. In the cave of my mind
Words form white like crystals,
What remains to be seen?
I twist to the light, but glare seals me in.*

*What remains? Indian, the dark at the back
Of your cave stays where you left it, and cold rock walls
Still bruise flesh upon bone: always we live
In between. I lie where you lay. Overhead
On the spalling sky, murky with soot,
An arm's length away, the elk you painted
Runs on, head down, the color of my own blood.
You made a gory sun to shine above
And over the sun strides a kind of man with a bow.
I lie and think of that hunt: man, elk, and sun,
Tracing it over and over until your paint
Seems to ooze down my fingers and wrist, and clot.
Indian, flat of your back in this cave, you
Made what I would, a prayer to your gods;
A sign to your people you were here
But left: I follow you into stone.*

JAROLD RAMSEY

Marxist, he soon realized that he needed the Communist ideology and apparatus to consolidate his victory. Here Ruiz gives a particularly useful history of the Communist movement in Cuba, citing their many achievements for the workers—and their compromises as well. "The Communists were not simply a power in labor circles. Communists, and their sympathizers, Marxists of varying hues, and socialists had played a major role in Cuban intellectual life. Not only were Communist party leaders generally 'men of intelligence, magnetism and integrity,' to quote the Commission on Cuba, but the party 'won the support of some of Cuba's outstanding intellectuals and that of a growing group of younger teachers, writers and professional people.'" It is easy to see how in the chaos that followed his march on Havana Castro needed the one organized, disciplined group in Cuba, but it is just as clear from what has happened since that Castro used the Communists more than they have been able to use him.

In The Economic Transformation of Cuba, Edward Boorstein, an American economist who worked at the top levels in Havana for three and a half years, tells a story that is like the early days of the New Deal but even more extravagant. At first the reader is a bit uncomfortable with the vocabulary—"American imperialism," "monopolies," etc., the familiar jargon of one side of the cold war—but here it is simply the literal truth. The first few years of the revolution were a time of wild improvisation as the economy changed radically from one utterly subservient to capitalist America 90 miles away, to a Socialist economy dependent largely on Communist countries an ocean and half a continent away. Boorstein's first-hand account makes fascinating reading. There is no way in a short review to more than hint at the changes that were necessary but, for instance, Cuban imports from the United States dropped from $577 million in 1957 to $23.7 million in 1961, to less than $1 million in 1962—an incredible turnaround.

Boorstein discusses Theodore Draper's well-known thesis that Castro betrayed the revolution, that "Castro promised one revolution and made another. The Cuban Revolution was essentially a middle-class revolution that was used to destroy the middle class." As both Ruiz and Zeitlin agree, Boorstein points out that there was no real, cohesive middle class, and he says that Castro didn't promise any particular kind of revolution, just a "revolution that would make a fundamental attack on Cuba's problems." And he points out that "a revolution must go forward," that Castro was determined to end Cuba's complete economic reliance on the United States which inevitably meant a clash. When the United States responded in 1960 by removing Cuba's sugar quota—and sugar provided about 80 per cent of Cuban exports and paid for most of its imports—it was clear that the United States meant economic warfare to crush the revolution. Castro had never intended to end trade with the United States, merely to rationalize it, but suddenly Cuba found its industry and business deprived of its American and Cuban middle-class administrators and technicians, without necessary raw materials and replacement parts, without even the knowledge of what was needed: in short, in complete collapse. Castro then had no choice but to increase the pace of nationalization and to turn even more to Eastern Europe.

Boorstein tells how Humpty Dumpty was put back together again, with dreadful mistakes and appalling waste but with marvelous ingenuity and spirit. It is a wonderful story. There is only one caveat: although the "why" of Boorstein's involvement is clear—he believes in revolution—the reader would like to know how he got involved. In the book he simply materializes in Havana without explanation.

Revolutionary Politics and the Cuban Working Class is rougher going for the general reader because it is a detailed sociological study based on a statistical analysis of 210 random interviews with Cuban workers done in 1962 by University of Wisconsin sociologist Maurice Zeitlin and his wife. There are scores of tables analyzing workers' attitudes toward the revolution on the basis of being skilled, semi-skilled, unskilled, by marital status, age, race, income, vocation, months of employment per year before and after the revolution, and many other categories.

Although neither a sociologist nor a pollster, I wonder if a sample of 210 is large enough for statistical purposes since when it is broken down into categories the sub-samples are tiny. For instance, in one table sixteen women are cited and percentages solemnly recorded as 62, 12 and 25, when only ten, two and four women are represented. Yet I believe that Zeitlin's sometimes unorthodox conclusions are generally sound not so much because of their statistical basis but because he is a skilled and uncommonly perceptive observer who has done staggering research—as the numerous and often long footnotes indicate—in the literature of the field. Although it seems true that such conclusions as overwhelming working-class support for the revolution are still valid, his study would have been more persuasive and possibly could have exerted some constructive influence earlier if it had been available a year or two after his three-month visit to Cuba instead of five years later.

Magic, Vision and Dream

THE UNWRITTEN SONG: Poetry of the Primitive and Traditional Peoples of the World. Edited by Willard Trask. The Macmillan Co. Vol. 1: 287 pp. $7.95. Vol. II: 316 pp. $8.95.

OUT OF THE EARTH I SING: Poetry and Songs of Primitive Peoples of the World. Edited by Richard Lewis. W. W. Norton & Co. 144 pp. $3.95.

JEROME ROTHENBERG

Mr. Rothenberg is the author of a dozen books of poems and translations including the forthcoming Technicians of the Sacred (Doubleday), an anthology of primitive and archaic poetry with modern analogues. He is currently conducting an experimental project in the translation of American Indian poetry under a grant from the Wenner-Gren Foundation.

If any one thing characterizes modern poetry (obviously no one thing does) it is its rejection of the idea that poetry can be defined with reference to a limited number of forms or shapes-of-poems. For any who still think the position needs defending, the simplest argument might be: we do what we do because we know as much as we know. What we know is that poetry is a universal activity involving so many norms or modes, that to think of one or another as more "natural" or "evolved" or "complex" no longer makes sense. Poetry (everywhere!) is as complex and developed as language, and as varied—the implications of which any comparative linguist will easily understand.

In opening up the full range of the world's poetries past and present, linguists, anthropologists and archaeologists have in fact been the avant-garde's secret (if often reluctant) allies. When Rimbaud was writing A Season in Hell in 1872, George Smith was presenting the first translations of the deluge sections from the Mesopotamian Epic of Gilgamesh. (The Assyrian tablets of the Epic had been uncovered in 1855, the year Whitman first published Leaves of Grass.) Coincidences of this sort dramatize the natural opening up of poetic possibilities that has been taking place from two directions. By now, anyway, it's clear that both the avant-garde and the buried works of the archaic past (Babylonia, Sumeria, Egypt, Mexico, Peru, etc.) are here to stay. What may be more important (because more wide ranging if generally less known), the "primitive" and "savage" poets intuited by Blake and the official Romantics (reintuited by generations of modern poets) have turned out to be real, so real and so truly poets that the lie of the word "primitive" sticks in our throats whenever we use it.

Now, all of this has been happening in spite of the general unavailability of primitive poetic texts and the generally poor quality of the translations. It's surprising also that while the translation of primitive poetry has been carried on in a more or less organized way for more than 100 years (and for nearly that long has been watched and received by poets, etc., in a more or less disorganized way), no world-wide primitive anthology has appeared in English before now. On the other hand, the body of work translated and published (mostly by governmental and institutional presses) has been enormous, so that Trask's anthology, for example, includes more than 700 poems and barely scratches the surface, while my own effort (forthcoming) runs past 500 pages, with little more than a dozen duplications between us. (A modest collection of Navaho ceremonial poetry—the work of a single people—might equal in length either of our works, possibly both!)

So much for numbers.

Of the anthologies reviewed here, Trask's is unquestionably the more important. He has assembled a sizable body of work culled from the many specialized and regional collections of which I've just spoken. As a result it's possible to get a good sense of the primitive plethora without the loss of spirit of oneself turning researcher in the process. The book is very clear in its arrangement by continents and cultures, generous in presentation, and rich in "masterpieces" whose power is evident even where the translations act against it. Lewis' work, by contrast, is a "sampler," a gift book handsomely illustrated with photos of primitive art, but unfortunately dedicated to the proposition that primitive poetry is best presented in miniature, often (alas) by chopping big poems into little ones. Since Mr. Lewis is also the editor of a lovely book of poems by children, Miracles (Simon & Schuster), I get the uncomfortable feeling that the "good and wise" primitives are somehow seen as phylogenetic counterparts of childhood—what old Frobenius and others called "the childhood of man."

Trask offers much more to build on. What's going on in his two volumes is the demonstration of a highly complex and sophisticated art; many arts, in fact. These include techniques for composing simultaneously on several levels of perception; for freely shifting point of view; for allowing gaps in sequence that activate the hearer's mind toward a filling in of particulars; for working accurately with both small and large structures (images and concatenations of images); for referring the poem's elements back to an overriding sense of reality or surreality, often by use of the related techniques of magic, vision and dream; for working ritually with nonlinguistic components in what would today be called a happening or intermedia situation.

All of this is relevant, and all of it is evidenced in Trask's anthology, though the reader may need a head start or some extra digging to get at it. The editor's point of view, that of a shipwrecked humanist "in our time of decline in classical studies," is possibly the least reliable selectional tool where primitive poetry is concerned, and accounts for many dubious (i.e., trite or dull) selections in what should be an overwhelmingly exciting book. All selection makes a statement, as does all omission. The absence of sound-poems and picture-poems, the mere hinting at intermedia situations in titles or footnotes barren of detail, leave some important things unsaid. Granted that Trask may not think them that important, there is still a "traditionalist's" lack of perception (bordering on deception) in, say, his statement about picture writing, that "in none of these exceptional cases are they" (the glyphs, etc.) "used in either the composition or the recording of verbal art products." This is simply not so, and Trask in fact misses a very exciting aspect of American Indian poetry by asserting it, apparently in defense of his book's title.

Too many of the translations in Unwritten Song suffer in a related way from their translators' reliance on the worn-out counters of a dead tradition. (It might be pointed out that almost none of the translators Trask uses are poets.) This results in such "poetic" jumbles as: "Head takers we, brave/Fighters we, brave" from the Philippines; or "Sick I have lain since autumn./Helpless I lay, as were I/My own child" from one of the greatest Netsilik Eskimo songmen; or "Woe! Woe!/Hearken ye!/We are diminished/Woe! Woe!" from—and with apologies to—the Iroquois; or, finally, this fighting epithet from the Maori: "Fudge! I am just come up from below. O my friends!" Nor am I being half so cruel in pointing to these things (there are many more) as Trask was in printing them. The reader may be able to compensate, but that's hardly the point. Too often, anyway, he'll find it impossible to understand what's going on without compensatory footnotes (fairly rare here) or the tedium of checking back to the sources to rediscover the very interesting forms that the various translators have obscured.

Yet the book, for all its drawbacks, is very good to have. It includes many great works (some in decent enough versions), and that's at least a beginning. Where we should go from here is toward the utilization of poet power (the more avant-garde the better) in a common effort to put more of the work into viable form and, despite the complexities of translation, to uncover what's really there and get it into circulation. The forms we find will continue to change our minds and hearts—an ongoing process that is basic to the aims of all our avant-gardes. All that's needed now is a group of willing poets and a magnanimous institution, say, to foot the bill.

HOME TOWN

(from a Tlingit myth)

My uncle sets me adrift in a box on a pine plank.

I voyage to the land of the eagles where I marry and grow firm.

*In my suit of feathers
I fly to the Township of Complacency
where my uncle fishes.
I seize him by the hair.
Vengeance, I say.*

*Aieee! my uncle cries.
His wife runs from the house,
grabs him by the ankle.*

*With my new wings
I pull them both aloft.
My cousin comes from the schoolhouse, catches
the hem of her mother's dress.
Vengeance, I say.
Come down, she answers.*

*One by one all the people of that wretched town
run out of their houses.
They grab each other
by ankles, knees, trousers, shawls, dresses, fish-lines,
toes and members.*

*Their weight is nothing against the strength of my eagle's wings.
I carry them, a great chain, out over the Bay of Forgetfulness and let go.*

GEORGE HITCHCOCK

The Flatulent Poet

ENDERBY. By Anthony Burgess. W. W. Norton & Co. 412 pp. $5.95.

ROBERT K. MORRIS

Mr. Morris, assistant professor of English at CCNY, has written a critical study of Anthony Powell (University of Pittsburgh Press), and is working presently on a collection of essays on the contemporary British novel, to be published by Southern Illinois University Press.

In slightly under a score of wildly productive and creative years, Anthony Burgess has published dozens of essays, reviews and poems; an unmusical primer on Finnegans Wake; a jolly, scholarly introduction and critique of the contemporary novel; and—the purest fuel for literary rockets—eleven of his own novels besides. Among the best of these are a trilogy on the sinking of the British colonial sun in Malaysia (The Long Day Wanes), a bawdy, Rabelaisian re-creation of Shakespeare's love life (Nothing Like the Sun), and a science-fiction excursion into the dark future of England, A Clockwork Orange, which after five years is still making it with the "now generation."

The latter, narrated by a teen-age werewolf, Alex, in groovy nadsat—a technico-Russo-Anglo slang—language—and stylistically a potpourri of sensuality, sensationalism and "black humor," tells of a society terrorized by roving bands of black-jacketed, chain-choking delinquents, great-grandchildren of Welfare State overkill. A Clockwork Orange is a philologist's dream and a Socialist's nightmare, and a grim record of what is not only a major theme with Burgess but a real moral problem of our times: the depersonalization of the individual. Burgess is sensitive—nay, hip—to the ways the Establishment deals with the outsider. But it is not that society does this, but that it fails to discriminate between the act of rebellion which is dangerous and destructive and the harmless and creative one. Reading Burgess with some care awakens the vision of an age when personal freedom may be subsumed, if not obliterated by corporate happiness.

This in a happier, but no less morally indignant and satiric vein, is the theme of Enderby, a two-part work about a modern, minor poet who wants nothing more than to ply his craft and art, and discovers it is about the last thing society is willing to let him do. Enderby is middle-aged, despicable, and descriptively, intestinally flatulent. Like "Johnson's scrofula, Swift's scatophobia, or Keats's gallop of death-warrant blood," Enderby's gaseousness is a mark of the poetic malaise—all is not right with poets!

and his own thing, a fundamental Bronx cheer to the bourgeois.

In the course of the novel, Enderby falls prey to all the ills flesh and spirit are heir to. We first meet him, impoverished, easing his bowels and brains (he composes on the toilet), and almost immediately afterward see him running from Vesta Bainbridge, a woman journalist who first cajoles him into writing sloppy verses for a Vogue-type mod mag, and then into a wedding and an Italian honeymoon. Fleeing from a non-consummated marriage, from a wife who feels she can "make [him] happy by making [him] more normal and sane," Enderby, disheartened, disintegrated, dried up, submits to psychoanalysis and to a change of identity, becoming Piggy Hogg, bartender and "useful citizen." Book the second shows Hogg metamorphosed back into Enderby when poetic inspiration returns in a rush. Naturally he is harried anew. In the end, Enderby finds momentary bliss with a mysterious, nameless lady (Sybil? the embodied Muse?), but at last chooses to "live without love," facing the indeterminate future unhappy, but still free.

In one way the novel is a rich, hilarious, ultra-extravagant portrait of the artist, seen at his homely and most oracular, but it is a portrait drawn from the inside out. (Indeed, the first part of the present work was published some years back, in England, as Inside Mr. Enderby under the pseudonym of Joseph Kell). Enderby is also a portrait of an artist called Anthony Burgess, at times self-indulgent and self-conscious, but always conscientious, exacting, controlled, a show-off in the best sense of the word, who delights in language and can make it lilt, somersault, or soar at his whim. Here, for example, a musical fragment: "Mrs. Opisso the daily woman had come in, dusky, hippy, bosomy, garlicky, moustached, leering brilliantly, a wartime Gibraltar evacuee in whose blood seethed Genoese, Portuguese Jewish, Saracen, Irish and Andalusian corpuses . . ." And there are countless puns, anagrams, dialects, and rhetorical convolutions, not to mention enough brilliant poems interlarding the text to make in themselves a salable volume.

But most important Enderby is a mellow, but not unfunny, satire on those destructive and adventitious forces society summons in order to squeeze us into conformity. The foolish, pompous Wapenshaw (psychiatry), the cloying Vesta ("romantic" love), the obsessive, nauseous Miranda Boland (raw sex), the besotted Rawcliffe (professional pander to mass culture) are nemeses not only to art but to personality, all trying in one way or another to end Enderby, cause him to entropy into a nonentity. Burgess, though, will have none of it. He has, for our time and for his generally uncharitable, almost miserly view of us, an amazing amount of faith in the individual's ability to recover, faith in the act of reconversion if not rebirth. When Alex of A Clockwork Orange learns to love "big brother" he stops loving Beethoven, but he doesn't love "big brother" for long. Nor does Enderby suffer long his Circian transformation as Hogg. For good or ill the rebel, says Burgess, will not be put down. Or to quote Enderby-Burgess:

And this very moment, this very word
will be Eden,
As that boy was already, or is already,
in Eden,
While the delicate filthy hand dabbles and dabbles
But leaves the river clean, heartbreak-ingly clean.

On a small but magnificent scale Enderby is an epic of the potential Eden within man.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

Up. By Ronald Sukenick. The Dial Press. 330 pp. $4.95.

Up is the funniest, most successful, and most satisfying new book that I've read in a long time. Its main character is the author himself, in a variety of guises—as nice Jewish high school boy from Brooklyn, exasperated Lower East Side tenement dweller, the brutal "hi-sweetheart" executive of his worst fantasies, author of Up, sometimes-hypocritical friend of his friends and, in general, participant-observer in an American culture which is as insane and chaotic as it is familiar. His book is about what it's like to be these things. But Mr. Sukenick has removed it from the stage of the novel and brought it down into the audience, which he entertains, heckles and disappears into.

MOVE! By Joel Lieber. David McKay Co. 236 pp. $4.95.

Move! is an ambitious but thin relative of Up, with its plot hung on the familiar bones of the funny-horrible business of life in New York. Mr. Lieber's passive playwright hero is about to move with his wife from one apartment to another. The mysterious Mover, in a series of semi-fantastic events, teaches him to really move—into life instead of simply from place to place on its periphery. The author depends a bit too much on standard film-script New York types, and forgets to really develop his hero, though he does become, at the end, a turned-on citizen of the world.

THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS. By Thomas Rogers. New American Library, 256 pp. $5.50.

Mr. Rogers' absorbing and surprising novel is about an attractive young couple for whom America grows impossible—first in an emotional sense, and then literally when one of them, through a most logical series of circumstances, becomes an escaped convict. Its success lies in the author's ability to make us believe that his couple, who possess the most admired American attributes—he is rich, she is beautiful, and both are remarkably honest and unhung-up—behave in the admirable way they do because of the fact that they grew up in this country, not in spite of it. The general air of humor and warm-heartedness, plus his characters' complete lack of bitterness, and the film of irony that lies over the total presentation make this a most engaging novel.

TALK. By Linda Rosenkrantz. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 223 pp. $4.95.

The main character in Talk leaves her tape recorder on during a summer she and her friends are spending in East Hampton. The result, according to your taste, is either totally fascinating, funny, boring, annoying, or pathetic, but no combination of these—and more or less what some New York art scene people talk about during enforced vacations from their analysts. The trouble is that they are so dedicated to the frank and open expression of their feelings—mostly about sex and their relationships to one another—that they don't seem to have very many. The possibilities of the genre, however, seem endless.

LOVE AND WORK. By Reynolds Price. Atheneum Publishers. 143 pp. $4.50.

Mr. Price's novel about a prissy, un-giving man whose relationship with his parents has locked him into helpless isolation from his wife and his world is overcontrolled where it is meant to be spare, and prissy itself where it is meant to be dramatically low-keyed. The tautness of the style of Love and Work (what a beautiful title!) is attractive—since the author, at his best, writes with a disciplined lyricism that recalls the finest of James Agee's prose—but it is finally irritating because it is so unre-lieved.

Nuts, Bolts and Blue Sky

WILLIAM B. ROLLINS

Mr. Rollins is a free-lance writer living at Woody Creek near Aspen.

An Aspen writer who used to sit in at the International Design Conference, held in the Colorado mountain resort each summer for eighteen years, was too bored to bother this year. "They always come to the same conclusions," she said: "Bad design is the fault of the public."

Still, from June 19 to 21, the designers—about 600 of them, including students, architects, planners, movie makers, educators and historians—marched daily to the dialogues and discords, in what another Aspenite calls "the parade of pink pants and Porsches."

Even the designers have been grumbling a little more year by year, as the discussions and lectures became more and more "preoccupied with blue-sky chat from giant intellectuals and universal men." The phrase about blue sky is Reynier Banham's. A London art historian, Banham was this year's program chairman. He had been to Aspen before, and was aware of the criticisms. He promised to get back to specifics.

"Unfortunately," he said, "most attempts to get designers to talk about their own professional territory founder between navel gazing and ax grinding. The discussions become a cozy-bitchy as the post-mortem on a family gathering, and just as incomprehensible to outsiders." Banham hoped to remedy the malaise of past conferences by a nuts-and-bolts approach, comparing the problems and opportunities of design in Europe and America through "solid professional discourse" between pairs of professionals. "It was a snowballing effect, this tendency to greater and greater abstraction. We [designers] became increasingly involved in sociology and politics until, at a recent conference in Montreal, two designers got up and spoke on Vietnam."

Despite Banham's buoyant beginning, the conference contained about the usual proportions of blue sky to nuts and bolts (say 10 to 1), and if Banham had known more about snowballs he might have predicted an abortive student rebellion within the conference itself. By the third day of the conference, student alienation was such that Manuel M. Mayuga of Long Beach State College, Calif., spokesman for the rebels, called for a separate meeting so that the students could organize future conferences on their own. "There is a total lack of communication in this conference," he said. "They [the older designers] are thinking only of the images they're projecting to each other. We do not want a revolt. We want to prevent a revolt. We want to communicate."

The older generation was quick to reply. "Do you think you're any different than we were ten years ago?" panelist Irving Grossman, a Toronto designer, architect and lecturer, asked Mayuga. "We were the same: iconoclastic. It's easy to drop out. But dropping in and doing something. Staying in. That's what interests me."

Panelist Peter Eisenman of New York City, architect, urban designer and teacher, told Mayuga, "You're not fighting the establishment. You're fighting yourselves. Wait until you see the inertia within your own group." Eisenman was right. Mayuga's organization meeting lacked support. The older designers, after all, encouraged the students and—perhaps—made it too easy to revolt, according to Misha Black, professor of industrial design at the Royal College of Art in London. "The gap between

REBELLION AND BETRAYAL in FRANCE

For an on-the-spot report, analysis and documents of What's been happening in France?—Send 50c for the new Summer Issue of WORLD REVOLUTION, a Quarterly of World Marxist-Leninist Thought and Struggle, published by:

PROGRESSIVE LABOR PARTY
Subscriptions: $2 a year
P.O. Box 208, Church St. Sta.
New York City 10008

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION

7-52-60

211 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

- ☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

generations is unbridgeable. It is an excellent thing, an irritant, controlled agitation, antagonistic cooperation. Without it, there would be no change."

One student, searching for the protest meeting called by Mayuga, said: "I'm curious to find out what we're going to say. I don't think we have anything to say. Or probably we'll say the same thing they're saying. I don't think youth should tell adults we're going to say anything. Let them see."

The student revolt was about as successful as a plastic balloon construction, brought to be set up near the main tent by six students from San Fernando State College. The two balloons (named "Sidney") were black and white, 100 feet long, in sausage shapes. The students said they could be used for housing, but they were unable to fully inflate them. Their teacher, sprawled on the grass near the pooped piles of plastic, said, "Sidney behaved about the way we expected." So, with both students and balloons deflated, the designers got down to nuts and bolts.

David Gebhard, associate professor of art history at the University of California, said that in the United States the form of an object is more important than the function, "the package is more important than the product." According to Gebhard, the objects produced in America in the 19th and 20th centuries "were meant to be experienced in a momentary sense, like the maraschino cherry on a piece of frosting. This may be realistic," he said, "even desirable. It has created a lack of attachment to material objects."

The concern of the designer should not be with function but with symbol, Gebhard continued. He used the example of the streamlined refrigerators and irons ("They were really fast!") produced in the thirties, "an expression of the Buck Rogers phenomenon," to illustrate his contention that American design is based on commercial art symbols.

Black, Gebhard's European counterpart, said: "We see great attraction and opportunity in the vast space and uncontrolled brutality of your country. But we see also a great danger: the danger that the country will be covered with billboards, refuse, piles of used cars, bodies and machine guns; with the intellectuals cowering in corners, or at conferences."

Industrial designer Richard Latham of Chicago was more optimistic. "The 'thing culture' is choking to death on its things," he said. "We have what I call the 'Interface' problem: That's when a man has just arrived at Mach 1 in New York, had two martinis and a steak dinner; he's waiting to get on a modern underground; but at the moment, he's standing in the rain without an umbrella. That's Interface. If airplane design continues, it will be like unloading the Queen Mary through a porthole."

"The designer must limit the plethora of artifacts which threaten to extinguish humanity," Black agreed. He said the "thing culture" goes back at least to Emerson, who wrote, "Things are in the saddle and ride mankind."

Black based a "slight" optimism about the future on the phenomenon of the mini-skirt, "a spontaneous uprising of the skirts all over Europe and much of the world. The mini-skirt came," Black said, "not from the dictates of big fashion houses but from young people who were saying, 'let's have what we want.'"

Banham and Latham discussed design and morality. For Europeans, Banham said, a running morality of design is important. "The devil is alive," he said, "in Detroit. It is our standard assumption that all American designers have trouble with their ethics."

"The relationships [between morality and design] do not exist," Latham countered. "Ideology is a psychological rationalization that comes after the fact of design."

"We need a concept of uncertainty, choice, open-endedness," John Allpass, Danish urban planner, said. "We can get better design only by education," Eisenman added, "reacting to the environment as it is."

Jivan Tabibian, a political scientist, wrapped it up. "Ethics must be aware of alienation." He said the solution seems to be an integrated, dialectic approach that recognizes "reality in its utmost complexity, in its utmost unmanageability . . . a society which allows for a pluralism of divergent choices and actions. The only function is to discover what function is . . . to make the function of creation possible."

Banham was simpler: "Bad design is the fault of everyone."

THEATRE FOR ALL

If even the bourgeois audience "who have the money and the habit by now and the education" are so hard to win, it can be imagined that most resident-theatre directors lack the time, energy, and money to do much toward the development of new audiences from among the culturally disenfranchised. I am not the sort of bourgeois radical who gets sentimental about the workers; I see no reason to believe that their presence in the audience would suddenly transform the resident theatres into vigorous, challenging, bally, gutsy, independent-minded agencies for the regeneration of our society, as some people seem to think. But this is a democracy, which means that we are committed to the belief that the good things in life should be available to all. The resident theatres have already broken through the geographical barriers that isolated most Americans from the professional theatre. As non-commercial institutions pledged to the public good, and as permanent institutions (so they hope) expecting to be around long enough to be able to wage long fights and enjoy slow-coming victories, the resident theatres, and they only, are in a position to break down social barriers as well. Slowly, I think it is beginning to bother some of the people who run theatres that they have not yet done so. After all, for a theatre to become part of the community at large, and not just the avocation of a tiny majority, is the best way of assuring that it will survive.

From Beyond Broadway: The Quest for Permanent Theatres, by Julius Novick (Hill and Wang). A report on professional theatre throughout the country, much of which appeared originally in The Nation.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Roman Polanski's first American film, Rosemary's Baby, is a chic disappointment. It is chic in its tough-casual personal relations and no-kidding dialogue and, above all, in its choice for setting of the Dakota, that turn-of-the-century apartment house inhabited by gossip-column New Yorkers who pay premium rents for anachronistic charm. It is disappointing by reason of the tedium of its slow and repetitious development and because it is a mystery story that turns out to be no mystery.

Mia Farrow and John Cassavetes play a slightly swinging young couple who move into an apartment under the expensive Central Park West turrets and set about producing a baby (the documentation of their moves toward that end is part of the chic). This project requires the better part of a year, and the roles assigned to Miss Farrow and Mr. Cassavetes are not vivid or complicated enough to stretch from conception to birth.

All the color and vitality are bestowed on an elderly couple next door, played by Sidney Blackmer and, with particularly staccato eccentricity, by Ruth Gordon. These two take a cloying interest in the impending "event," suggesting a suitable obstetrician and administering enigmatic herbal drinks; and from a variety of oddities and coincidences the expectant mother becomes obsessed with the notion that they are witches, intent on harming her child. Being pregnant and therefore not as clear-minded as usual, she gets it slightly wrong: supported by a modern coven that looks like a convention of retired retail clerks, and with the assistance of the young husband (made complaisant by Faustian rewards), the sweetly sinister couple have arranged that the unfortunate woman should be impregnated by Beelzebub himself. They are quite beside themselves awaiting the arrival of a new little prince of darkness. That is the no mystery—you hang around for almost two hours to discover what is behind all the seeming devil worship, only to discover that it is devil worship. It won't wash: for the purpose of a good whodunit, I am willing to play along with smuggled imperial jewels, Sicilian vendettas, missing heirs and political infiltrators; but I do not go home in a very content mood on being told that Satan has been having an extra-marital fling at the Dakota. To paraphrase an old complaint, life these days is full enough of flummery, without paying good money to see more of it in the theatre.

One obstetrical note: a woman has a miserable time carrying the Devil's spawn. Miss Farrow wastes away, turns greenish white, and suffers a steady, excruciating pain in the abdomen. This struck the audience as funny, and it occurs to me that if Mr. Polanski's purpose in making this unusually pointless picture is to tell us that ours is a hell of a country, he must get some satisfaction from these callous giggles.

François Truffaut is an admirer of Alfred Hitchcock, and the chances are that he made The Bride Wore Black as a tribute to the old master. It is a tale of revenge with a vengeance: a girl's husband is shot dead as they step arm in arm out of the cathedral after their wedding ceremony (it is typical of Truffaut that the groom is shown falling dead at his bride's feet in a half dozen or more almost identical "takes"), and she dedicates her years of unassuaged mourning to tracking down and ingeniously killing the five men who were present (except for one of them, they were hardly implicated) at the time of the shooting. The picture displays Hitchcock's superb clarity of incident, but lacks the foxiness of his guessing games. The thumbnail sketches of the victims—Jeanne Moreau, the nemesis, plays herself as usual—are Truffaut inventions, more entertaining and a good deal more ironic than the Englishman can achieve, but the picture lacks Hitchcock's wild plausibility. His machines are often built from blueprints of berserk complexity; but, fueled with a tolerable amount of credulity, they run. It is asking too much, I think, to propose that a young woman, however implacable and resourceful, can improvise a succession of bizarre murders, in only one of which does she arrive on the scene equipped with a deadly weapon. People don't cooperate that enthusiastically in their own liquidation.

However, Truffaut is essentially a leg puller, not a mystifier, and he has a right to make his own kind of picture in the Hitchcock manner. You will enjoy Mlle. Moreau as Diana the Huntress in the lecherous artist's studio. Indeed, Mlle. Moreau, who from her last few films has become the most lethal female in the French cinema, is a treat throughout. Working from her basic pose of heavy-lipped petulance, she shifts with incredible dexterity into facsimiles of seductive promise, ethereal fragility, healthy practicality, vacuous innocence, or whatever else the occasion requires. She obviously believes no more in what she is doing than a Barker believes his spiel, but she delivers with the bull's-eye accuracy of a punch-card computer. I liked her more in the days when she acted, but the present technical display has its own excitement.

THEATRE

ROBERT PASOLLI

Roger Planchon's Théâtre de la Cité is the most prestigious of the many provincial theatre companies in France; indeed, it brushes against the firmament occupied by the Comédie Française, the Théâtre de France and the Théâtre National Populaire, the star companies of Paris. However, the Théâtre de la Cité is associated not with the intelligentsia and the beau monde but with the workers who populate its locality of Villeurbanne on the edge of Lyon. Planchon has made it his program to show this segment of the population, which he calls the "non-public," with productions designed to appeal to their temperament and their concerns. In consequence, he has become famous in the tradition-bound French theatre for his daring interpretations of those classics which form the backbone of every French company: Molière, Racine, Shakespeare. Of these, his mise en scène for Tartuffe has attracted the most attention, and it is among the three works his company presented on its first

TODAY
YOU CAN SEE IT ALL!
PART I at 2 PM PART II at 8 PM

THE TWO-PART PRODUCTION OF
LEO TOLSTOY'S

WAR and PEACE

TICKETS MAY BE PURCHASED SEPARATELY
FOR EACH PART!

ORCH. $3.75 / FRONT BALC. $3.25
REAR BALC. $2.75

½ PRICE FOR ALL UNDER 16,
WHEN ACCOMPANIED BY AN ADULT!

THE DEMILO
THEATRE

SEE IT ALL IN ONE DAY—
EVERY WED., THURS., SAT., SUN.

AUTHORS WANTED BY NEW YORK PUBLISHER

Leading book publisher seeks manuscripts of all types: fiction, non-fiction, poetry, scholarly and juvenile works, etc. New authors welcomed. For complete information send for booklet 103. It's free. Vantage Press, 120 W. 31 St. New York, N.Y. 10001.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed Study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15¢; 25 copies at 10¢ each
Orders over 25 at 7¢ per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

visit to the United States as part of the current Lincoln Center Festival '68. (The others were Molière's George Dandin and Planchon's own adaptation of Dumas' The Three Musketeers.)

Planchon has conceived Tartuffe as a serious drama about the arrogantly glib Orgon rather than as a comic one about the fakely pious Tartuffe. This is a radical shift in emphasis, although by no means one which distorts the text. It follows, of course, from Planchon's politics, which he makes most visible in the tableau with which he ends the production. After the deus ex machina rights the wrongs which Tartuffe had prompted, Orgon's family gathers in a group to congratulate the young lovers whose marriage is now assured. Orgon stands apart. Planchon has the family turn to glare at Orgon, recapitulating their attitude of righteous indignation over his gullibility. Orgon feels the reproach in their look and gives an embarrassed, rather self-excusing shrug. Planchon freezes the action and blacks out the stage. Clearly he would like us to see that Orgon has not admitted his responsibility for error, even though he has recognized the error itself. Immediately we wonder whether Orgon will not get himself and his family into another pickle. After all, is the bourgeois papa capable of growing with experience, or isn't he locked in?

Planchon vivifies the sociological stance of his production by making the world of the play as everyday as possible. Gone is the elitism traditionally associated with a Molière presentation—the ice-cream colors and elegant forms of dress and decor, the grace and refinement of behavior. Planchon creates a reality much more recognizably our own. The settings and costumes have a matter of fact banality which verges on the drab and, for the most part, the actors behave with deliberate plainness. By blocking the traditional assumption that Molière's world is special, Planchon prevents us from subconsciously dismissing the relevance of the tale to the circumstances of our own experience.

The character of Tartuffe as conceived by Planchon is very important to this conception. He is really quite an ordinary fellow; at first it was hard to distinguish him from his manservant. Thus it is easier to see how Orgon has been blind to his vices but, at the same time, it is harder to credit the virtues which Orgon has praised in him. Nothing in Tartuffe's behavior justifies the homily to his character which Orgon delivers at the beginning of the play. Here is where Planchon's suggestion that Orgon has an illicit, unnamed affinity for Tartuffe—the hint of homophilia which is the main reason for the production's fame—becomes a handy device.

That Planchon's psychologizing and sociologizing of the most familiar classic of the French theatre did not take the New York audience by storm was probably a result of culture gap. Psychology, if not sociology, is still an arcane subject in France; it comes nowhere near informing the spontaneous habits of thought as it does in America. In the French theatre, furthermore, the psychological approach is still a novelty, as can be gleaned from the fact that Lee Strasberg, the head of the Actors Studio, held the first Method workshops in Paris last September. A couple of the participants, both of them thoroughly trained, knowledgeable professionals, spoke to me about their experience with "the real thing" as if, for them, the dawn was breaking at last. This in 1967! Meantime, young innovators in the American theatre were hard at work finding ways to dispel the cold gray night which they consider the psychologizing Method to be.

But even on its own terms and in its own context, Planchon's production of Tartuffe harbors a deadening incongruity. The language of the play is in rhymed

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

alexandrines—rarefied, regular, elegant. Furthermore, the verse is organized into arias for single characters of substantial length. These demand to be rendered in the classical fashion, and the Planchon company, trained in the tradition, is equal to the task. If the poetry itself is acceptable as a convention in an otherwise "realistic" production, certain of its consequences for character behavior are less easy to credit. In classical débit the actor must shift his emotional tone radically from section to section of a long speech in order to keep it alive and moving. And other actors must occupy themselves somehow during their long waits while he covers the space of twenty-five to thirty lines. These terrifically artificial attributes of the production make for a basic inconsistency with the otherwise "realistic" terms, and are the more persistent for being a function of language—than which there is nothing more present in a play by Molière.

Planchon comes closer to a homogeneous production concept in The Three Musketeers, the second of the two plays which I saw at Lincoln Center. Here Planchon's modernity consists of kidding the pantaloons off the romantic style of life embodied by Dumas' drama of cavalier life under Louis XIII and Richelieu. The production is really a frivolity, if that word can be used for such an elaborate mise en scène, and its purpose is to entertain. People who detected an anti-aristocratic intention in it betrayed their senses to an easy conclusion drawn from knowledge of Planchon's "non-public"; the production goes far too far in gimmickry and laugh-getting to shelter the trace of a serious attitude toward anything. Some of the gimmicks work; some do not. (Planchon has a surprising lack of sense about repetition.) But the inventiveness of the business and the energetic abandon with which most of the players carry it out, particularly Claude Brasseur who is a spectacular D'Artagnan, give the production an élan which is hard to resist. The skill of the Planchon company is on display here: the dramatic effectiveness of the vignettes, the high language delivered on the run, the magnificent pomp rendered with economy of means—this is high-class entertainment.

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY CAMPUS: unique lecture notes. Hundreds of courses, taken directly in class by professionals from world-famous teachers. $1-$4. Send for free catalog. Fybate Lecture Notes, Dept. N, 2440 Bancroft Way, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

PUBLICATIONS

PSYCHEDELIC LIGHTING MANUAL! Make Light Machines, Strobes, Color Organs etc. Send $2 to: LIGHTRAYS, 713H Pine, Philadelphia, Pa. 19106.

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of Significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

"SELECTED POEMS" OF GEORGE LYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound"—James Turner. Available in U.S. from our outlet at: 142 West 11 Street, New York City 10011.

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.

Have $3 sent postpaid for clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harrisburg, Maine 04842

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

ABAS magazine begins publication in September. Satire, articles, fiction, more. $2.50 per year, single copy 25c. We also need writers. Send for more details. ABAS, 410 Summer Avenue, Newark, N.J. 07104

HIP TRIPS?

Travel Without Being Rich	$1.50
Travel and Get Paid	1.50
Island Utopias—Here & Abroad	2.00
Europe on a Shoestring	2.00
Jobs Overseas—$100 to $300	3.00
Worldwide Freighter Guide	2.00
World's Bargain Paradieses	1.50
Fabulous Mexico—Vacation Paradise	1.50

Order from:

Carlton Publications, 2317F Delancy Place, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103

Crossword Puzzle No. 1257

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 See 22 across.
- 9 The employer is found in the kind brought back with a couple to suit, perhaps. (8)
- 10 Hamlet's man was noble in it. (6)
- 11 Everybody in favor might get blown up! (7)
- 12 See 4 down.
- 14 The wayward son is a hero and a poet. (6)
- 15 Such music is certainly not the program type set to a blues arrangement. (8)
- 17 Drawing sometimes given the controller type? (4-4)
- 20 America's a bad place to look for such fruit! (6)
- 22 and 1 across Relating to Palestine, if the first syllable were stretched you couldn't say it wouldn't get you to first base! (7,11)
- 24 In case of fever, you might find one on your lip paint does, occasionally. (7)
- 26 A holder for music? (6)
- 27 Not necessarily a wing-flap, since the engine might have one. (3, 5)
- 28 Specific thing sort of allowed to a lesser degree to make a very light substance. (11)

DOWN:

- 2 Not Clearwater, Florida—Wisconsin, rather. (3, 6)
- 3 Didn't tell the truth, to admit, but you

- 4 20 down and 12 across A sight better with these? One might think so. (4-7, 7)
- 5 The one of these whose voice was heard in the theater was a flyer, rather than a marine type. (7)
- 6 Ring on a climbing pole, perhaps, in the stadia? (5)
- 7 Buys drinks and dresses, possibly. (6)
- 8 Proving the importance of time? (6)
- 13 It's rather convenient for a blues writer. (5)
- 16 True stalwarts? Not for such a back-breaking affair! (4, 5)
- 18 Dearest? Not comparatively, according to the editor. (6)
- 19 This sort of humor is seen in the eyes. 20 See 4 down.
- 21 Gamblers and office workers might look forward to them. (6)
- 25 Affluent, but with only one suit! (5)
- 25 The time of a prideful following? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1256

ACROSS: 6 Comb; 10 and 1 across Piece de resistance; 11 Alarmed; 12 Alkahest; 13 Linda; 15 Shyer; 17 Adjudging; 19 Displayed; 23 and 21 Nightshade; 24 Signaled; 27 Motives; 28 Economy; 29 Chat; 30 Plane trees. DOWN: 1 Rapt; 2 Shelley; 3 Sheba; 4 Abecedary; 5 Craft; 7 Osmanli; 8 Bedraggled; 9 Ballades; 14 Isodynamic; 16 Relative; 18 Jade-green; 20 Sagitta; 22 Acetone; 24 Sisal; 25 Aloft; 26 Ayes.

PERSONALS

I WANT TO MEET RUSSIANS FACE-TO-FACE ON JULY 30* THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

as a step toward
preventing nuclear war
3 Week Study-Exchanges

*Leave NYC: July 30 & Aug. 23
or MEET CEC in Moscow

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N-7/22, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036
WRITE-WIRE-CALL (212) LT 1-8113

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/31, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109. (405) 775-3140.

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors, indigenous designs, free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

HARVARD UNDERGRAD on leave '68-9. Seek interesting work or opportunity, any time, place, wage. Larry Lipson, 3 Clinton, Monticello, N.Y. 12701

ABSTRACT QUILT. Custom designed by an artist. State desired colors. Allow 3-4 weeks. Twin $80. Full $100. Queen $115. King $125. Naomi Berton, Box 191N, Storrs, Conn. 06268.

NATIONAL DIRECTOR/ORGANIZER wanted full time—liberal student political organization. $100 week start. Travel paid. If available at least one year, send resume to: Campus ADA, 1424 16th St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

"RICH" COUPLE share "estate Little Eden," beautiful Bellingham River, 20 miles Pacific. Write Eva Wilcox, Thora, N.S.W. 2492, Australia.

JOURNALIST, 23 member McCarthy National Staff, seeks full or part time work New York City. Knowledge production, circulation, promotion. Box 613, c/o The Nation.

EPISCOPALIANS — Join a radical-Christian peacemaking organization. For details write EPISCOPAL PEACE FELLOWSHIP, Box 101, 229 E. 59th Street, New York, N.Y. 10022.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Who is responsible

(And to whom)?

Responsible government answers to the defense industries: napalming the powerless abroad and Macing the disfranchised at home.

Most publications are responsible to advertisers, to whom delivery of their readers provides the bulk of their income.

We are responsible only to our readers. Become one and see.

FREE OFFER: We'll send you The NATON free each week for four weeks—or, if you wish to subscribe now, we'll extend your normal subscription by four bonus issues.

Tear out and send to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join the good fight for 1 year (48 issues), plus four bonus issues. I enclose $10.

☐ I'll try you for four issues, free of charge.

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 7-22

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

THE FRENCH ELECTRICIANS ALEXANDER WESTIN

THE

NATION

AUGUST 5, 1968 35 cents

Strategy Backfires

The GOP in the South

ROBERT G. EDELL

'We Care' in Kansas

THE NONPROFESSIONALS REVOLT

ALEX EFTHIM

THE COOL CZECHS

JIRI MUCHA

CITIES WITHIN CITIES

EUGENE D. GENOVESE

The Root of Vietnamese Resistance JONATHAN HIRSHY

LETTERS

objection sustained

Cannon Air Force Base, N.M.

DEAR SIR: Carl Cohen's lucid and persuasive case for the "selective" conscientious objector may have a sympathetic audience in readers of The Nation, but it shall continue to go unheeded in the Congress. ["A Man May Choose: The Case for Selective Pacifism," July 8.]

Recognition of Selective C.O. shall probably come in the courts on the ground that discrimination against the content of religious belief (in the expanded Seeger sense) is in violation of the First Amendment. There is one other possibility upon which Mr. Cohen too hastily shuts the door: in the opinion of one U.S. Court of Appeals, in any form modifies participation, not war.

Dale E. Noyd

Captain Noyd is a court-martialed selective objector, now in confinement. Editor

Bryan's quality

Dallas, Tex.

DEAR SIR: In Robert Sherrill's piece ["Hubert Humphrey: The Illusion of Change," The Nation, June 24] he refers to William Jennings Bryan as lacking all the qualities of a statesman. I wouldn't argue this point, but he did have one quality which many so-called statesmen lack. When he couldn't support the policy of his President he resigned. When Woodrow Wilson sent his second note to Germany over the sinking of the Lusitania, Bryan resigned as Secretary of State, stating that he thought this would lead the country into war. There have been situations since when high-placed officials would have served their country better had they followed Bryan's lead.

Carl Brannin

Democratic alternative

Evanston, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Gathering signatures for McCarthy is not enough. The pledge must go further. As a former editor of the Evanston Regular Democratic Organization Newsletter I am obligated to aid in wresting control of our party from those who have corrupted it.

I must pledge and I do pledge that I will not vote for a renegade liberal. I will not vote for voluble Hubert. In the face of the ultimate horror, Richard Nixon as President, I will not vote for Hubert. I want to be a member of the Democratic Party, not a victim of it.

If the decision is agonizing, the times make it so. We are told that Humphrey's record in the past was better than McCarthy's in the past. Very well. Then the Humphrey of the past would gain my vote. The Humphrey of today turns me to McCarthy.

Jack Korshak

review, please

Elizabeth, N. J.

DEAR SIR: Allen Lacy's "review" of Miguel de Unamuno's Our Lord Don Quixote ["Unamuno: A Sense of Isolation," The Nation, June 24] is a good example of the "nonreview." Lacy gives some insights into Unamuno's life, thought and character but no insight into the book.... What are Unamuno's major points? What are his interpretations? In what way do the latter differ from the interpretations of other commentators on Don Quixote? ...

George P. Marks III

EDITORIALS

The Double Vacuum

Because of special circumstances, both parties are apparently saddled with front runners who are strong with the party regulars but not notably popular with the voters. Both front runners are aware of their weaknesses outside the fold. Nixon showed his uneasiness when he whistled General Eisenhower from a sickbed to give him an endorsement—which the confirmed Nixon followers do not need and which will not convince others. Hubert Humphrey shows the same anxiety in his courting of the Robert Kennedy entourage and his overeagerness to capture Edward Kennedy as his running mate. For both front runners the problem is identical, but the answer eludes both.

In the polls, Humphrey's stock stays about the same and so does Nixon's. Humphrey is boxed in by his identification with Johnson, which he can neither repudiate nor justify; Nixon is boxed in by his well-deserved reputation for opportunism and cageyness and his reluctance to get into a discussion that would reveal his weaknesses. He has been able thus far to maintain an "above the battle" stance largely because of Rockefeller's hesitancy in going after the nomination until long after Romney's withdrawal. Nixon's fans say that he is "saving the good stuff" until after the convention, but suppose there isn't any good stuff?

The pressure against Humphrey and Nixon comes mainly from outside their respective parties. Everyone knows that the popular candidates are Rockefeller and McCarthy, who, if nominated, would draw forth a record national vote, but are handicapped for the nomination by the opposition of party regulars and a feeling on the part of many outsiders that the conventions are stacked against them. Despite their prominence, and Rockefeller's immense resources, both men are in a sense outsiders themselves, at least so far as the party insiders are concerned. Yet the reluctance of the voters to go along with the insiders' choice exerts a sizable pressure; after all, the insiders want not only to nominate their man but to win the election. They may be able to steamroller the opposition now, but what about November?

There is another outside factor: Wallace. This demagogue's pressure is exerted on both parties but more particularly on the GOP. While he has not gained spectacularly, Wallace's support, perhaps in the neighborhood of 10 million votes, is large enough to threaten to throw the election into the House of Representatives—which no one but Wallace wants.

The GOP strategy has flopped in the South (see Robert G. Sherrill's article, page 75 in this issue). In advance of the 1964 campaign the GOP started out to build itself up in the South on the basis of racism, of being more segregationist than the Democrats, the traditional party of Southern segregation. This strategy culminated in the nomination of Goldwater. Now Wallace has made a shambles of this maneuver; here the GOP hurts worse than the opposition.

However, the double vacuum creates the possibility (it is no more than that but it cannot be ruled out) of a double miracle. If Rockefeller should break through in Miami, it would help McCarthy in Chicago. Only McCarthy could make a tough race of it against Rockefeller. The more the GOP strategists study the situation, contemplating the Wallace threat and Nixon's inability to make it with intellectuals, Negroes, independents, some ethnic groups, labor, et al., the more reluctant they may be to put their money and their political future on such a basically weak candidate.

The dilemma facing the regulars of both parties, which may upset all the early calculations, is shown not only by these general observations but by the signs and portents that keep cropping up. When a shrewd politician like Governor Rhodes urges Lindsay for Vice President, the confusion among the Republican leaders is clearly revealed. Rhodes is calling on Lindsay to save the party, while the Humphrey camp looks for salvation to Edward Kennedy. But divine help is not to be found in either of these expedients. What is open to the controllers of both parties is the nomination of their strongest man. In both cases the voters have told them unmistakably who that is.

The 'No Chance' Candidate

It is thus that U.S. News & World Report refers to Eugene McCarthy, immediately adding a big BUT and going on to say that "regardless of what comes of his White House bid, Eugene McCarthy has already changed the shape of American politics for this year." Anyone who has been able to do that deserves respect—and most of all, one would think, the respect of the former supporters of Robert Kennedy, who were wont to say that their man and McCarthy adhered to the same principles, on that basis urging McCarthy to yield gracefully to Kennedy. Now that Kennedy is dead, one might have expected his followers to go over en masse to McCarthy, but politics is not that simple, nor usually that principled.

Instead, a section of the Kennedy backers have implied that they are interested in someone like Sen. George McGovern, to displace McCarthy and Humphrey and so resolve the contest which has given the Democratic Party and threatens to disrupt it further. Now Senator McGovern is a good friend of The Nation. He was one of the principal speakers at our Los Angeles conference in February, 1967, along with Senator McCarthy. We have the highest regard for him. But McCarthy is the candidate, the fight has been waged for him, the investment in money and manpower and enthusiasm is in him, and such efforts are diversionary. In the same category are attempts to fly a kite for someone like Tom Watson of IBM and, even further out, flirtations with Rockefeller.

This brings us to the outlines of a major phenomenon: Why is a section—it is only a section—of the Robert Kennedy entourage so opposed to McCarthy? Galbraith, Sutton, Goodwin, Nickerson, Bickel and others have supported McCarthy with energy and enthusiasm. Another faction, however, appears to be obdurately opposed.

The explanations offered by the pundits, columnists, inside-trackers, et al., do not explain very much. What

IN THIS ISSUE

August 5, 1968

EDITORIALS

66

ARTICLES

- 70 "We Care" in Kansas:
The Nonprofessionals Revolt
Alex Efthim
- 73 The French Elections
Alexander Werth
- 75 Strategy Backfires:
The GOP in the South
Robert G. Sherrill
- 79 The Cool Czechs
Jiri Mucha
- 81 Young Negroes:
The Unreported Message
Sophia McDowell
- 84 Revolution on the Walls
The Poets in the Streets (poem)
- 85 Two Memories of the
Joe McCarthy Era (poems)
Malcolm Cowley

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 86 The Cities Within
Our Cities
Eugene D. Genovese
- 87 My Husband's Father (poem) Josephine Saunders
- 88 The Root of Resistance
Jonathan Minsky
- 91 Book Marks
Sara Blackburn
- 92 Theatre
Julius Novick and Sidney Bernard
- 93 Television
Maurine Christopher
- 95 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis
- Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.
- Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS
- Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
- Associate Editor
PHIL ADAMS
- Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH
- Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright, 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 207

No. 3

they come down to is personal animosities of one kind or another, which surely do little credit to those who harbor them in a situation as difficult and dangerous as that which now confronts the country.

One is told that the two Kennedys never liked McCarthy, that McCarthy was tactless in not visiting the hospital on the night or morning of the assassination (is it customary to obtrude oneself on the family and friends of a dying man?), that he did not send congratulatory messages after Nebraska and Indiana, that he campaigned too hard in Oregon and California, that he doesn't understand power, that he runs a limp organization, etc. None of these objections has enough substance to call for rebuttal.

It is perhaps significant, also, that such objections are voiced most strongly by those Kennedy backers who did their utmost to keep Robert Kennedy out of the race. Maybe this was good advice (events have proved it so, in a fortuitous sense), but Robert wanted to run and it was McCarthy's candidacy that enabled him to run. He never had any reason to suppose that McCarthy would then step aside, so what, really, was McCarthy's offense? And if it is, groundlessly, construed as an offense, what makes it so unforgivable?

The Nation shares Alexander M. Bickel's sentiments, expressed in an eloquent communication in The New Republic (July 20, 1968). Robert Kennedy declared his candidacy because he saw what was at stake and could no longer remain out of the action, once McCarthy had set the example. The same reasons that impelled Robert Kennedy to make his bid should now impel his followers to rally around the McCarthy standard—not because of McCarthy personally but for the things he stands for.

As for drafting Edward Kennedy as Humphrey's running mate, the idea is inherently distasteful, and probably will strike the Senator in that light. It would be a wretched memorial to Robert.

One of the oddest features of the campaign is the failure of the media, by and large, to "dig" McCarthy. One suspects that they don't want to, that rationality and honesty somehow rub them the wrong way. But McCarthy ambles along in his quiet way, artfully and skillfully needling his opposition, making very few boners, showing a fine sense of timing and an instinct for the right word.

All the while, the lovers of phony drama complain that McCarthy is not emotional enough, that he doesn't tear a passion to tatters as a politician should. Yet he keeps gaining in the polls. His chances are, as Mary McGroarty says, "preposterous," yet "excellent." Maybe those who thought him too good for the American people will be proved wrong after all. But if so, he will owe little to those followers of Robert Kennedy who kept their backs turned on him.

'Black Hired Hands'

A series of articles titled "The Black Athlete," appearing in Sports Illustrated magazine throughout July and written by Jack Olsen, has shaken the University of Texas at El Paso (UTEP). Blunt charges were made that black athletes at the school were being used as "black hired hands . . . and the matter of their education ranked a distant second."

As if to confirm this powerful indictment, the school has canceled the scholarships of eleven black track members who boycotted a meet with a Mormon school, Brigham Young University. In a statement, the black athletes explained: "We . . . feel that the coach should have been more sympathetic toward us . . . concerning our feelings toward the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King [and that] our participating should not include the B.Y.U. meet because of [the Mormon] beliefs that the blacks are inferior and that we are disciples of the devil."

There were other reasons for grave dissatisfaction among all black athletes at UTEP. There was the matter of the difficulties black athletes encountered in obtaining summer jobs for themselves and regular jobs for their wives, while white athletes and their wives were easily employed. There was the repeated use of the term "nigger" by a member of the athletic department, and the coach's reference in a letter to the action of one track member as an "animal response." There was the fact that black athletes have no social life; they are wildly cheered while they "perform" and thereafter quickly isolated.

Following the cancellation of their scholarships, the track members learned through a friendly intermediary that the coach was waiting for an apology. The intermediary inferred that such action would help the now dire situation of the blacks, who had been recruited and courted from as far away as Watts and Harlem. In a cop-out (but an understandable one) the blacks—faced with the splicing of their very future—apologized not only to the coach but to B.Y.U. Even so, no change in policy was effected.

At least six of the students are determined to resume in September the education they were promised. To help insure their enrollment, concerned faculty members and students at the university have created the Disassociated Students Fund (Box 101, University of Texas at El Paso, El Paso, Tex.). So far the results are dismal. Out of an estimated $3,000 needed, only $200 has been raised. The drive has been greeted with granite indifference on the part of the city's intellectually balding businessmen, upset over the bogy of Black Power. (Highly illogical in a school where only 250 out of 10,000 are black!)

By surrealistic contrast, the budget for the UTEP athletic department—which an all-black starter team boosted when it gave the school the NCAA basketball championship—is currently $870,000.

The Priority of Profits

The Santa Monica Mountain range, which winds for 30 miles through the heart of Los Angeles, is a priceless scenic asset. A 9-mile stretch of this range—between West Los Angeles and the seacoast—is thinly populated and thus is a rich prize for big landowners who are thirsting to develop the area. All they want is complete cooperation from the city and county of Los Angeles and from the state. The assistance they will get from generous public officials if the pending legislation goes through will be overwhelming. The state proposes to build a six-to-eight-lane freeway along the crest of the mountains, at a cost estimated between $15 million and $30 million. The state will pay 70 per cent, the city and county 30 per cent, the landowners nothing. The beautiful two-lane road now winding along the top of the mountains to the shore does not give sufficient access to meet the land speculators' demands.

A roaring freeway around the mountain tops would end all hope for an adequate regional park, long proposed for the area. Sponsors of the park, in their innocence, wanted to set aside 20,000 acres. Their hopes were high when in 1964 California voters approved a $150 million bond issue for acquisition and development of land for state parks. It was expected that perhaps as much as $80 million would be available for a park in the Santa Monica range. But four years of pressure by the private developers took their predictable toll: only $8 million is now available for the project, and prospects for a 20,000-acre park have gone glimmering. If it is ever created, the park will be about 3,500 acres; even this will be split into two locations.

Every citizens' group that has examined the freeway project is against it but their pleas have been brushed aside, while spokesmen for the speculators and the massive highway-construction industry have received obsequious attention from public officials.

The imminent destruction of this wilderness area of the Santa Monica Mountains is comparable to the sabotage of the proposed 64,000-acre Redwood National Park in California. That figure, voted by the Senate, was cut to only 28,400 acres by the House of Representatives—and of this 18,000 acres are already in state parks. "This is really not a national park at all," said Rep. Jeffrey Colahan of California. "It is an appendage in search of a purpose. It fails to include many of the best stands and cannot be protected with any assurance." The House measure now goes to a Senate-House conference committee, but it would be hopelessly optimistic to believe that the committee will restore the 36,000 acres to help save what remains of the majestic redwoods.

A public official caught with his hand in the till is cast into outer darkness, but money is only money and can be replaced. Such a crime is insignificant compared to the legal looting of our natural resources, which are irreplaceable.

PHIL KERBY

The Test of Consistency

On February 3, 1940, the American Civil Liberties Union adopted a resolution whose effect was to require the personnel of governing committees and staff to be subject to "the test of consistency in the defense of civil liberties in all aspects and all places." The Union deemed it "inappropriate for any person to serve on the governing committees of the Union or its staff who is a member of any political organization which supports totalitarian dictatorship in any country, or who by his public declarations indicates his support of such a principle. Within this category we include organizations in the United States supporting the totalitarian governments of the Soviet Union and of the Fascist and Nazi countries (such as the Com-

SUMMER SCHEDULE

Until the end of August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated August 19 and August 26.

munist Party, the German-American Bund and others); as well as native organizations with obvious anti-democratic objectives or practices." Adopted a decade before the onset of McCarthyism, the resolution had a rather widespread influence. If the ACLU thought such a statement proper and necessary, it was said, then trade unions, professional associations and other groups would be justified in adopting similar or even stronger "tests of consistency." (The background of the controversy is illuminated in The Trial of Elizabeth Gurley Flynn by the American Civil Liberties Union, edited by Corliss Lamont, which will be published September 9 by Horizon Press.)

Within the last few years, the ACLU wisely decided to re-examine the 1940 resolution. A special committee was appointed to study the matter and in March, 1967, it recommended that an Objects Clause (Section Two) be placed in the constitution:

The object of the American Civil Liberties Union shall be to maintain and advance civil liberties, including the freedom of association, press, religion and speech, and the rights to franchise, to due process of law, and to equal protection of the laws for all people throughout the United States and its possessions. The Union's objects shall be sought wholly without political partisanship.

The Special Committee further recommended that the 1940 resolution be supplanted by a statement that officers and staff members be "unequivocally committed to the objectives of this Union" as set forth in the Objects Clause. But instead of proceeding on this basis, the ACLU in May, 1968, adopted a compromise statement (Section 7-D): "All persons who are members of the national Board of Directors, the National Committee or the board of an affiliate (or chapter), or a committee or other agency of any of the above, and all persons who are members of any staff, shall be unequivocally committed to the objects of this Union as set forth in Section Two, above, and to the concept of democratic government and civil liberties for all people."

At the same time, a second and longer statement was adopted which, after several recitals, states: "Therefore, be it resolved that the interpretation of the requirement stated in Section 7-D should be understood to preclude support of those principles which reject or qualify individual liberties and minority rights for all people equally, regardless of race, sex, religion or opinion, or which reject or qualify the freedoms associated with the forms and processes of political democracy."

So what started out as a wise determination to remove the 1940 resolution, and replace it with the sensible statement recommended by the Special Committee in 1967, has resulted in the substitution for the 1940 resolution of two statements which compromise rather than settle the question of principle. For example, isn't it possible, in the context of 1968 events, for a person to have grave reservations about the forms and processes of political democracy as we see them in action, and yet be genuinely devoted to civil liberties? In other words, has not the Union, in a commendable effort to extricate itself from the ideological trap of the 1940 resolution, now set the stage for further controversy?

What it comes down to is this: "The test of consistency" is determined by what a person does or fails to do in support of civil liberties, not by his acquiescence in vague general propositions which are put to him beforehand. The ACLU is a splendid organization; on issues of this sort what it does, the stand it takes, becomes a model for other organizations. For this reason we are delighted that the 1940 resolution has been removed, but we hope that there will be another round of discussion within the organization and that it will eventually do what it set out to do in 1967—namely, rely on a simple, clear "objects" clause. We have never thought that loyalty or consistency could be pretested.

'WE CARE' IN KANSAS

THE NONPROFESSIONALS REVOLT

ALEX EFTHIM

Mr. Efthim has taught social action to anti-poverty nonprofessionals and is an adviser to several community development programs. He is a special projects coordinator at Mobilization for Youth, an anti-poverty program in New York City.

Topeka

On June 19, at 7 A.M.—as Solidarity Day was starting for 50,000 other poor people in Washington—more than sixty psychiatric aides and other "serfs of the Kansas mental hospital system" moved quietly into eight wards of the Topeka State Hospital and took "administrative and clinical control."

For nearly twelve hours the underpaid, overburdened workers kept control as their way of protesting the failure of the state mental hospitals to provide proper patient care and meet their union's demands. They are members of the Kansas Health Workers Union, Local 1271, American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO. It is the same international union that represented the workers during the Memphis sanitation strike in which Martin Luther King met his death.

Instead of withholding their labor by going on strike, the workers put on a "Hospital Improvement Action" under the slogan "We Care!" For twelve hours psychiatric aides—among the most highly skilled workers in the hospital system—created their model of how a hospital ward should be run.

Because they claim their work load is being increased to the neglect of patients, the aides put extra workers in each ward. Where one aide had serviced twenty to sixty-seven in a ward, they now brought in from four to ten workers into a ward. For the first time many patients were fed promptly, bathed quickly, and moved out into activities. When a patient got upset, instead of being forced into "Seclusion" because no one had time for him, "the aide sat down with the patient, found out what was bothering him, and did something specific about it," said one of the Improvers. Signs were posted: "This is A Union-Administered Ward." Leaflets were handed out. Doctors, psychologists, nurses and other professionals continued to function in their clinical roles.

At about 7:45 A.M., Dr. Alfred Bay, Topeka State Hospital superintendent, pulled out his Honorary Deputy Sheriff's badge and proceeded to "arrest" union president Emerson Stamps and six other union leaders. With security guards surrounding them, the astonished unionists were hustled off to the police station, where they were released. No charges were pressed against them. They came back to the hospital and continued the Improvement Action.

Just before 6 P.M. the same day, a "restraining order" from the Kansas Supreme Court was served on the unionists. They left the hospital. Forty-eight aides were suspended from their jobs, most of them for thirty days. Immediately fired was Dr. William Bronston, psychiatrist, an adviser to the union; also Andy Neria, a Mexican American leader. Later Dr. Bay announced he would fire all those who were guilty of "illegal activities," especially Emerson Stamps.

Thus began a most unusual union action: workers made the point that they were more concerned about proper patient care than were the Kansas authorities. In the weeks since the Improvement Action, they have proved to the community that patient care must begin with proper working conditions for the psychiatric aides and other nonprofessionals. The example of the Topeka Hospital Improvement Action initiated a precedent-setting strategy for workers in the field of human services. It highlighted the excruciating role of the nonprofessional; often, as with the psychiatric aides, he does professional work for the lowest pay. He is the key service worker; the condition of the service depends upon upgrading the job and providing him with training, a career ladder, higher pay and better working conditions.

But struggles which start on a high moral plane still must be fought out with economic power. Support for the union was sought in the Topeka community, in black ghettos throughout the state, among the hospital staff, and among New Careerists in other parts of the country. [New Careerists is a movement, primarily in the fields of health, education, community development and welfare, to provide immediate entry to jobs for the poor and to give them the training and education needed to upgrade their status. The movement assumed organization form at the Detroit meeting referred to in this article. The new organization—National New Careers Council—includes the nonprofessionals as well as those professionals and administrators who support the new movement.] At the end of a three-week period, state authorities fired thirty-five union members. Then, and only then, did the union call a strike.

Picket lines were set up at the hospital gates. Scores of hospital workers, ministers, professionals, students and others have been arrested for carrying out the traditional duty of pickets: to close down a work place.

The unionists' actions have put pressure on the entire state establishment. State hospital doctors are protesting the conduct of Dr. Bay and other administrators. Gov. Robert Docking himself is on the spot. A Democrat running for re-election in a heavily Republican state, he is officially supported by Kansas organized labor.

Knowledgeable people believe many of the union-sponsored reforms will be won. For months before it acted, the union had patiently presented testimony, formed delegations and held limited demonstrations. It went to the administration of the Topeka State Hospital and its local satellite hospitals, the State Division of Institutional Management, the State Welfare Board, the Governor's Finance Council, his technical coordinators, and the Kansas House Ways and Means Committee. At some time or other, officials on most levels have agreed that mental health problems cannot be solved without improving the position of the aides. But others stand fast against the union "on principle."

Topeka is "the citadel of mental health" in America, home of the Menninger Foundation, which trains its resident doctors in the cluster of hospitals that comprise the Topeka state hospital system. Dr. Bay himself was brought in as part of a reform movement in the 1950s, but reform movements have backslid before. Meanwhile, the U.S. mental health movement goes forward, partly through more intensive personal care, the treatment of unlabeled mental conditions, the use of drugs, which also assists in outpatient care, community mental health centers, etc.

In spite of this increased understanding of the need for more human contact, Topeka's aides have been given more and more patients to "cover" in the ward. And also Topeka aides must help train resident doctors, take charge of wards, and carry out a multitude of expanding activities. "Seclusion" must often be the answer for an upset patient.

Some of the aides are more skilled than their doctors in ward work, yet their jobs are dead-ended. They cannot be promoted more than one grade. Starting at $242 per month, the average wage is $309, paid once a month. Two-thirds of the men work at two hospital jobs to raise a family. Three-fourths of them are black in a city that is 8 per cent black. Some of the best aides have such archaic job descriptions as "janitor" and "nurse's assistant." They get no compensated job training. There are no promotion guarantees. Many positions that become vacant remain unfilled in spite of the presence of qualified workers.

On June 19 the news media of Topeka—all owned by one man—described the Hospital Improvement Action as an insurrection, a rebellion, a take-over by angry underlings demanding an "impossible" 35 per cent pay increase. (This is the amount won by New York City hospital workers the following week.)

But community and professional support began to line up behind the powerful moral position of the union. Before forming a union, the aides had earlier joined with community leaders in the Topeka Citizens Alliance For Better Health Care. Now, as a union, the aides demanded nothing less than an overhauling of the patient care system: community control and union involvement in the management and policy making of state institutions. They called for a policy-making citizens' board, elected every two years, to oversee the State Division of Institutional Management. Also, the union demanded representation in the division on the State Civil Service Board and on the Executive Committees of the hospitals; union approval of hiring, firing and evaluation practices.

They demanded an in-service training program with a Career Ladder. With the aid of professionals they had set up their own union In-Service School three days before the Improvement Action began. Other demands are modest: a forty-hour week (instead of forty-two), an hour for lunch, a new set of job descriptions, and health benefits to include psychotherapy, to combat the mental illness which is their greatest occupational hazard.

They have asked for a two-year contract. Kansas has a Right to Work law. To sign a contract with a government service union, the state legislature must pass enabling legislation. Of course there is de facto recognition, memoranda of agreement and other transitional methods for getting union conditions adopted. But this union not only wants a contract; it demands that Governor Docking, Democrat in a Republican state, accept a hospital reform plan, written by health workers, for his platform in this year's election.

The Kansas Health Workers have taken over scientific as well as moral leadership of the badly needed mental health reform movement. The Wichita Eagle described the hospital situation bluntly, referring to the Improvement Action as a "strike":

Disruptive or not, they and their strike may be the best thing that has happened to Kansas mental health hospitals recently.

The strike dramatized a situation Kansas would much rather ignore. That is, we are putting far too little money into paying staffs for our state mental institutions. . . . We therefore have too few personnel. . . . And when it gets down to the lower echelons, like these aides, we keep them on wages below the poverty level. Yet aides are very important in the treatment of the mentally ill. They should be good people, and they should be paid decent wages.

It's a good thing the aides are causing trouble. Maybe they'll make us face up to our responsibilities.

Community help has poured in. One of the largest churches in Topeka has opened its doors to the locked-out workers. Two meals a day have been served; meetings and rallies have been held nearly every night. Professionals have held their own meetings, reported in the press. Petitions and letters were signed by more than 200 of their colleagues. Letters have been printed regularly in the editorial pages, all supporting the workers.

Dr. Bronston, a co-founder of the union, wired medical service activists, human rights organizations, and the National Council on New Careers, then meeting in Detroit. New Careers people sent in a professional organizer, two Career Ladders specialists, psychologists and psychiatrists.

The extreme reaction to the union drive is illustrated by a staff meeting Dr. Bay called a week after he had suspended the unionists. At the meeting he ordered all nonprofessionals to be quiet, and declared that anyone in the room who sympathized with the union would be fired. This presumably included professionals who had favored the union on TV and the front pages the day before. One nonprofessional stood up, said "I resign," then spoke his piece. After the meeting, wheels moved within wheels, and somehow the nonprofessional's "resignation" was not recognized.

That evening, with Dr. Bay's approval, Dr. William S. Simpson, the new clinical supervisor and number-two man in the hospital, spoke to a union meeting. In the church hall crowded with unionists, community people and professionals, he stated his support for an increase in the aides' pay, but suggested they appeal to their state legislators for necessary funds (the legislature is not in session). Although friendly, he was clearly not taking the aides' position.

Specialists from the National Council On New Careers addressed Dr. Simpson. They called for a New Careers center in Topeka, for a complete training and upgrading program with outside funding, for a local Career Ladder that would go from Mental Health Worker 1 in twelve steps all the way up to Mental Health Worker 12. Since Kansas is supposed to be a leading state in mental health, it could therefore devise a model program for all fifty states.

The New Careerists are already providing technical material for a future New Careers program for Kansas mental health aides. The program will no doubt be devised by Topeka people. Its success would depend upon the unique labor-community-professional-activist coalition which evolved from the Topeka struggle.

But the basis of that coalition is still the union-community group, a small but determined band. For three weeks they kept an information picket line outside the hospital grounds, handed out leaflets, and spread their slogan "We Care!" throughout the city.

Sadly lacking at first was support from the State, County, Municipal Employees (AFSCME), the union that had finally gone in to help win the Memphis sanitation workers' strike. AFSCME's State Council 64 openly attacked the Topeka local. It is an unwritten rule in organized labor that International Headquarters rarely intercedes in a local struggle unless the District or State Council is involved. Headquarters support, so effective in Memphis, was absent in Topeka.

Therefore a conciliation meeting was set up between the Topeka Local, State Council 64, and top representatives from the 100,000-member Kansas State Federation of Labor. Mediators kept tempers at a minimum. The main outcome of this meeting was an agreement not to disagree in public. "Let's get our family together" was the sense of the meeting.

Thus a fragile coalition opened the gates to bring in the power of the international union. That power meant Bill Lucy, a black unionist, assistant director of legislative and community affairs, who had done such good work in Memphis. Lucy also brought in a rare expertise in community action. And just two days before, a new black community component had entered the struggle in full force.

Rev. James Bevel, the organizer from the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, arrived for a rally, along with Heyward Henry of Boston, chairman of the Black Affairs Caucus of the Unitarian-Universalist Association. Also, black movement youth came from Wichita, Lawrence, Kansas City and other areas. The rally was a powerful emotional experience; it threw down the challenge. Not only were the unionists and the community ready to fight but so were other communities in other Kansas towns. Rev. Austin Harrold, a young Topeka minister of extreme directness, also spoke up. Quietly but firmly taking charge was Emerson Stamps, the union president.

The next day 400 unionists, community people, professionals and ministers, led by Emerson Stamps and Heyward Henry, marched to the state capitol steps. They chanted "Reinstate Us Now!" Inside, union leaders sat down with state authorities who again gave inconclusive answers. Two days later, the answer was conclusive: thirty-five unionists were fired. The strike began.

The strike is led by Emerson Stamps, 42 years old, a veteran of World War II, who went to work at the age of 13, but later completed two more years of high school. A mental health worker since 1948, he has had to hold two hospital jobs to raise his family of seven. His ability and commitment were described by a state hospital doctor: "What would make a man who has been one of the best psychiatric aides in the state for the past twenty years suddenly put his job on the line? Could people believe he doesn't care about his patients?"

Administrators, professionals and even politicians have been describing aides like Stamps for many months. Clayton Fribley, Republican chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, castigated mental health professionals for their lack of imagination in meeting their problems. Technicians attached to the mental health structures have suggested that, instead of raising money to get better professionals, perhaps the real need is to get mental health work out into the community. It has been strongly indicated that it would be cheaper and more efficient to train and upgrade aides for such jobs.

Recently, Stamps drove this reporter to his 85-year-old mother's house for breakfast. The old house reminded Stamps of something. "My dad was on the railroad, car-building for forty-seven years. He had the same job spec, the same pay category all the time. I've had the same job spec for fifteen years myself. No more!"

THE FRENCH ELECTIONS

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

The streets of Paris are unusually empty, with a substantial part of the population having gone away for their summer vacations. A month ago, people still talked about the "May 1968 Revolution." It was horrible in a way—all those beatings up of hundreds of students in the Latin Quarter by the CRS, the French riot police, one of the toughest in the world (not that there were no casualties among these, for smashing a cop's face with paving stones was one of the greatest joys of the young "revolutionaries"). Then there were the tear-gas grenades the cops used with great relish, as well as the "offensive bombs," which did not cause great bodily harm but went off with a terrific bang and were part of the government's psychological warfare—scare everybody to death. The tear-gas bombs were more serious: hundreds who got the full blast of them had their eyes injured badly, perhaps permanently.

There were five or six such full-dress riots in Paris in May, and the beatings of young people were truly sadistic; dozens, with their heads and faces smashed and with broken limbs, would be locked up for five, six, eight hours in police stations, without being allowed to receive even the most elementary medical care. Still, despite all these horrors, it can, at a pinch, be called a bloodless revolution; for only four or five people lost their lives in one way or another—for instance, the young schoolboy who, to escape the police batons, jumped into the Seine and was drowned, or the police inspector at Lyon who was deliberately crushed to death by a truck driven by a few rioters.

Perhaps only 1,000 or 2,000 students actually took part in the street fighting; the others can be divided into two groups—a great majority who more or less agreed with the "revolutionaries" that a complete overhaul of higher (and secondary) education in France was required, and those who were quite content with the status quo. These included a relatively small number who had good prospects of stepping into fine jobs after graduating, and who were upset by all the rioting which was likely to postpone their exams indefinitely—all the more so as a large part of the teaching staff, eager for fundamental educational reforms, had gone on strike and were refusing to deal with exams and exam papers.

The students' revolt might have petered out after a time but for one thing. By the second week in May practically the whole French working class, including the white collars, went on strike. It all started very suddenly at Sud-Aviation, the aircraft plant at Nantes, and then snowballed over the whole of France. Prime Minister Pompidou made important concessions at the Grenelle conference with the labor union leaders on May 20, but it was no good. La base—the working-class rank and file—rejected the Pompidou proposals, and asked for more.

General de Gaulle had not, it seems, taken the student riots very seriously at first. He cheerfully went off to Bucharest to preach there the Gaullist "doctrine" on Europe to students of Bucharest University, who loudly cheered his speech, and especially those passages which advocated even greater independence for Romania vis-à-vis the Soviet Union. However, with things getting out of hand in France, he returned from Romania twelve hours ahead of schedule. He soon realized that, unlike the Romanian students, the French students had severe grievances against the regime. The students had no say in the running of the universities; the programs were "traditional" without much reference to the needs of modern society; nothing had been provided to absorb in the universities their increasing numbers, so the students were still predominantly filis à papa, mostly children of reasonably wealthy parents, with only a bare sprinkling from the working class—who want their sons to earn a wage at 17, if not at 14. Moreover, the universities were producing either technicians or officials for the regime—or else graduates with no jobs to go to.

And here we come to the dramatic events of May 30-31. Since I last wrote, there has been an enormous amount of information, and even more of gossip, as to what happened at the Elysée Palace—and in Germany—on those two crucial days. I have come to the conclusion that what really happened was this.

On May 24, de Gaulle had announced a referendum on the desirability of "participation"—in industry, in the universities, etc. The general public was skeptical (in the midst of the chaos in France, there were more immediate worries), and the left-wing parties were violently hostile. It seemed clear that the referendum, if persisted in, would mean a defeat for de Gaulle—and his resignation.

So on May 30, he called a cabinet meeting; but before this could take place, it was learned that he had left by air for his country house at Colombey. The day before, Prime Minister Pompidou, with no doubt an eye on the job, had urged de Gaulle to resign—a piece of advice that was to cost Pompidou dearly. But at least two ministers—Edgar Fauré and Maurice Couve de Murville—did not lose their heads, and urged de Gaulle to stay on. (Fauré is today Minister of Education, one of the most difficult of all jobs, and Couve de Murville is Prime Minister.)

The next day de Gaulle returned, and made one of the toughest speeches of his career. He said he had considered "every possibility," but had decided to stay, since the people had elected him. And then he declared that he was dissolving the National Assembly immediately and that a general election was to be held within a very short time. This election, oddly enough, was precisely what the opposition had been asking for, and now de Gaulle took up their challenge. More sinister was his call for "civic action"—which savored of those paramilitary formations of the RPF in 1947-52. Mitterrand, head of the (non-Communist) Left opposition, declared on the strength of this that de Gaulle's speech was "a call to civil war."

The more general reaction was, however, different. The rioting, the strikes, the general disorder had lasted long enough, and barely an hour after de Gaulle's broadcast, a vast pro-de Gaulle demonstration took place in the Champs Elysées—composed mostly of “better-class” people, representing, as the papers put it, the Parti de la Peur—the Party of the Scared Ones. And people were scared—not only big business but also small business, and even the working class. The results of the election were to show this very clearly.

What had de Gaulle done while he was in Germany? There is now sufficient evidence to show that he did not exclude the possibility of a “Communist” Putsch, and he wanted to be sure that the army would quash it. The generals (including butcher-of-Algiers Massu) were, on the whole, unfriendly to de Gaulle ever since he had “betrayed” French Algeria. But a Communist Putsch was not something they liked. So they assured him that they would deal with a Putsch, but could not guarantee that the French troops would massacre workers or students if ordered to do so. This was good enough for de Gaulle; the police could deal with the students and the workers were not, on the whole, in a revolutionary mood—nor was the Communist party. But Massu felt that, in payment for the assurance that the army would deal with a Putsch, de Gaulle must release General Salan and other “French Algerians” who had plotted against de Gaulle and were still in jail.

De Gaulle agreed, not because he felt charitable to Salan and company but because he felt they no longer constituted a danger and because, in a general election, the extreme Right and the repatriated Algerians would be useful to the Gaullists. In the Presidential election of 1965, their candidate, the near-Fascist Tixier-Vignancour, had collected nearly 1.5 million votes. If this extreme Right voted Gaullist, a victory would be a near certainty.

In his famous speech on May 31, de Gaulle had paid the most extravagant compliments to Prime Minister Pompidou. It was Pompidou who was to win, very successfully, the general election for the Gaullists. In the first round of the election on June 23, the Communist vote dropped from 22.5 per cent to 20 per cent; the “Mitterrand” leftist vote dropped from 19 per cent to 16 per cent; the Gaullist vote rose from 37 per cent to 44 per cent (see the significance of the extreme Right vote!), the rest of the 22 million votes going to the Center and other smaller groups. In the second round (where nobody had obtained an absolute majority in the first) there was a gang-up against the Communists and the Left; the final result was that the Gaullists and their allies got some 350 seats out of a total of 485, the Communist seats dropping from 73 to 34 and those of the non-Communist Left from 118 to 57.

De Gaulle had calculated his chances with extraordinary skill; people were scared of the riots and the strikes, and voted for “law and order.” The most remarkable thing is that even in the traditionally “Republican” south, the Gaullists did extremely well, which they had never done before, and even registered substantial gains in the Red Belt of Paris and in the industrial north, many workers voting for the Gaullists when angered by pickets who were stopping their return to work. Workers’ wives felt that the wage rises had been sufficient and that an extension or renewal of the strike would seriously affect the family budget. In the south, the peasantry, scared of turbulent Paris, voted for law and order too; so did the previously anti-de Gaulle extreme Right, after the release of Salan from jail.

Now that Pompidou, as head of the Gaullists, had won the election, there came the moment of reckoning. De Gaulle fired Pompidou, replacing him at the head of the government by Couve de Murville. Why? First, de Gaulle had not forgotten that Pompidou had advised him on May 30 to resign, no doubt with the idea of taking over himself at the Elysée. Second, Pompidou, as the great victor of the election, was now, in de Gaulle’s view, getting too big for his boots.

Third, Pompidou of the Rothschild Bank represented, in the eyes of the public, that Very Big Business which was notoriously opposed to the relatively “liberal” reforms that de Gaulle had in mind with his “participation” slogan. Couve de Murville, the cold, polished, very English-looking functionary, had been for ten years as Foreign Minister the executor of de Gaulle’s will in international affairs. It is still too early to say what he will do in actual practice. His National Assembly program speech on July 17 indicates that he will give very substantial satisfaction to the students and the universities; that he intends to set up a regular “dialogue” with the working class and the labor unions; that he wants long-term reforms which will restore economic and financial health, limiting the rise in the cost of living and so maintaining France’s competitive power inside the Common Market. This is a problem with which no one is more familiar than Couve de Murville. So it seems that de Gaulle’s ambition now is to “make peace with the French people,” just as he had “made peace” (by and large) with the outer world, including Algeria, Africa and the Arab countries.

The French Communists lost heavily in seats, though not in votes. But on balance they were right in saying that there was “no revolutionary situation in France”; they also knew that the working class was really aiming at better pay, not revolution. The election results show that the country wanted peace and quiet, and that the Communists simply could not have pulled off a change of regime, even if they had wanted to, and everything shows that they did not want anything of the kind.

Although de Gaulle thundered on May 31 about the threat of “totalitarian communism” to France, he is in fact on reasonably good terms with the French Communist party. As he often said before, all ideology is a lot of froth, and below it is the nation; to de Gaulle the Communists are just as much part of the French nation as anyone. In the last few years they espoused (long after the Italians) a polycentrist, “no aping of Moscow” policy. Today I learn from a good source that de Gaulle expressed the greatest appreciation of the trip made to Moscow by Waldeck-Rochet, the French Communist leader, in his brave endeavor—together with the Italian Communists—to save Czechoslovakia from Moscow’s Stalinist die-hards.

To have not only the Czechs, Yugoslavs and Romanians but also the only two important Western Communist parties—the French and Italian—against them must make even these big bullies think. To conclude with a recent Moscow wisecrack: “Proletarian internationalism is merely the pseudonym of Ivan the Terrible.”

THE GOP IN THE SOUTH

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Judged by any standard, things could be better for Dixie's Republicans. George Wallace may spoil their Presidential hopes in three or four Deep South states. In Florida, Gov. Claude Kirk, who only a few months ago was looked upon as the great white whoop-de-do of Southern Republicanism, has been publicly judged by important party leaders as "an egotistical madman" suffering from "political paranoia," and has been deprived of the favorite son Presidential role that he yearned for. In Louisiana, the GOP, after budding briefly in the legislature, has withered away almost completely. In Texas, Georgia, and the Carolinas especially, Republican right wingers and middle wingers move about guardedly under an insecure truce.

If the above schisms and personality upheavals were all that marred the party, its long-range future would still be sound. But actually the Southern wing of the Republican Party is stricken with such basic defects that it may easily speed the demise of the national party.

Not long ago Ray C. Bliss, GOP national chairman, said: "We haven't had a majority of the Negro vote since the depression. But we've got to get our share of this vote, or we're in trouble." He said "our share" in 1968 means about 35 per cent (up from an estimated 19 per cent in the 1966 elections and 7 per cent in 1964).

If the GOP must have one-third of the Negro vote, then it is indeed in perilous trouble, and much of it can be blamed on the awkward, unimaginative and—deadliest of all—imitative Dixie wing of the party (which, as one Alabama newspaper man put it, "is just tryin' to cut a chaw off the same ol' plug—racism—the Democrats have been chewin' on for decades") and the dullness of its chief Southern spokesmen.

It's hard to feel sorry for Richard Nixon for any reason, but the Southerners he has recruited for his campaign leaders are almost enough to evoke sympathy. His regional manager is Howard (Bo) Callaway, the ex-Congressman and rich textile manufacturer who is one of the most notorious campaign bunglers in the South, as he proved in 1966 when he needlessly lost the Georgia gubernatorial race to Lester Maddox, and as he is now proving once again in his handling of the Nixon campaign.

On June 1, in Jackson, Miss.—apparently thinking that Mississippi is not wired to the outside world—Callaway stated that George Wallace should be in the Republican Party. New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller immediately pounced on this, properly labeled Wallace as a racist, and demanded that Nixon dissociate himself from Callaway's remarks. "Unless they [the Nixon crowd] repudiate this concept—that the GOP is a refuge for racists—the next election will see the death of the party," said Rockefeller. And he kept saying it for his next eight consecutive speeches. Nixon, alarmed, announced that he wanted nothing to do with Wallace and wanted no support from Wallaceites—a statement that did not exactly help him in the South and which he would not have been forced to make if it had not been for Callaway's monumental boner.

(A spin-off of this dispute in Florida gives another illustration of the unwillingness of Southern Republicans to disengage themselves from the racists. Florida state chairman William Murfin has circulated a confidential bulletin to all candidates not to attack Wallace "in some parts of the state"—meaning just about everywhere but in liberal-leaning Miami.)

On the same level of competence is Sen. John Tower of Texas, chairman of Nixon's "key issues" committee. The late Sam Rayburn once described Tower as "a pipsqueak" and few around Washington would dispute that. When Tower won his Senate seat in 1961 he became the first Republican to hold a state-wide office in the South in three generations.

With his election, Republicans all across Dixie took heart. For a time he was the rage on the banquet circuit. He still is a popular fund raiser, especially with right-wing Republicans, but as a symbol Tower is now rather shopworn. Southern GOP leaders no longer identify with him, partly because he does not really identify with them. His heart belongs to the anti-Communist fanatics of the Midwest and West, especially to Goldwater in Arizona and Reagan in California, although for this election he is supporting Nixon. "I do work with Southern leaders," he said, "in an effort to pull things together, but I don't consider myself any Southern Pied Piper. In fact, I have probably spent more time in California than in any other state outside of Texas."

Tower denies that he is an extremist, but he has a hard time backing it up. "I look upon myself as a rational man," he told me earnestly. "Ask Joe Clark and Gene McCarthy if I'm an extremist." Here he paused for a moment thoughtfully and then added, "Well, they might say I was. Maybe you better not ask them." He wasn't kidding. He never kids. Ironically, Tower was elected to the Senate the first time by a slender margin of votes supplied by Texas liberals who wanted to help establish a two-party state. (Willie Morris, now editor of Harper's Magazine and then editor of The Texas Observer, editorialized at the time: "We appeal to reason in urging a vote for Tower.") It was probably the most disastrous mistake made by Southern liberals in this generation.

Tower was no help at all in building a two-party state. He knows virtually nothing about organizational politics ("I'm not a nuts-and-bolts man," he says), as Nixon will discover in this campaign. And as a political orator and philosopher ("It's been my experience that politics is 50 per cent semantics"), he ranks with Strom Thurmond, whom he also rivals in the consistency of his racist votes against civil rights legislation and other progressive programs that might help the Negro. Tower never swerved in his devotion to the cause of Goldwaterism in 1964, and to many he is still identified with that campaign, so much so that the Nixon policy committee will inevitably borrow a strong whiff of the '64 fanaticism from his leadership.

To those who would like to see the South develop a true alternate party, men like Callaway and Tower are disturbing, not because they are incompetent and dull but because they reflect the mood of most Southern Republicans.

In most areas of the Deep South, GOP stands for those Grand Old Prejudices. A generation ago the region's Republican Party was almost solidly Negro; today it is just as solidly white. There are 5 million Negroes of voting age in the eleven states of the old Confederacy; about 3 million of them are registered, and virtually all of them are Democrats. Angered by the racism of the 1964 Presidential campaign, the Negroes stay away from the GOP. There were no more than a dozen among the 3,000 delegates to the North Carolina state convention this year, and only two among the 1,500 delegates in South Carolina. It used to be that one-third of the Fulton County (Atlanta) convention would be black; since Goldwater, it's down to about one-tenth. Although Sen. Charles Percy of Illinois, chief speaker at the North Carolina convention, was introduced as the grandson of a Confederate drummer boy, he got a very cool reception when he proposed that members of minority groups be welcomed. Negroes are treated politely by Republicans as a matter of policy in Texas and Florida and Tennessee, but only in Arkansas are they given a fraternity-type rush.

Part of the problem stems from the fact that the Southern GOP has had to build on a foundation of ex-Democrats, switchers (like Callaway) who brought their old hates, prejudices and principles along with them. Not long ago I asked Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, who was a Democrat until becoming a Republican in 1964, if he now voted differently in the Senate than he had voted before his switch. The question shocked him. "Voted differently? Well, of co'se not!" He said that Southern Republicans look upon the world with the same vision as conservative Democrats.

A typical participant in North Carolina's recent "Operation Switchover" was A. Sharpe Johnston, a businessman from Wake County, who explained: "I'm leaving the Democratic Party because I'm tired of higher taxes, inflation, socialism, dictatorship, lawlessness, wars, and rotten, stinking politics." Few of the switchers are that eloquently philosophical.

Most would find a more suitable explanation for their converted Republicanism in the kind of speech delivered at this year's state convention of the South Carolina Republican Party by North Carolina Congressman James Gardner. This was a few days before President Johnson announced that he would not attempt to succeed himself and before Dr. Martin Luther King's assassination, and the 1,500 delegates who crowded into the barn on the Columbia fair grounds were eager to hear Gardner insult Johnson and King. He obliged.

"Crime!" cried Gardner, a handsome young man who has become rich selling hamburgers, "is running rampant [sic]! Rap Brown, Stokely Carmichael, Martin Luther King and other rabble rousers—they'll probably be invited to the White House and have lunch with Lyndon Johnson, because Lyndon Baines Johnson will do anything to get re-elected!" At this point his voice dropped to shocked incredulity. "Martin Luther King will eat in the White House before that gr-e-at American Strom Thurmond!"

Every man and woman in that crowd over the age of 30 was a former Democrat. Only those younger may have been Republicans all their voting lives. But the switchers were hearing nothing they had not always heard under the Democratic banner. Anyone in Washington who went along with the Administration was, as Mr. Gardner said, "a stooge." Hydrogen bombs should be used, "anywhere in the world" if necessary to protect "one single U.S. soldier." It was the traditional Dixie shot-and-shell line of patriotism. "We're here," shouted Gardner, "for a crusade! We're talking about the very salvation of America."

It was significant that the leadership of the South Carolina party invited Gardner as their chief speaker. Harry Dent, state Republican chairman, told me: "We felt that he believes most nearly as we do [of all North Carolina politicians]." It was Dent's way of saying the South Carolina GOP is extremist and racist.

There is a tragic irony in the way that the Southern GOP's racism took what appears to be its permanent bent. Some of the leaders who brought it about actually intended to tap the anti-Negro reservoir of sentiment in a temporary way, until they had built up the party and felt they were strong enough to strike out on a more enlightened course. They were bright young strategists, though not as bright as they thought, who were not themselves really anti-Negro and who did not think the thing they encouraged would get too far out of hand. They thought they could tinker around with these passions, use them to build a party, and then reverse the trend before the party became warped. It all turned out to be a hideous flop.

The scheme goes back to the early 1960s. John Grenier, today 37, a successful Birmingham attorney, was the mastermind. Grenier recalls their scheme this way: "Ike and Nixon had given us a strong hold on the cities. In Alabama, for example, we could count on Birmingham, Montgomery and Mobile. But there was no confidence that in state races the GOP actually existed. We had to show that it did."

So W. D. Workman, a Columbia, S.C., newspaper editor, ran for the U.S. Senate in 1962 against the late Olin Johnston, a highly popular Democrat, and reaped a startling 43 per cent of the vote. It was Workman's first and last race, but for risking it he is generally credited among South Carolinians today as being the creator of the Republican Party. In Texas, the unknown college teacher John Tower had already taken 41.1 per cent of the votes in a fight to defeat Sen. Lyndon Johnson in 1960, and the next year in a special election to fill the Johnson seat Tower won, so Texans knew they had a GOP. And in Alabama, Jim Martin (with Grenier handling his campaign) took on the venerable Democrat Lister Hill for the Senate and won 49.6 per cent of the vote. (Actually, the near miss was deceptive. Hill didn't return to Alabama to campaign until the last month of the race; nobody was excited about the race, so a great many Democrats stayed home. The normal turnout for a general election in Alabama should have been at least 600,000, but that time only 400,000 voted.)

"What appeared to be great GOP strength was actually a numerical mirage," says Grenier. "but it suited our purpose for rallying the Republicans. We had almost beat the great Hill, and it really built optimism."

The next step was an extremely dangerous gamble. "Then we set out to get a national candidate in 1964 who could break the black belt where the whites automatically voted Democratic. We decided to go for Goldwater. You couldn't jar those people loose from the Democrats without somebody they thought was a segregationist." Having consciously solicited and used the racist's vote in 1964, Grenier is now eager to swing back the other way.

"With Goldwater, we lost some city votes, but they will come back for Nixon. Most of the rural whites who voted for Goldwater will go back to the Democratic Party, but we will hold enough of them to build on. Goldwater got them for us, but Goldwater also temporarily cost us the blacks. The blacks are the most fluid, however, and we can get some of them back.

"Now we must go after them. The ultimate majority we must have will consist of the cities, the middle-income whites in the rural areas, and 30 per cent of the blacks."

But like other Frankensteins, Grenier has discovered that he has lost control of the monster. He may now want to go after the Negro vote, but in this, while he has the support of some Republican leaders, he has little support from the rank and file. Today he tries to sound a sober note to balance the shrillness of '64. "It was inevitable," he says, "that we got some racists and Birch types who were simply inflexible. But it was just as inevitable that we outgrow their narrow viewpoint. The time has come for us to do that."

But who is listening to him? This year he and his old ally, now his political enemy, Jim Martin, opposed each other for the role of national committeeman. Grenier damned Martin for "ugly racism" and the main issue of their contest was thereby set. Shortly before the primary Grenier said: "I may very well lose the race, but I'm pitching my campaign on the question: can we stand racism under the leadership of the John Birch Society? I'll know after precinct meetings." So now he knows: even in his home county the voting went heavily against him. State-wide he lost 2 to 1.

Even without this nasty division in the party over the Negro-Birch issues, the Alabama GOP would, of course, be in a hopeless position. The only significant politics in the state is Wallaceism. Politicians of both parties who want even a reasonable chance at winning must come to terms with Wallace. Wallace makes it harder on Republicans these days than he used to. Ever since Jim Martin had the gall to run against his wife, Lurleen, in 1966 and went around the state demeaning Wallace himself as "LBJ—the Little Bitty Judge," a reference to Wallace's height and to his previous occupation, Wallace has made the GOP toe the mark. He controls—depending on whose poll you want to believe—between 60 per cent and 80 per cent of the electorate. Already he has demanded that the state's GOP Congressmen make it known publicly where they stand as to his bid for the Presidency. Where else can they stand? And so long as Republicans support registered Democrats—even though they are nominal Democrats only, like Wallace—the party isn't going to have much personality or structure. The truth is, the GOP in Alabama, as in Louisiana, is stone cold dead.

If the situation were just basically hopeless—that is, if no amount of good spirit and good money could build a progressive black and white party in the South—that would be one thing. Then the Dixie GOP might be excused for going the way of the old Democratic Party. But just two states away from the chaos of Alabama, and touching a corner of the chaos of Louisiana, is Arkansas—and Arkansas has shown that a biracial GOP can win, perhaps not with great victories but with a viable start in that direction.

Nineteen years ago V. O. Key wrote in his standard political appraisal, Southern Politics: "Perhaps in Arkansas we have the one-party system in its most undefiled and undiluted form." That needs radical updating. Arkansas seems on its way to becoming a real two-party state. Republicans hold far more state offices in Florida and far more state and federal offices in Tennessee, for example, but no other Southern state can point to so many changes (the best way to measure political success) made in recent years by a Republican officeholder as Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller can point to, and no other important Republican politician owes so much to his Negro supporters.

To be sure, it took more than one leader who was willing to stick his neck out. Rubel Lex Phillips, 43, a Jackson, Miss., attorney did that in 1966 in his campaign for governor against the Goldwater-Democrat, John Williams. In a speech opening his campaign Phillips said: "I think integration is inevitable, I think it is here, I think we must accept it and adjust to it." And he continued to say this throughout his campaign, clearly making a call for the support of Mississippi's 270,000 registered Negroes, because "in Mississippi if the Republicans are ever going to win they'll have to get a fair percentage—30 or perhaps 35 per cent—of the total potential Negro electorate."

Having taken a position that immediately moved him toward the role of an outcast in the eyes of many important Mississippians, Phillips felt that at least he might be rewarded by the blacks for whom he took the risk, and he was understandably bitter when it didn't turn out that way.

"The Negro vote was very light," he told me, reviewing his failure, "and Williams got half of them. I guess I got about 18 per cent of the total Negro potential. It's hard to understand. The Negroes will not get anywhere until they learn to discriminate. When I said publicly that we must solve racism, I thought this would motivate them. It really didn't. The word didn't get down. We speak of the Negro leadership, but in my view there is no Negro leadership in Mississippi. I mean anyone who would go to the Negroes and say, 'this is what is best for us.' He is right. But the problem can be overcome as Arkansas' Rockefeller overcame it—he set up as good an organization as money can buy and as Arkansas politics has for sale.

Between 1964 and 1966 he had ten field men roaming Arkansas (he still has five on the job), encouraging switch-overs and especially encouraging Negroes to forget the Goldwater scare. Truman Altenbaumer, a former Democrat who is now executive director of the party, says: "As it turned out, we had good reason to encourage the Negroes. Rockefeller got 90 to 95 per cent of the Negro vote in 1966. Our lieutenant governor candidate [who also won] got 75 to 80 per cent. Our attorney general candidate, who barely lost, got 60 to 65 per cent. If he had got the solid Negro vote the Governor got, he would have been elected.

"Jim Johnson [a flamboyant racist who had the open support of the Ku Klux Klan] was our opposition and he helped us a lot. I think race is a dead issue now, but I think we will hold the Negroes."

In this he is wrong. Racism, and James Johnson, too, are back this year, but this time they are starring in the campaign for U.S. Senate. J. William Fulbright—whose record on civil rights and labor legislation could hardly be worse—faces first the opposition of Johnson in the Democratic primaries and then of Republican Charles E. Bernard of Earle, a businessman and treasurer of the Arkansas GOP committee, in the general election. Bernard is a moderate in racial matters.

Thanks to the organizational foresight of Rockefeller and his followers, many Negroes—who ordinarily would support anybody opposed by Johnson—plan to stand aside and let Fulbright take whatever bruises the K.K.K.-Birch crowd want to give him in the primary, and then they plan to actively support Bernard in November.

The reason the Negroes are sticking together is that Rockefeller has proved to them that the Republicans don't forget their friends. Rockefeller has made the right kind of appointments. Although 60 per cent of the state's prisoners are black, Negroes had no representation on the prison and parole boards until Rockefeller took office. Also, he has Negro field men who not only set up black organizations but recruit black candidates for public office.

The almost solidly Democratic legislature has blocked some of Rockefeller's important reforms. He tried to change what he calls the present "sinister" method of selecting jurors, and failed; he tried to get an audit of the fish and game department, and failed.

But some of the lagging is his own. Not until The New York Times and the Arkansas Gazette disclosed what a chamber of horrors existed in the Arkansas prison system did Rockefeller move, cautiously, to clean up the prison system. The same procedure was followed in his cleanup of gambling in Hot Springs. At first he dillydallied, but then he sent state police swooping in to smash more than 300 slot machines and keep the gambling palaces closed down for so long that now it appears there will be no major revival. He has also, after some delays, begun to enforce state liquor laws even in private clubs (including clubs to which he belongs), with the result that, for the first time in years, there may be some serious attempt in the legislature to update the laws. He is an awkward, hesitant executive, but when he does lurch into reform action, it is practically always in the right direction.

Some other reforms must await his being elected a couple more times, for as Altenbaumer accurately points out: "There are 187 branches of the executive. That's how many boards and commissions there are. The Governor has no power over them except by appointment, and I think you would find this true in most Southern states. Rockefeller has one man on the five-man highway commission, two of ten on the state board of education. Arkansas has seen roads built right up to a guy's house and stop. We want to reform that sort of thing, but the highway commission just won't cooperate. So the record won't be in on this administration until we have a minimum of four years, and preferably six, so we can appoint a majority of the members."

This is the story throughout the South, which is not a two-party place as yet. It can hardly claim a party and a half. It's a place where you hear even successful Republicans ask for four more years, or six, just to get started. And it is unfortunately a place where most of the Republican leaders don't know what they want to have achieved for their state and region by the end of that time.

The evolution of the two-party South, at this stage, is only a power struggle, not the development of an ideological movement new to the region. And about the only thing one can say for sure about the average Republican is: he isn't a Democrat.

THE COOL CZECHS

JIRI MUCHA

Mr. Mucha, one of Czechoslovakia's most distinguished writers, is the author most recently of Living and Partly Living, an account of his stay in a Czech prison during the Stalin era. He was sentenced to six years, spent some time in solitary confinement, and later worked in a coal mine.

Prague

After a turbulent spring, Prague started on a summer of unpredictable weather. Czechoslovakia's unfortunate climate, with one day of sunshine paid for by a week of rain, has produced a population deeply skeptical about any permanence, especially of the happier aspects of life. As a result, the first wave of joy accompanying the regained freedom has been followed by somewhat morose doubts. I think this is letting the national character go too far. After all, the Czech events were the beginning of a movement that swept across Europe from East to West, culminating in the French student riots and the general strike. And yet this is the only country which has benefited by the upheaval and obtained results that can be expected to endure. For this, people should be gratified. It is no small achievement to have gained virtually all civil rights without a drop of blood or a black eye. I sometimes wonder whether the people here are aware of what has happened.

The Dubcek government is now firmly established, having obtained during the May plenary session of the Central Committee the resignation of ex-President Novotny and five more of its most discredited members. Naturally, this is not enough. A good third at least of its membership are people of the ancien régime and will have to go if the Central Committee is to have power to act. What seems disturbing to many is that these people, who are told daily by the press, radio and TV that their only honorable choice is to resign, keep sitting tight, insensible to the insults and apparently expecting that the whole fuss will soon be over. Since they are not heroes, it is generally believed that they are acting on the recommendation of powerful outsiders who may want to keep their people in as long as possible, or just do not want to let down their old friends. There is no proof of this, but to the man in the street it seems plausible.

There may be an even simpler explanation. The old guard may expect that Dubcek and his government will not survive the September general party congress, trusting workers to act as a retrogressive force since they will not yet have benefited by the new system. Freedom of speech or press is certainly not their concern; they are more interested in the dolce vita of Socialist mismanagement which allowed no end of loafing, assuring at the same time a fair amount of social security. I think, however, that they are gradually becoming aware that after one or two more years of the old regime even their pay would be worthless. There is also the heartening fact that numerous committees for the defense of freedom of the press have spontaneously appeared in factories across the country as an answer to the argument that the mass media are spreading anti-Socialist ideology. It is my belief that Dubcek rightly assessed the situation when he decided that the party congress should be held as early as possible. At this time the odds are that the active progressives will overrule the disgruntled old-timers; waiting another year might exhaust the fresh good will. Dubcek's great advantage lies in the stupidity of his opponents and the record of their twenty-year rule.

Despite this the people seem skeptical, even pessimistic. Some think that after the congress, when Dubcek will have dealt with his enemies, he will become another Gomulka. A few years ago the Poles, basking in the sun of Gomulka's liberalism, also believed their freedoms were there to stay. Some fear intervention from outside; others call it a bluff, arguing that the anonymous, viciously anti-Dubcek tracts, circulated among the workers, issue from the Central Committee itself, which is only waiting to abolish all this freedom once it no longer needs the liberals' support. The harsh comments in the press of most Socialist countries do not enhance the feeling of security, especially since the argument runs that our western border is not our sole business but concerns the entire Warsaw Pact. Such hints worry the whole population to such an extent that the Minister of National Defense found it necessary to explain to a suspicious public the General Staff maneuvers scheduled by the Warsaw Pact GHQ in and around Czechoslovakia this summer.

Despite the solemn declaration that no foreign hard-ware would cross our border, people remain tense and Dubcek is acting correctly in seeking support wherever he can find it. There are not many sympathizers to the north, but the south and the southeast of Europe seem to show interest and even understanding—Yugoslavia, quite naturally, but also Hungary and Romania.

The publicity given to these approaches reminds one of Benes' prewar Little Entente, well meant but rather ac-

Behrendt, Algemeen Handelsblad (Amsterdam)

We'll Remain Comrades—Whatever!

demic. Such an alliance might this time have a fairer chance, since the countries concerned have now the same kind of regime, ideology and aspirations, and an easily integratable economy, being all ex-members of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. To my mind, the main weakness of the old Little Entente was that without Hungary it was an awkward tapeworm, coiling from Prague, via Bucharest, back west as far as Trieste. Now it would have a sound territorial coherence—a common waterway, the Danube—as well as several important ports in two seas at its disposal.

It is too soon to make predictions but I cannot share the general skepticism. There will certainly be no outside intervention. The Russians cannot afford to lose more of their dwindling retinue and perhaps risk another Hungary, which both sides use as a bogey against each other. The Kremlin makes a great effort to swallow the sour Czechs with a smile, evinced by all the various government delegations traveling to and from Moscow. Strangely enough, the Soviet population has bizarre ideas about what is going on in Prague. People ask whether it is true that anyone known to be pro-Russian faces persecution and whether faithful members of the Communist party are in jail. One must wonder about the origin and purpose of such rumors.

Actually, there are two opinions about Prague: one, that a revisionist gang has let in the imperialist Trojan horse; the other, that a clever and purposeful group of party members has given communism a new lease on life.

Neither is true and I am certain that not one of those now in power anticipated in January what things would be like in June. Everything that took place happened spontaneously, spilling over a territory previously evacuated. Some of it was uncanny as, for example, the censors voting themselves out of office, or the police asking politely to be excused for past misbehavior. The young people promptly responded by escorting a young policeman, who had been killed on duty, across Prague to the cemetery. Suddenly all civil rights were taken for granted and the parliament is now busy legalizing the status quo. I don't think it has an alternative, for probably nothing short of an armed intervention could take those liberties from the people.

How, then, does this sober, defiant attitude square with the general skepticism and dissatisfaction? The current situation reflects, I think, an old misunderstanding. The Czechs have an almost religious attitude toward democracy. It represents to them not merely civil rights and civil liberties—individual and political freedom—but an ethos in human relations, a sort of ideal Jerusalem. At the moment, therefore, they find it difficult to accept the fact that free speech and free press do not assure uniformly high quality in what is said and published. Their current disgruntlement can be summed up best perhaps in the words of sad amazement that a Czech politician used for the motto of his book on Munich thirty years ago: "We wanted to sing with the angels."

This time, however, there is no need to howl with the wolves.

THE UNREPORTED MESSAGE

SOPHIA McDOWELL

Mrs. McDowell, assistant professor of sociology at Howard University, has recently completed a report on "Prejudice and Other Interracial Attitudes of Negro Youth" for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

The day after the assassination of Dr. King, Stokely Carmichael called his soul brothers into the streets of Washington, D.C.: "The only way to survive is to get some guns." Guns against the honkies. "Let's kill off the real enemy," was what he said. "The real enemy" is the honky; he always was and always will be. And there is no difference between one honky and another. That was how one Black Power spokesman saw the black-white situation in that moment of grief and anger.

But it is not how the Negro youth of Washington saw it in a 1966 interracial attitude survey with which I was associated. One question in that investigation of the views of 582 male and female high school students and dropouts, aged 16 to 19, was, "Do you feel the same way toward all white people?" Less than 15 per cent said yes: (13 per cent of those in school and 18 per cent of the dropouts; 11 per cent of the females and 18 per cent of the males).

To the 85 per cent who said all whites were not the same, we asked, open-endedly, "With what kinds of white people would you be most willing to associate?" and then, "With what kinds of white people would you be most unwilling to associate?" The basis for selection most respondents stressed was the attitude of those white people toward Negroes. It is the criterion named by two-thirds of them with regard to the kinds of whites with whom they are willing to associate, and by three-fourths of them with regard to the kinds of whites with whom they are unwilling to associate.

This preoccupation of Negroes with white attitudes toward Negroes took many forms. Most simply, and very repetitiously, it was stated as, "I am willing to associate with any whites who are willing to associate with me." Variant forms included whites "who don't intensely dislike Negroes," or "who are not prejudiced, or don't show it," or more specifically, "who do not try to make you angry by saying things to harm you if you are a Negro."

Sometimes more than a mere absence of hostility was required, as in the phrase, "white people that would stand by your side, like for instance in fights, etc." Sometimes attitudes of equality were specified, such as, "white people who don't think they are above you," or "who will treat me as I would prefer to be treated (equal). They are the ones who don't care if you are purple."

While other bases for selection were less frequently mentioned (individual personality or character traits in about one-third of the replies; or certain middle-class qualities in less than one-tenth), the pattern of rejection of whites emphasized the familiar racial factors in reverse. There was also much sensitivity to the hypocrisy of whites who "show teeth"—the pretenders, "who are friendly to you on the outside but hate you on the inside," or "that would smile in your face and laugh behind your back and call you black," or "talk like a dog about you when you are not there."

All this resentment of the white assumption of superiority is in keeping with what came out several years earlier when I asked an undergraduate class of Negro students to list ten "stereotypes about whites" which they found prevalent among Negroes. While many cited physical traits, psychological and moral characteristics, or the better opportunities, privileges and achievements of the whites, fully one-fourth of the items hit directly on white attitudes toward Negroes and white feelings of superiority.

When in the 1966 study the same question about choice of associates was asked with regard to other Negroes, racial concerns were mentioned by 12 per cent of the respondents, as a basis for acceptance, though by 21 per cent as a basis for rejection. There was approval for those Negro associates who showed race loyalty either in ideology or in individual dealings. "Negroes who try to pass for white as if to be a Negro were a disgrace," "uppity" ones, "Negroes who pretend to be better than other Negroes," were censured, as were Uncle Toms and "the ones that let anything be said about them and not try to stand up for their right." Negroes whose personal behavior would disgrace the racial reputation were rejected, as were those who evidenced lack of respect for fellow Negroes, or who otherwise dissociated themselves from race.

This sense of in-group loyalty was behind the recent walkout of Negro moderates from a conference with Maryland Governor Agnew when he criticized their failure to deplore publicly Negro extremists. On the other hand, some of our respondents, both academics and dropouts, rejected fellow Negroes "who think the whites owe them something," or "who down every white person for no apparent reason. These Negroes have no tolerance."

Our study of the interracial attitudes of Negro youth did not span the entire range of sentiments covered by that umbrella term, prejudice. Sociologists are beginning to distinguish among various aspects of prejudice and to analyze separately its different manifestations, such as stereotypes, personal resentment, hostility, racial ideology, militancy, social distance feelings and discrimination. They are finding that these separate manifestations are not necessarily correlated nor coexistent in the same person. Indeed, our research demonstrates that the concept of prejudice as ordinarily employed is not accurate or useful in analyzing Negro attitudes toward whites.

Our investigation was centered on just one aspect of prejudice: "social distance." The list of fifteen situations on our questionnaire evolved from three years of pre-tests performed by six classes of sociology students at Howard University, with thousands of Negro respondents. Each item on the list is important because it represents a practical interracial situation in which Negro youth may engage currently. Here is the tabulation.

Being a member of a club where most of the members are white	2.69
Being a member of a club with some white members, but where most of the members are Negro	3.55
Being a member of a club where about half of the members are white, and about half are Negro	3.45
Marrying a white person	1.67
Working on a job under a white person	3.33
Working on a job side by side with a white person	3.58
Being a member of a church where most of the members are white	2.84
Being a member of a church where about half of the members are white, and about half are Negro	3.52
Being a member of a church with some white members, but where most of the members are Negro	3.55
Dating a white person	2.28
Having a close friend who is white	3.40
Having a school teacher who is white	3.60
Going to school where most of the students are white	2.81
Going to a school where about half of the students are white, and about half are Negro	3.54
Going to a school with some white students, but where most of the students are Negro	3.70

We submitted questionnaires to 582 Negro youths in several groups, asking them to indicate on a scale of 0 to 4 how willing or unwilling they would be to associate personally with whites in each of the interracial situations named. The person giving out the questionnaire would always say, "Assume that the whites involved would be completely willing to associate with Negroes," but this hypothesis seemed so improbable that it was often greeted with guffaws. Nevertheless, we used it because we wanted to test not how the young Negroes thought whites felt about them but how they themselves felt about whites.

Numbers at the right in the chart are the average scores of the groups surveyed. The scale runs, 4: completely willing; 3: somewhat willing; 2: unsure; 1: somewhat unwilling; 0: completely unwilling. The average index of the 582 young people for the entire list was 3.16, a score between "somewhat" and "completely" willing.

The questionnaire showed a Negro willingness to associate with whites that was, in general, much higher than we expected, but this willingness was not extended equally or indiscriminately to all whites. It also varied with the situation. And when the subjects were grouped by sex, school status, cumulative school desegregation experience, parental education, parental occupation, or their own occupational ambitions, the most important group differences were between school dropouts and those in school.

The fact that Negro willingness to associate with whites varies with the kind of activity was almost predictable. Among whites, sociologists generally find greatest reluctance for interracial association in dating and marriage, and Negroes display the mirror image of these attitudes.

Most interracial attitude studies have distinguished between social distance feelings in intimate groups like clubs and in less personal associations like schools or churches, and find a greater hesitancy with regard to the more intimate groups. More than twenty years ago Gunnar Myrdal observed in An American Dilemma that for Negroes, compared to whites, there was a "reverse rank order of discrimination," Negroes resisting least the discriminations placed highest on the white man's list. Today, the white man may continue to make much of his taboo against personal intimacies with Negroes, but our 1966 study shows that young Negroes still do not seek personal contacts with whites that are not reciprocal. The investigation also brings out another facet of Negro social distance feelings by making distinctions on the basis of racial mixture: predominantly Negro, balanced, predominantly white. The respondents rejected predominantly white situations, reacting not so much to the nature of the group's activity or the intimacy of association involved as to the racial composition of the group. This suggests that on a personal basis the Negro is not avoiding whites, but is avoiding situations in which he himself would be vulnerable, and possibly rejected. If a lot of other Negroes are around, he feels some assurance of acceptance.

The Negro's so-called "prejudice toward whites," we found, does not conform to the pattern of white prejudice toward Negroes, nor does it meet the same criteria. There is, of course, no one official sociological definition for prejudice or even a consensus on its essential components. But many have noted its negative and categorical qualities; have found it ethnocentric and self-aggrandizing; institutionally sanctioned and economically advantageous; unwarranted, irrational and rigid; aggressive and hostile. These criteria do not fit the Negro interracial attitudes we examined, which have, moreover, a distinctive quality of their own. We call this the "contingency factor."

Negroes and whites in the United States have never been simply equal-status groups eying each other from the parallel levels of their own separate but equal ethnocentrism. One has often heard references to a benign white person who "treated a Negro kindly"; but even now it is hard to imagine the reverse phrasing of "a Negro treating a white person kindly." The Negro's minority group position has not been like that of the Jew and Catholic; it has been more caste-like, and there has been relatively little in-group pride. True, separatist movements have appeared in every era, as have champions of negritude, currently expressed in the romanticization of "soul" and the political slogan of Black Power. But more generally the Negro's attitude toward himself has involved racial self-hate, a painful awareness of failure to meet the dominant physical, economic and social standards. Lacking self-pride, the Negro has rarely been able to afford the luxury of uncomplicated hostility; his reaction becomes ambivalent, his prejudice uncertain.

The personal avoidance of whites by Negroes is not aggressive, like white prejudice, but often defensive. Once burned, twice shy. For instance, one young man who enjoyed cordial relationships with his white fellow workers in a steel mill, never accepted their invitations to have a beer after work; he feared that, with alcohol, they would reveal a heretofore concealed prejudice. For him, all whites were guilty of prejudice until proved innocent. He wouldn't "stick his neck out" but he did remain willing "to be shown." In short, Negro disposition toward whites is contingent on white predisposition toward Negroes.

Of course, the white predisposition on which Negro disposition depends is differently assessed under different circumstances and by different individuals. It does not have equal weight among all segments of the Negro population. The disparity in willingness scores between dropouts and those still in school was statistically more important than the education or occupation of our subjects' parents, or his own occupational aspirations. Our interpretation is that school status is not one single socioeconomic factor but a complex index of the Negro youth's relationship to the white world.

The dropout usually comes from what is generally called "poorer" background, whether by "poor" is meant less money, less education, less occupational prestige, or less white middle-class culture. But whatever the range of occupational and educational conditions in the dropouts' background (and our data demonstrate a range), being a dropout signifies, in practical terms, if not ideologically, opposition to the Establishment. The dropout is not only out of the schools (which provide entrance into the American Establishment) but "out of it" in general. He has been segregated, unintegrated and abandoned. He, in turn, has abandoned the schools. It is therefore not surprising that his predilection for associating with whites proved markedly low. The mean percentage of "completely willing" responses to the items on our test was only about 40 per cent for the dropouts, compared with close to 60 per cent for their in-school contemporaries.

Our study of personal dispositions and sociological background factors among 16 to 19 year olds did not reveal many of the ideological conflicts that are today polarizing Negroes. Among this high school population in 1966 there were no extremists who said, "Stop the white world. I want to get off"; there was little evidence of Black Nationalism and Black Power. Elsewhere, there were militant Negro youth who had repudiated integration. For them, the hated old slogan "separate but equal" had acquired a new validity. Some of these claimed that, realistically, integration is only for the middle classes, while for the lower-class Negro immediate welfare goals were more vital than status goals. But such views were not advanced by our respondents.

Nor were there many references to "soul," the shibboleth of the new ethnocentrism, the romanticization of that special "Black" quality of pathos and joy and spontaneity of spirit that manifests itself in song and dance, in ethnic food and language and people. "Soul" is to the Negro cultural image what Black Power is to the Negro political image. It appears in the lyrics of popular songs and in the graffiti on the walls of slum buildings. Soul has come to be the pendulum swing from self-hate, the denial-with-a-vengeance of Negro inferiority, the glorification of everything that is distinctively Negro. It is the Orwellian reverse catechism: Black is good; white is bad, or if not totally bad, then at least spurious, watered down, second rate. But there was almost no "soul" in the comments we received. We wondered if such viewpoints were nonexistent or whether our questionnaire failed to encourage their expression. How were we to reconcile our research findings of interracial assent with the sensational evidence of interracial dissent in the cities of this land?

It is only upon reflection that one sees that there is no real inconsistency. Explosions of anti-white rage occur, but there are also constant undercurrents of rapprochement and identification. For the most part, the Negro youth in the newspaper headlines are not rioting because they want "out" from their white world but because they want "in." They share the same values as their white peers, and covet the same rights and privileges, opportunities and rewards, necessities and luxuries. (This overview may not apply to the ideologically radical, or the extremely alienated. It may apply less in periods of economic stress or social strain, like poor housing or summer heat and crowdedness. But it does apply to a large cross section of the population whom our data represent.)

The riots in today's headlines are not new. The explanation of the 1935 Harlem race riot by a New York Mayor's Commission—"resentment against racial discrimination and poverty in the midst of plenty"—sounds as contemporary as the 1968 Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, which Tom Wicker summarized this way: "the single overriding cause of rioting in the cities was not any one thing commonly adduced—unemployment, lack of education, poverty, exploitation—but . . . all of these things and more expressed in the insidious and pervasive white sense of the inferiority of black men."

Even the fires which mean catastrophe for some may have a different meaning for others. One young woman told us how joyously she welcomed fires in her Harlem childhood. The flames destroyed nothing precious; there was nothing precious to be destroyed. Fires were the only way to get rid of rats and roaches. And they legitimized claims on the attention and generosity of others, claims effective only in crisis.

Destruction may carry mixed communications. When the rioting vandal destroys the property of a white storekeeper, and loots it of the coveted symbols of white society—the TV, the sports shirt, the trinket or the necessity—this is not an uncomplicated impulse act. It may be a symbol of the ambivalence of the black outsider toward a white society which makes promises—but the promises are not kept. Hence frustration, anger, and finally violence. In the language of the 1968 "riot report": "What white Americans have never fully understood—but what the Negro can never forget—is that white society is deeply implicated in the ghetto. White institutions created it, white institutions maintain it, and white society condones it." The riots do carry the message of hostility; but they carry the opposite message as well: that when economic conditions permit it, institutions honestly endorse it, and when white people assure their sincere acceptance, young Negroes are "quite willing" to live together with whites in interracial amity.

REVOLUTION ON THE WALLS

The revolutionary spring in Paris was an incredible, joyous outburst of solidarity while it lasted. Much of the spirit and spontaneity of the student movement was fortunately recorded for posterity on the walls of Paris' public buildings. A selection of graffiti (including the anonymous poem opposite), reflecting many (though not all) aspects of the movement, is here presented. (Assembled by George Ross.)

Elan Vital

*L'imagination prend le pouvoir
Soyez réalistes, demandez l'impossible
La Poésie est dans la rue
Je décrète l'état de bonheur permanent Cours, camarade, le vieux monde est derrière toi*

Revolutionary Whimsy

*Dieu, je vous soupçonne d'être un intellectuel de gauche
Si besoin était de recourir à la force, ne restez pas au milieu
Je suis marxiste, tendance Groucho
Mettez un flic sous votre moteur
Si tu veux être heureux, pends ton propriétaire*

The University

*Quand le dernier des sociologues aura été étranglé avec les tripes du dernier bureaucrate, aurions-nous encore des problèmes?
1936 dernière couche de peinture
Nous on veut nos examens (signé les bourgeois)
Violez votre Alma Mater*

Politics and Revolution

*Millionnaires de tous les pays, unissez-vous; le vent tourne
Les murs ont des oreilles. Vos oreilles ont des murs
Une révolution qui demande que l'on se sacrifie pour elle est une révolution à la papa.
Un seul weekend non-révolutionnaire est infiniment plus sanglant qu'un mois de révolution permanent Notre espoir ne peut venir que des sans espoir*

Self-Criticism

*Les murs ont des oreilles. Vos oreilles ont des murs
Ne consommons pas Marx
Un flic dort en chacun de nous; il faut le tuer*

Imagination is seizing power
Be realistic, demand the impossible
Poetry is in the streets
I decree the state of permanent happiness
Run, comrade, the old world is behind you

God, I suspect You of being a left-wing intellectual
If it is necessary to resort to force, don't stay around in the middle
I'm a Marxist, Groucho type
Put a cop under your car
If you want to be happy, hang your landlord

When the last of the sociologists has been strangled with the intestines of the last bureaucrat, will we still have problems?
1936 last coat of paint
We want our exams (signed the bourgeois)
Rape your Alma Mater

Millionaires of all countries, unite; the wind is changing
Do the Gaullists have one too many chromosomes?
A revolution which expects you to sacrifice yourself for it is a revolution à la papa
A single nonrevolutionary weekend is much bloodier than a month of permanent revolution
Our hope can come only from those without hope

The walls have ears. Your ears have walls
Let's not consume Marx
A cop sleeps within each of us; he must be killed

THE POETS IN THE STREETS

*Je persiste à penser
Que la place d'un poète en ce moment
Est dans la rue
Que vous devez prendre d'assaut
Les tours d'Ivoire. Les raser
Proclamer
L'état d'urgence*

*Quand je me laisse aller
A pleurnicher sur ma misère
Si cette misère n'est pas aussi
La tienne
Lecteur
Frappe-moi fort*

*Qu'il n'y ait plus
De poésie absente*

I can't help thinking
That at this moment a poet's place
Is in the street
That you poets should storm and capture
The Ivory Towers. Raze them
Proclaim
A state of emergency

If I give in
To mawkishness about my misery
And this misery isn't also Yours Reader
Punch me good and hard

Let's put an end
To poetry in absentia

Translated by Joachim Neugroschel

TWO MEMORIES OF THE JOE MCCARTHY ERA

by Malcolm Cowley

POEM IN A TIME OF CRISIS: 1951

*—jumped over the quick brown fox jumped over the lazy dog jumped over now is the time jumped over all good men and true jumped into the party to save the party
to save the nation*

a grand old nation it was a swell party at the best hotel

the birds and the beasts were there the quick brown foxes were there the lazy dogs were there all good men and true were there all right-thinking women

*—the hot mammas and nincompapas
the big baboon by the light of the moon the alligators, commentators punks and investigators the astors and top brassards colonel obtuse of the daily noose lucy and la puce and the holy goose all came to the aid of the party and saved the party and saved the nation.*

THE ENEMY WITHIN: 1952

*Beware of snogs.
They penetrate everywhere.
They are rich in subterfuge and delation.
They whisper against you in a corner of your mind.*

*All evil comes from snogs.
Unmask them, drive them into stony place,
encircle them with stones and stone them dead,
so that the earth lies clean under God's clean eye and is God's earth again.*

Still, might it be that a snog survives, a shadowy node of evil among the justicers?

*How tell a snog
in all his involute treachery, his disguise hiding disguises? Only one rule is safe:
all the accused are guilty,
all the accused feel guilt in their hearts,
all stand accused, wife, mistress, lover, brother, detective, criminal, judge, even yourself—*

*pursued by snogs to the last brink of darkness, cornered, pushed backward, hurtled into the gulf
as into an ether sleep;
spinning, hearing their laughter spiral down,
already smelling the green death below,
yet hearing your own laughter spiral up because of a last ironical doubt: was I victim or priest? Myself was I or wasn't I, was-wasn't in a faster and faster downward spiral, wasn't I, was, wasn't I a snog?*

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Cities Within Our Cities

EUGENE D. GENOVESE

Mr. Genovese is professor of history at Sir George Williams University, Montreal. He is the author of The Political Economy of Slavery (Pantheon).

The urban and racial crisis into which we have plunged has deep roots in our past, but the events of the 20th century alone tell us enough. These eight books, written during the last seventy years, together give us many of the main ingredients of the story.

Du Bois' Philadelphia Negro, written in 1899, will repay the reader's effort on two counts. As a sociological study of a black community of 40,000 in a major city at the end of the 19th century, it presents data, compiled from a painstaking canvass and accompanied by a sensitive analysis, on Negro economic, social and institution life. Its general conclusion will come as no surprise: the Negro community was subjected to brutal discrimination and somehow managed to maintain its dignity and fight back in the face of extraordinary difficulties.

The book's other value concerns its place in Du Bois' intellectual and ideological history. It may serve as a reminder of how far that great man (and his people) had to travel and of how far back they were forced to begin. Consider the patronizing tone of the 1899 introduction by Samuel McCune Lindsay: "The purpose of the inquiry is to furnish local agencies and individuals, interested in improving the condition of the Negro population in Philadelphia, a more comprehensive knowledge of the existing condition of Negroes, so that such work may be directed in the most helpful channels. . . . In the case of a race still in its infancy in social development . . . the education of each child for direct economic independence is of vital import." Du Bois' own tone was not all that much better. Thus, the well-to-do whites and blacks become the "best people." These two elements—the scholarly but nonetheless outraged report on the oppression of his people and the tendency to apply so many of the class attitudes of the white philanthropists of his day—mark the book as a valuable source for his political history and the political history of his people during the days of Booker T. Washington. Under the circumstances, the decision of the publishers to offer the book without a modern introduction, to set the author and his work in perspective, deserves censure.

The Negro in New York was prepared by various hands thirty years before seeing print, edited and re-edited by different people, and finally offered by Mrs. Hutson of the Schomburg Collection. Despite its collective authorship over a period of years, it is a smooth narrative history rather than a collection of episodes. Based on the library's magnificent holdings, it is generally a reliable introduction to its subject, and taken together with Gilbert Osofsky's fine recent book, Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto, carries us a long way toward an understanding of the black historical experience in New York. It is especially good on the slave period and tells the important story of white and black efforts against slavery. The general account of race relations, violent confrontations and black organizational efforts is well done, although it does have a rather quaint Left-liberal New Deal flavor, which breathes the hopes for racial unity and integration. If this flavor goes down hard these days, especially for many black militants, it nevertheless offers a necessary and valid ingredient for future reconciliation. Perhaps the most disappointing feature of the book is its failure to present the cultural side of black New York in anything like adequate dimensions. It is better than any of the other books under review in this matter, but there is so much to be done that the story remains as yet so scattered and fragmentary, if not buried. As a bonus, James Baldwin offers a splendid introduction, which among other things puts its finger on the class dimension of Negro oppression. For the rest, The Negro in New York offers more grim data, to supplement Osofsky's and those to be discussed in the other books under review, of a shameful history of gangsterism against a courageous and beleaguered people.

The studies by Mrs. Green and Spear, both professional historians, provide an opportunity to review the Negroes' travail in Washington and Chicago. Mrs. Green writes from a liberal's perspective, and in so doing supplies abundant evidence that this perspective has by no means lost all its integrity and vitality, whatever criticisms need to be made of it. Spear, on the other hand, supplies a perspective that, by implication at least, represents a more radical critique. Taken together, they form an important contribution to the history of the rise and consolidation of that which Mrs. Green calls "a secret city," and Spear "a city within a city." The major weakness of each book is the lack of attention to the culture of the ghetto, although there are some hints in Black Chicago. Until this cultural dimension is provided our knowledge of the inner history of the ghettos will remain dangerously partial.

Both books display parallel accomplishments and tell similar stories, although without wishing to underrate Mrs. Green's performance, Black Chicago stands out as one of the best such books yet written. Both provide needed specifics on the extent of economic and social discrimination and trace the course of residential segregation. As Spear says (and proves): "The development of the physical ghetto in Chicago, then, was not

THE PHILADELPHIA NEGRO:
A Social Study. By W. E. B. Du Bois. Benjamin Blom. 520 pp. $12.50.

THE NEGRO IN NEW YORK:
An Informal Social History. Edited by Roi Otley and William J. Weatherly. Foreword by Jean Blackwell Hutson. Preface by James Baldwin. The New York Public Library and Oceana Publishers. 328 pp. $6.

THE SECRET CITY: A History of Race Relations in the Nation's Capital. By Constance McLaughlin Green. Princeton University Press. 389 pp. $8.50.

BLACK CHICAGO: The Making of a Negro Ghetto, 1890-1920. By Allan H. Spear. Chicago University Press. 254 pp. $7.50.

THE BLACK WORKER. By Sterling D. Spero and Abram L. Harris. Atheneum Publishers. 509 pp. Paper $3.75.

THE KU KLUX KLAN IN THE CITY, 1915-1930. By Kenneth T. Jackson. Oxford University Press. 326 pp. $7.50.

FROM THE ASHES: Voices of Watts. Edited by Budd Schulberg. New American Library. 278 pp. $5.95.

REBELLION IN NEWARK: Official Violence and Ghetto Response. By Tom Hayden. Random House. 102 pp. $3.95.

the result chiefly of poverty; nor did Negroes cluster out of choice. The ghetto was primarily the product of white hostility." Spear is particularly good in documenting the role of the solid white bourgeoisie in preventing middle-class Negroes from escaping the ghetto. He indicts white property owners not only for discrimination but for planned violence. Both books describe similar kinds of race riots, with whites invariably the aggressors, Negroes the victims, and the police and judicial apparatus deeply compromised. Among the strongest features of Mrs. Green's book is a sympathetic but critical account of the dilemma of the black bourgeoisie, which serves to take some of the sting out of Franklin Frazier's well-known denunciation. In general, she is too sanguine about the future. Her preface indicates that she is aware of ominous developments since she finished her manuscript, but her liberal assumptions repeatedly lead her to underestimate the force of many of the confrontations she describes.

A few special features of Spear's book deserve comment. His account of the permanent tension in Negro response between separatism and integration might be sharper, but he skillfully shows how most of the separatist effort aimed at creating a base for the fight for integration, and how the currently underestimated influence of Booker T. Washington passed into black separatism, although Northern black leaders generally sloughed off the accommodationist side of his thinking. Spear is also excellent in his account of how the Negroes rallied to a corrupt machine mayor in return for a few jobs and respectful attention, and of how the reformers of that day managed to combine their fight against corruption with a good dose of Negrophobia. Since the Negro masses gained little from their leaders' marriage of convenience, the result had elements of tragedy, but it should serve as a warning. Finally, Spear brilliantly demolishes the liberal thesis that the Negroes constitute merely the latest of our immigrant groups in the cities and that the solution to their problems will follow established patterns. He demonstrates, empirically and logically, that the black presence has been unique and that radical surgery, not traditional reformism, will be needed to avert a catastrophe. He notes how little essential change has taken place in the position of the blacks in Chicago since 1920—a point also made by Osofsky for New York.

The reprinting of The Black Worker is especially timely since virtually none of the recent works devote enough attention to the life of the black working class. Writing in 1930, Spero and Harris display understandable pes-

MY HUSBAND'S FATHER

During the depression, after having had to fire all the men in his company, he came home and committed suicide in the cellar.

Found alongside the body was a pillow. My husband, a small child at the time, remembers seeing it there:

He always believed that it had been used to somehow muffle the sound of the shot.

JOSEPHINE SAUNDERS

simism as they recount the ghastly story of job discrimination, union hostility and living conditions. The book is by now a classic and requires no review here. As is true for the other books in this series on Negro history edited by August Meier, The Black Worker has a new introduction by an outstanding authority—in this case by Herbert Gutman, a leading labor historian, who sets the book in time and place and has a good deal to say about the general history of black labor in America.

The movement of the Negroes from the rural South to the urban South and North during and after World War I met a violent racist response. Accordingly, Jackson's commendable study of the K.K.K. in the cities nicely complements the work being done on the ghettos. The Klan during 1915-30 was largely an urban organization, feeding off working- and lower-middle-class unrest. It rose as an enormous political power, electing mayors and even higher officials, and dominating cities and occasionally states. For the most part it was less anti-Negro than anti-Catholic; not racism but anti-foreignism occupied most of its attention. The slogan was 100 per cent Americanism, and most of the ingredients of a Fascist movement were there.

The Klan had its "progressive" side, much as Hitler had his "left-wing" brown shirts. It fought for expanded educational opportunities, federal aid to education, and even Medicare. It criticized low wage levels, although of course it broke strikes. The enormous response it got from the skilled workers and petit bourgeois suggests that a more sophisticated and ably led Fascist movement has much to draw upon. Anti-Catholicism probably proved its undoing because the new immigrants had the wherewithal to defend themselves politically, and because it cut the Klan off from much potential support among Negrophobe immigrants. Its demise was probably helped along to no small extent by its incredible corruption and clownishness. It was, for example, hard to pretend to be a purifier of American life when each year brought new evidence of embezzled funds or when a leader like David C. Stephenson, the Klan boss of Indiana politics, could be convicted for rape and second-degree murder. It is doubtful that every such movement can be counted on to bungle so badly. Especially chilling is the relationship between its anti-Negroism and anti-Catholicism, which generated an uneasy political coalition that proved too strong for it. Jackson warns, at the conclusion of his able and restrained study, that the spirit of the Klan did not die with it, and events in Cicero, Milwaukee and Newark bear him out.

The crimes of white racism may be measured variously. From the Ashes reveals one result: the extent to which a people's talent has been left to die in the streets. It is an anthology of the writings of eighteen black authors from Watts, most of whom had never been published before; it came out of a writers' workshop, set up by Budd Schulberg, after the famous rising there. I shall leave an estimate of the literary achievement to someone with better credentials, but one need not be a literary critic to know that there is some fine writing here. Much of it deals with the racial crisis—I found Harry Dolan's "I Remember Papa" and Johnnie Scott's autobiographical "The Coming of the Hoodlum" especially powerful; but much of it deals with other themes—for example, Jeanne Taylor's sensitive look at mother and daughter in "The Stake-Out." As a whole, the plays, poems, stories and essays constitute an impressive tribute to the intellectual power hidden in the black ghettos.

Schulberg did an admirable job with this workshop, but I am afraid that his introduction provides ammunition for those who insist that black anthologies must be edited by black men. Its pompous, patronizing liberalism and its self-advertisement are embarrassing. Beyond that, he might have spared his readers, who will not easily forget his performance during the McCarthy era, such appalling bad taste as this: "I held to the old-fashioned notion that an author has a special obligation to his society, an obligation to understand it and to serve as its conscience."

The previous books tell much about the organized violence of white racism against the Negro community; Rebellion in Newark informs the reader about the current black response. Hayden, a young white radical community organizer formerly of SDS, has written a brilliant little book, which is the more forceful for its understatement and economy of style. It opens with a brief but staggering review of the bare conditions of life in largely black Newark. Among the matter-of-fact data offered are these: the highest percentage of bad housing in the nation; the most crime per 100,000; the heaviest per capita tax burden; the highest rates of venereal diseases, maternal mortality, and new cases of tuberculosis; and a Negro unemployment rate above the disaster level of 15 per cent. Hayden singles out the exasperation of the middle-class Negroes of Newark with the lack of progress as a major factor in the ensuing rising.

The affair began with a common incident: a Negro cab driver got a nasty taste of police brutality. This time the community, led by its youth, struck back and laid siege to the police headquarters. Before it was over troops had to occupy the city, and in the course of doing so joined the police in a war against the black community as a whole—destroying Negro businesses for no apparent reason, shooting at inoffensive Negroes, indiscriminately attacking Negro homes, and killing at least twenty-four people. Only two white men died, and Hayden provides strong grounds for doubting that they were killed by Negroes. Hayden demonstrates that nearly all the dead Negroes were employed family men; that no Negro sniper was killed; that the charges of widespread sniping and arson were grossly exaggerated in order to justify the use of troops; and that the community fought back bravely and probably forced the Governor to pull out as fast as he could. What Hayden has done is describe not merely a riot or violent response to aggression but a people in the process of learning how to defend itself, and even to prepare for a major victory over a seemingly impregnable state apparatus. The book will have to be read by everyone concerned, including those who command that apparatus.

Rebellion in Newark has its flaws, some of which are more disturbing than others. The last chapter, which calls for greater ghetto autonomy and for various reforms, does not deserve much discussion and is blandly liberal. It sounds strange coming from a radical community organizer, but then we are never told who or what he was trying to organize or what happened to the effort. The omissions and the disingenuousness do not destroy the value of this fine piece of reporting, but they will, I fear, reduce its effectiveness among those who need it most. What, after all, can we say when Hayden writes in one place: "The Hayes Projects are a useful terrain for people making war. The police station is well lit, but the projects are dark, especially the rooftops 100 yards above the street. Each room in the projects can be darkened to allow people to observe or attack from the windows"; and then complains about indiscriminate police firing into the projects. His main point nonetheless obtains: The troops were brought in, not to suppress snipers and arsonists but to retaliate against a justifiable uprising against police brutality, and they behaved as atrociously as ever. The specifics are here. Let one stand for the others: A 19-year-old boy surrendered and was killed with the explanation that he had pulled a knife. Perhaps. But his body and head had forty-five bullet holes. The ultimate significance of the story Hayden tells so well is this: Newark does not stand out because whites tried to slaughter and degrade blacks—that is an old tale—but because, like Watts, Harlem and elsewhere, it serves notice that white America must make a new departure or face civil war.

The Root of Resistance

PATTERNS OF VIETNAMESE RESPONSE TO FOREIGN INTERVENTION: 1858-1900. By Truong Buu Lam. Monograph Series No. 11. Yale University.

THE MILITARY HALF. By Jonathan Schell. Alfred A. Knopf. 212 pp. $4.95. Paper $1.65.

JONATHAN MIRSKY

Mr. Mirsky teaches Chinese at Dartmouth.

Americans opposed to the war in Vietnam find themselves prey to a pair of conflicting emotions, one providing hope, the other leading to despair.

Our hope is that since the Vietnamese freed themselves from the Chinese (more than once), the Mongols, the Japanese and the French, ultimately they will persuade the Americans to leave. We are sustained in this belief by the tenacity which sends NLF suicide squads into our Saigon embassy, and by the irony of the North Vietnamese negotiators in Paris who guarantee "restraint" by not bombing the United States.

But we lurch back into sick despair when we see the refugees, the dead, the wounded, the orphaned, the destroyed, the gassed, the napalmed, the bombed—all the results of a technological genius turned insane. It may be that the Vietnamese will not survive physically, that by the time we get fed up with them, they may be dead.

Truong Buu Lam's book is one of the first by a scholarly Vietnamese available in English. Dr. Lam, a historian trained in the West, now residing at Cornell (home of so much that is valuable in Southeast Asian studies), has put together a fascinating collection of poems, songs, letters, appeals and edicts of the first great period of Vietnamese struggle against the French, 1858-1900. Although the French were not driven out, the later patterns of resistance took form in that half century. "The spontaneous reaction against foreigners and the armed struggle to oust them had grown into a demand for revolutionary—political and later social—changes."

Dr. Lam's introductory essay is a brief masterpiece of information and historical synthesis. (We are reminded that: "The first act of armed intervention by a Western power in Vietnam is generally held to have been perpetrated in 1845 by a ship of the United States Navy. . . ." The occasion was prophetic. American sailors went ashore in Danang to demand the release of a French bishop.) Themes of major importance to our current understanding are traced by Dr. Lam to events of more than 100 years ago.

First, the Vietnamese believed very early that they were dealing with an unusual type of enemy. Prof. Paul Mus of Yale University has pointed out that today, in dealing with the Americans, Vietnamese often feel not so much that we have deliberately settled onto their country but that we are simply where we should not be, that we are in error and must be persuaded to leave. Accordingly, in an elegy of 1861, composed for those who died fighting, we find: "For a bowl of rice and a cut of cloth—what is the matter with the enemies' ancestors that they come and dispute them with us?"

Second, the Vietnamese recognized that the invaders were going to distort the ancient ways. "Into this united and sumptuous kingdom, could you admit any foreigner to slay the snakes and hunt the deer? Under the brilliant light of the sun and moon, how could you tolerate those who sold dog's meat for lamb?"

This distortion of life, those in the resistance understood, would not prevent some of their number from collaboration. "What was the meaning of life when you were impressed into the enemy militia and when you had to share their wine and nibble their bread?"

Dr. Lam firmly believes that the principle of Vietnamese nationalism—the underpinning of the struggle today—can be discerned in the last decades of the 19th century. The documentary evidence sustains him, even though the

Join the most sensible book club ever established!

Save up to 70% on every book in print! No limits on what or when you buy! No commitments to take any number of volumes!

WHAT A VALUE! Now you can buy any book on the market...at practically wholesale prices...without involving yourself in a single commitment!

(Why Didn't Somebody Think of This Before?)

IT'S ALMOST UNBELIEVABLE! Here's the ultimate in book clubs. Where the whole system works for you. And no one tells you that you MUST do this or CAN'T do that. There are absolutely no restrictions, no "quotas," no monthly postcards to return, no obligations whatsoever!

UNLIMITED SELECTION. You can order any book printed by any U.S. publisher (hard-cover and paperback). Fiction...non-fiction...religious works...technical and scientific books...text-books...art portfolios...anything between two covers that captures your interest!

Choose from any publisher: Random House, Simon & Schuster, Harper & Row, Doubleday, McGraw-Hill, Harvard University Press...even Abrams or Sierra Club. And that's just a smattering!

Remember: you select any title. But IGNORE THE REGULAR LIST PRICES—because you'll never again have to pay anything close to them!

LIFETIME MEMBERSHIP. When you join the American Book Club it's for keeps. Your membership will never expire—will never have to be renewed. And you don't have to make a single purchase!

Think what this means. For the rest of your life, you can order all the books you want. No yearly purchase quotas. But we're as close as your mail box when you want us.

REAL PUBLISHERS' EDITIONS. Perhaps you've wondered: "There must be a catch here. They must be putting out cheaper editions, like some other clubs." Not so! Every book you buy through us is guaranteed to be the original publisher's edition. We don't give you cheaper paper or smaller type or bindings that stain your hands. You receive the genuine article—the original publisher's edition, just as if you had picked it off a bookstore counter! (Yet you save at least 20%—and many, many times as much as 70%! And—no matter where you live—you never have to pay us a sales tax!)

FREEDOM FROM PRESSURE. Honestly, we don't care how many volumes you buy. Or how few. You can order a carload lot of Babyhip to give out to young friends. Or purchase nothing.

We'll never bug you with "reminders-that-you-didn't-buy-enough-this-year." We'll never send you cards to fill out and return. And we'll never mail you books other than those you specifically requested.

FREE NEWSLETTER. As a member, you'll receive a fascinating Monthly Newsletter on the world of books. Its lively, readable format includes information on what's new in literature...reviews...comments and capsule summaries of publisher's releases...lists of special-saving offers beyond the normal discount.

FREE CATALOG. As a member, you receive, FREE-of-charge, our special, deluxe American Book Club Catalog. This Catalog lists 20,000 current titles of over 100 American publishers—including just about every "popular" and "noteworthy" book you can think of. And you can buy any of these 20,000 at a MINIMUM of 30% discount!

What if our Catalog doesn't mention an unusual book you want? Order it anyway. You'll still get it, and your discount will be at least 20%—perhaps much higher!

MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE. We'll take our chances that you'll feel delighted with every book you buy through the American Book Club. And if you aren't—whatever your reason—just mail it back for a full refund! (What other club would dare make a promise like that?) Your order will be processed the very same day we receive it, to make sure you'll enjoy the books you want as soon as possible!

THESE REMARKABLE BENEFITS of membership are yours for the one-time, lifetime fee of only $5—equal to your savings on the first 2 or 3 discount-priced books you order! Act today. Join the ultimate in book clubs for your enjoyment for years and years to come!

FREE!

As a member, you'll receive the American Book Club's Catalog of more than 20,000 high-discount titles!

American Book Club

Wilmington, Del. 19899

Yes! Though I'm still blinking in amazement, I want to become a member of the AMERICAN BOOK CLUB and receive the lifetime privilege of ordering any and all books in print for discounts of 20% to 70%. I enclose my one-time membership fee of $5. In return, I will expect your free Catalog of 20,000 current books carrying discounts of 30% or more... plus a free subscription to your Monthly Newsletter describing all notable new books as they come off the press. I may purchase as many books as I want...without compulsion to buy any at all...and you will ship me only those volumes I specifically order. (Small handling and postage charge.) I understand there are no "quotas" whatsoever. Any books that dissatisfy me for any reason may be returned within 10 days for a 100% cash refund.

(please print)
NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____
STATE _____ ZIP _____

situation contained a paradox. The Vietnamese court either did not struggle manfully against the French or virtually lay down before the invaders. Nonetheless the Emperor was the symbol of the nation to whom the resistance rallied. The "call of loyalty, to King and land" echoes through these literary remains; as their actual rulers proved faithless, the focus of the partisans broadened to include ideal monarchs who would not willingly suffer the insult of foreign occupation. Therefore, although the Hue court called for the struggle against the French to cease, the elegy addressed to fallen partisans is reassuring: "You have spared no efforts to help your country. Although you disobeyed the royal orders you shall not be considered a disloyal subject."

Perhaps even President Thieu knows these lines:

"The Emperor does not recognize us, but it is indeed our duty to carry on our struggle for the safeguarding of our fatherland. The Emperor calls us rebels but in the depth of his heart he cannot help but praise our loyalty."

COUNTER-REVOLUTION WITHIN COUNTER-REVOLUTION

Read an extremely important analysis by the Albanian Party of Labor on "What's happening in Eastern Europe from Czechoslovakia to Yugoslavia" in the new Summer issue of WORLD REVOLUTION, a Quarterly of World Marxist-Leninist Thought and Struggle published by the:

PROGRESSIVE LABOR PARTY
P.O. Box 208, Church St. Sta.
New York City 10008

50c a copy, $2.00—1 year sub.

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE
by Meyer A. Zelig (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) $2.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

8-5-68

And who was doing the fighting? Dr. Lam explicitly rejects the notion of an apathetic peasantry so vital to the American pacification. He points out that while "normally indifferent to ideology" the ordinary Vietnamese felt personally the need to resist. Again, the elegy of 1861 tells us a good deal:

"You were not professional soldiers... experienced in military life and training. You were but inhabitants of villages and hamlets turned partisans to serve the case of righteousness... on your back, a shirt of cotton... in your hands a pointed stick... for your sword, you used your kitchen knife... you were not frightened by the French who shot large and small bullets at you."

In the end, Dr. Lam asserts, the French succeeded because of "the failure of the Vietnamese court to pursue a systematic and determined resistance." The court assumed the French did not intend total territorial domination. By the time they understood it was too late. But the roots of popular resentment had thickened, and succeeding generations of Vietnamese seemed always to hope for national independence.

This hope inspires us all. The exploits and endurance of the Vietnamese seem superhuman. But can they survive? One's fears are sharpened to the point of agony by Jonathan Schell, first in his The Village of Ben Suc (reviewed in The Nation, January 8), and now in The Military Half (both were published first in The New Yorker). I know no book which has made me angrier and more ashamed. If upon finishing it one still says only "war is hell" one's soul may be in mortal danger. Putting Dr. Spock, Father Berrigan and hundreds of anonymous draft refusers in prison for protesting the crimes described by Jonathan Schell is an act of social perversion.

Schell, who is 25 and a graduate student at Harvard, spent a few weeks in 1967 flying about in small spotter planes over Quang Ngai in northern South Vietnam. Some 650,000 people used to live there. Since the 19th century the peasantry of that region had actively fought the French; Ho Chi Minh proclaimed it very early a totally liberated area. "By the early nineteen-sixties, a whole generation of young people in rural areas had known no government other than that of the Vietminh and the National Liberation Front."

From Diem on, regime after regime tried the old-fashioned and, in retrospect, humane methods of Strategic and New Life Hamlets to bring the population under control. All failed. In the middle of 1967, Operation Oregon was launched. By August, 40 per cent of the population were refugees and 70 per cent of the houses were destroyed.

Let us be clear: this destruction is deliberate—it is not an unfortunate series of mistakes. The American attitude mirrors that of the 18th-century Chinese Emperor Ch'ien-lung: "The Vietnamese are indeed not a reliable people. An occupation does not start before they raise their arms against us and expel us from their country." Such "unreliability," deeply ingrained in the Quang Ngai peasantry, is now causing their destruction.

Schell collected some Marine leaflets, showered in their millions onto the ground below; their message leaves no room for confusion:

Number 244-286-67: "The U.S. Marines will not hesitate to destroy immediately any village or hamlet harboring the Vietcong... The choice is yours."

Number 244-068-68: "Attention Vietlagers:

1. Your village was bombed because you harbored Vietcong in your village....

6. Your village will be bombed again if you harbor the Vietcong in any way....

10. The G.V.N. and Allied Forces will help you to live in peace and to have a happy and prosperous life."

American officers explained our scorched earth policy to Schell in various contexts:

1. "We had no plan of destroying the valley. But then Charlie went back in there and we had no choice about it, so we inserted two battalions... and then it got destroyed in the process of denying it to the enemy."

2. "We have completely dropped the ball on these refugees.... If I told people about this in the States, they'd say I was lying."

3. "We're here to sell the government of South Vietnam to the people in this province. The trouble is they don't want to have the government sold to them, so what we're really doing is cramming the government down their throats."

4. (In response to Schell's asking how a man spotted from the air, who became the target of an air strike, could be identified as a Vietcong): "Well, he walked real proud, with a kind of bounce in his gait, like a soldier, instead of just shuffling along, like the farmers do."

5. (After a series of air strikes): "I don't know what kind of people were down there, but they're not there now."

6. "It gets completely impersonal. After you've done it for a while you forget that there are people down there."

7. "This is an operation to catch the VC, not to clear the area. You just can't go moving everybody out all the time."

8. "Any civilians in this area are Charlies or Charlie sympathizers, so there's no sweat there."

What kind of men are performing these deeds? How do they feel? After one village was wiped out by napalm and cannon fire, the spotter congratulated the flight commander: "That was real good work. I appreciate it."

"Well, thank you," the flight commander replied, "I enjoyed it."

The pilots make up drinking songs in which they unasily ridicule themselves while banging their glasses on the table:

*Bomb the schools and churches,
Bomb the rice fields, too
Show the children in the courtyards
What napalm can do.*

Or

*Strafe the town and kill the people,
Drop napalm on the square,
Get out early every Sunday
And catch them at their morning prayer.*

When Jonathan Schell published The Village of Ben Suc some reviewers twisted madly, attempting to explain away the destruction of a village of 3,800 as an unfortunate but probably isolated incident. One suggested that some newspaper man look into the matter. In a letter to the Times I explained that I had visited not only Ben Suc but all the surrounding area, and that such wide-scale wiping out was common. [See Mirsky: "The Tombs of Ben Suc: Too Blind Stupid To See," The Nation, October 23, 1967.] At the end of The Military Half Schell describes the elimination of the coastal village of Tuyet Diem, and the transportation of its 1,600 inhabitants. By this time our outrage has been overstrained by the endless killing and burning. How are we to respond when, following the bombing of a church the spotter exults: "Oh, that's nice, baby, real nice. You're layin' those goodies right in there." The church had been flying a white flag which maddeningly continued to fly. This goaded one of the pilots: "We'll have to get that white flag. It's a matter of principle."

We are setting out to eliminate the Vietnamese because they are in our way. When I was in Vietnam in 1967 the term "hostile civilian" was widely used: areas without people in them were referred to as "sanitized." In the late nineties, Truong Buu Lam tells us, Phan

Dinh Phung, one of the leaders of the resistance (near the area where Schell's book is set) wrote:

I now have only one brother for whom to care: he is the Vietnamese people. I now have only one tomb to protect: it is the land of Vietnam.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

GAZAPO. By Gustavo Sainz. Translated from the Spanish by Hardie St. Martin. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 181 pp. $4.95.

Godard developed his techniques to break out of certain confines of film making and into a style that belongs very much to him. Sr. Sainz, who is Mexican, has borrowed the technique and locked himself into a stylized box in which his characters, a group of middle-class Mexican kids, act out some of the rituals of friendship and love which define their world and exquisitely isolate them from anyone who's not a member of it. This is done in a series of quick takes which, since they're not particularly visual, distract from the action rather than enrich it. Although Hardie St. Martin has translated the work into very relaxed, colloquial English, Gazapo is a rigid little book that is so overintent on how it is made that it is seldom engrossing for more than a few pages at a time.

THE WAY IN. By Eugene Mirabelli. The Viking Press. 217 pp. $4.95.

People who know Cambridge, Mass. might particularly enjoy this somber novel for the setting. Mr. Mirabelli has a lot of talent for eliciting a sense of place, though The Way In is really about the process of growing older. Despite the fact that the story is populated by a number of characters who are both believable and interesting, the eerie, no-contact quality which hangs over it all extends to the hero, who supposedly moves out of his own isolations and into a good life. It's hard to tell whether this is intentional—that is, whether the author is telling us that his hero is somehow fulfilled in the end in spite of his still seeming so alone, or whether he is trying to convince us that he's not alone, having acquired a wife, a child and a way of earning a living. The difference is crucial: because it is left unclear, reading the novel becomes an uneasy experience.

HOUSE MADE OF DAWN. By N. Scott Momaday. Harper & Row. 212 pp. $4.95.

The author is a Kiowa Indian who grew up on Southwest Indian reservations; his novel is about a young American Indian who gets locked out of his own culture and almost destroyed by the relative absurdity of the white man's world. It is a tragic if familiar story but, as Mr. Momaday recounts it, one of considerable power and beauty. The life of his hero's grandfather is used as a backdrop to the ongoing action of the book, and Momaday offers a double view of how it used to be to grow up Indian in America and how it is now. If he is more skillful in conveying the old way than the new, it is because his talent is better suited to describing order and beauty than chaos and despair. A particular exception to this is one very sad and funny scene in which a group of Los Angeles Indians gather for a peyote-eating ceremony.

A PERSONAL MATTER. By Kenzaburo Oe. Translated from the Japanese by John Nathan. Grove Press. 214 pp. $5.

It is easy to see why Oe is considered a revolutionary writer in Japan. There is something quite shockingly ruthless in the precise way he tells this story of Bird, an evasive and seemingly empty young Japanese whose wife has just given birth to a deformed child. Although Bird's first impulses are to have the child killed or to simply disappear himself, a relationship with an old girl friend and some flashbacks from his past help him face a crisis for the first time in his life. Everything is more Western than the West: Oe's descriptions of the hospital personnel are particularly gruesome

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

8-5-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $4

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

("Would you like to see the goods?"), and he writes about sexual intercourse as if it's an intricate surgical operation being performed slowly and under extra-bright lights for the benefit of curious medical students. Bird's girl friend drives a red MG and is "chasing a better orgasm." The novel must have been a problem to put into English, but John Nathan's translation seems exactly right.

TRUE GRIT. By Charles Portis. Simon & Schuster. 215 pp. $4.95.

Mattie Ross, the narrator of True Grit, calls it "my true account of how I avenged Frank Ross's blood over in the Choctaw Nation when the snow was on the ground." Mattie is 14 when it all happens, back in the 1880s, and her story of how she hired a U.S. marshal and joined up with a Texas Ranger to catch her daddy's killer, fell into the hands of a deadly, good-natured bandit, got snake-bitten, and lived to tell the tale back home in Yell County, Ark., fifty years later is pure, beautiful corn. Mr. Portis, who wrote Norwood, is what they used to call a natural, but there's more to it than that. True Grit is surely some kind of classic; readers of William Eastlake might appreciate it best, but only a mean person won't enjoy it. If there are people who still follow the custom, this is a fine book to read aloud.

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVIČH

Los Angeles

On top of what used to be Bunker Hill at the edge of downtown Los Angeles, set off by plazas and fountains, stand the three imposing theatres of the new Music Center. This marble-fronted efflorescence of cultural philanthropy is, of course, Southern California's answer to Lincoln Center, but somehow it appears to be more or less free of the rancors and embarrassments that hang like a cloud over New York's cultural colossus. Since no cultural center is complete nowadays without a resident professional theatre, the Music Center has one; instead of creating such a theatre entirely from scratch, however, the Center extended its hospitality to the Theatre Group of UCLA, a professional organization that had been mounting productions for several years in various halls on the UCLA campus. The Theatre Group was absorbed into a new organization, the Center Theatre Group, which presents a mixed bag of imported and domestic productions at the 2,100-seat Ahmanson Theatre, and a series of locally originated productions in the 750-seat Mark Taper Forum.

Gordon Davidson, the artistic director of the old UCLA Theatre Group, became artistic director of the Forum, and is now in the midst of his second season downtown. Mr. Davidson has found his audience—the Forum has nearly 30,000 subscribers—and he runs what seems to be one of the most stable and viable regional theatres in the country. (This means that he can fill his theatre with people willing to sit still for what he gives them, keep his deficit low enough so that his backers are willing and able to meet it, achieve a reasonable degree of success with the critics, and generate a sense that he can go on doing these things without too much difficulty. This may not sound like a tremendous achievement, but in the rickety world of regional theatre it is not a common one.)

The Forum offers selections from the usual resident theatre repertory—The Miser and Camino Real are on this year's schedule—but unlike some of his opposite numbers at other theatres, Davidson does not limit himself entirely to this repertory; in his first season at the Forum, two out of his four major productions were new American plays. Davidson is particularly interested in the "Theatre of Fact," as that form is now called, which deals, in more or less documentary fashion, with people and events of recent history. While still at UCLA he staged The Deputy by Rolf Hochhuth, and he is interested in doing The Soldiers, Hochhuth's new play about Winston Churchill. This summer, the Forum's Monday night workshop is offering a new American play called Witnesses, by William Murray, which deals, in Pirandellian fashion, with the thirty-six people in Queens who looked on and did nothing while a young woman named Kitty Genovese was stabbed to death. Meanwhile, Davidson has been presenting, as a major production, the American premiere of In the Matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer, by the German playwright Heinar Kipphardt, a dramatization of the 1954 hearings which deprived Oppenheimer of his security clearance.

Aristotle said, some time ago, that poetry is better than history because history deals with specific events while poetry deals with general truths. Of course, the best history has always aspired to be poetry in this sense; the work of Thucydides, who died before Aristotle was born, is so full of general truth that it is frighteningly pertinent to American foreign policy right now. The playwrights of the Theatre of Fact also aspire, in most cases, to "general truth"; Kipphardt himself has said that his intention was to follow Hegel's advice and lay bare "the core and significance" of a historical event by freeing it from the "adventitious contingencies and irrelevant accessories of the event," to strip away the circumstances and aspects that are of merely secondary importance, and to replace them with such that allow the essence of the matter to appear in all its clarity.

But he has done almost exactly the opposite, and his play gets irretrievably bogged down in adventitious contingencies and irrelevant accessories.

Several vital questions are highly pertinent to the matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer, but the Personnel Security Board of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, as Kipphardt shows it to us, ignores or obscures these questions; it is concerned not with the great issues raised by the case but, essentially, with the narrow question of whether or not it was going to let Dr. Oppenheimer have his clearance. Kipphardt has freely rearranged his documentary material, and even invented speeches and scenes, but he has not gone nearly far enough. "The Hearing is the framework of the play," as the program says, and the framework becomes a strait jacket. Duerrenmatt's The Physicists and, above all, Brecht's Galileo, are still the plays for our time about the role of the scientist in the atomic age.

This does not mean that the Theatre of Fact, even in its most rigorously factual form, is impossible as a dramatic genre. The Investigation, Peter Weiss's austere, scrupulously documentary dramatization of the trial of a group of concentration camp officials, proved, to my satisfaction at least, that a sensitive selection from suitable materials can produce something very closely resembling a work of art. But In the Matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer may serve to remind us, once again, that there are no short cuts to significance.

Perhaps, however, I have made the play sound worse than I actually found it. It has its lively exchanges every now and then, and even the facts themselves have a certain modest documentary interest: so this is how a security hearing is run, so this is what Oppenheimer and Teller had to say. (I was particularly pleased to discover that Oppenheimer's first initial stood for "Julius.") Except for Joseph Wiseman's overcultivated, unspontaneous, and smug performance in the title role, I found nothing to object to in Gordon Davidson's production. The Center Theatre Group does not maintain a permanent company, and the Forum productions are cast from scratch; this means that the mystical idea of a permanent ensemble is ignored, but it has certain advantages. It means, for instance, that Davidson has been free to assemble, for this play about middle-aged men, a middle-aged cast, including such well-established actors as Eduard Franz, Jeff Corey, John Randolph and Herbert Voland; their presence gives the production an agreeable sense of solidarity. It would be interesting to see what Davidson could do with a good script.

SIDNEY BERNARD

Mr. Bernard is the New York editor of Literary Times.

The success of the New York Shakespeare Festival's open-air mod Hamlet, which is touring the neighborhoods these summer nights, can probably be measured in inverse ratio to the unhappiness of purists who watch it. The latter (and there were some at the performance I caught) can be spied out by that certain grimace or swiveling of the head, as if from pain, that occurs when, say, Claudius gets a cream pie in the face; or Hamlet pops gaily into bed with Gertrude—proving that in street theatre, anyway, direct action on the Oedipus front is its own reward. There are lots more such high jinks—Ophelia strutting the boards in mini-sequins dress and jet-set tick, two spadecats jivers playing the roles of "Rosencraft" and "Gilderstone," a platoon of GI-dressed, pistol-toting guards in a royal court that's like a penitentiary, and so on. Director Joseph Papp's conceit, overall, can be said to work well, much in the way good subway graffiti do.

Hamlet is played by a lithe and bouncing Cleavon Little, a young black actor who, far from worrying over that "pale cast of thought" that so hobbles the Dane, has at his role with an athletic celerity, an open-voiced bravado, that jolts the audience to the funny bone. From his first entrance—in boxing shorts and sneakers—Little is a walking, jumping and skipping farrago of passion eased by Olson-Johnson tomfoolery, poetry bearded by street-corner minstrelsy and high philosophy reined in by blasts of horse sense. When Hamlet-Little is asked what he reads, he looks out owlishly through horn rims with no glass, and replies after a delicious pause: "Ebony, baby." That moment is the witching moment, not of Hamlet's ominous ghost but of revved-up parody under an open sky, with a neighborhood crowd you can play on for all the comic stops.

The production is boiled down to about an hour and a half, with no intermission. I saw it in Washington Square Park, where it was snugly mounted between the austere arch and the waterless fountain. Bongo regulars, hippie boy and/or girl watchers, Village and New York University lit'ry folk, political polsters and activists, mothers with kids, kids with mothers—all seemed to be responding to some piece of the action. Rock music (by Galt MacDermot) for the bongo boys; lots of jive "business" for the hippie; crisply delivered monologues for the lit'ry; bits of Black Power references for the activist; Pop wardrobe for the mothers; and balloons and toy pistols for the kids.

Sets, stage, lighting and sound open out from, or are fed by, four flatbed trucks. These pack up and move to new locations, directly after each performance. About 800 folding chairs are made available. (They were filled and there were about 1,000 standees. All free, of course.) Joseph Papp hopes to raise enough money to take the Hamlet to Philadelphia, Newark, Washington and Baltimore, on the completion of its New York run. It's a bubbling natural for that long-hot-summer's night.

TELEVISION

MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

Mrs. Christopher is radio and television editor of Advertising Age.

Headlines in some newspapers recently indicated that the Federal Communications Commission—a regulatory body with little taste for regulating—had set forth a surprisingly strong policy on discrimination against Negroes in radio and television employment.

The commission had "warned" stations that they might lose their licenses if they showed bias in their hiring policies, and would regard charges of discrimination as grounds for looking into a station's community service record. They also warned that a licensee's refusal to hire Negroes would "immediately raise the question of whether he is consulting in good faith with Negro community leaders concerning programing to serve the area's needs."

What was generally overlooked was the ironic twist that this ruling came one week after the commission had given a three-year renewal to WLBT in Jackson, Miss., despite charges by local Negro leaders that the station was not acting in good faith to serve the needs of the black population.

The FCC, which has attended enough National Association of Broadcasters' conventions to realize fully how nonintegrated the radio-television business is, knows that its Jackson licensing decision, strongly protested by two of its most dedicated members, will carry more force with station owners than any words in a policy statement on hiring procedures.

Also lost in the fine print was the fact that the anti-bias action was further weakened by its limited applicability and its failure to come into play until someone goes to the trouble and expense of filing a complaint—a step well beyond the means and energy of the average taxpayer. What the FCC said in effect was that the employment provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act—banning discrimination for reasons of color, religion or sex by employers of 25 or more persons—applies to broadcasters. Did anybody doubt it? Certainly not the lawyers, who conducted lengthy hearings in New York some months ago on behalf of the

CALIFORNIA REVOLUTION

Today the California Revolution is entering a new phase. The population is growing, but with a difference. . . . The former self-consciousness is still evident but a spirit of self-criticism is emerging. The rapid extension of certain trends has begun to meet with resistance, and counter trends have been set in motion. It is not surprising that the first all-auto state . . . should also be the state which should stage the first successful freeway revolt. . . . Nor is it surprising, given some knowledge of the state's peculiar dynamics, that senseless inroads on the environment should have converted the old-style hiking, fishing, and mountain-climbing Sierra Club into a militant conservation organization—one of the toughest in the country. . . . The state that has had so much to do with the development of the initiative, referendum and recall has now begun to have second thoughts about these measures, once regarded as the indispensable tools of progressive government. . . . The cults still thrive, but they are more sophisticated. The quest for the amenities is more evident than ever, but critics have begun to raise embarrassing questions. . . . At the moment, political reaction has triumphed in California but, predictably, the pendulum will soon swing in the other direction.

From the introduction to The California Revolution by Carey McWilliams (Grossman). The Nation's editor has collected and edited an exciting variety of articles dealing with the California scene, written by an acute group of critics and observers. A number of these essays originally appeared in The Nation.

Federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the New York City Human Rights Commission. That federal law, while reaching about 80 per cent of the country's 650 TV stations, would cover only 10 per cent of its 6,500 radio outlets. Broadcaster witnesses at those New York hearings said that they did not have more nonwhites on their payrolls because "we can't find them." Leaving the initiative to the aggrieved was not what the EEO commission had in mind. This agency wanted the FCC's announcement on minority employment to include a provision specifying a "periodic proof of compliance" check of stations by the FCC.

Still pending is an FCC rule-making procedure extending the warning against discrimination to those stations not covered by the federal law. If the rule is made final, they, like the rest of the broadcasters, will be required to post a notice attesting to their open employment stance.

To compound the irony of the FCC announcement, the ruling—as well as the WLBT renewal—both followed complaints by the United Church of Christ. This group four years ago joined Dr. Aaron Henry and other Jackson civil rights leaders in protesting WLBT's "unbalanced" treatment of racial issues and lack of contact with the black population. 45 per cent of the station's potential audience. The complainants asked that the license be taken away from Lamar Life Insurance Co. because of the station's long-time record of "unbalanced promotion of segregationist views" and its failure to serve all the community. Some of their charges against WLBT were that the station had introduced network news with announcements such as: "What you are about to see is an example of biased, managed, Northern news"; that it had editorialized against the court-ordered admission of the first Negro to the University of Mississippi without allowing time for an opposition view; that there was not only a lack of Negroes on the station's staff but also not a "single local program on which Negroes could regularly participate." The original bill of particulars alleged that the general manager of the station was a member of the White Citizens' Council, who maintained a policy of denying "courtesy titles" of Mr., Miss and Mrs. to Negroes—although such "titles" were generally used for whites.

The FCC reacted to this lengthy complaint by granting WLBT a one-year license renewal without even a hearing to allow the local people to have their say. The United Church of Christ took its fight to court. In March, 1966, the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington revoked the temporary license and ordered the commission to conduct a hearing on the matter. The hearings examiner and later the full commission, by a 5-to-2 vote, held that while the station's record was not one worthy of "emulation," the "intervenor failed to prove" many of the incidents cited. The three-year license renewal was granted on June 28 without strings.

The FCC's observations were particularly striking since the commission, when issuing a temporary license in 1965, had ordered WLBT to stop racial discrimination in its programming. The emphasis in the June order seemed to be not so much on what the station had done to remedy the situation—though the majority of the commission said there was some improvement—as on the point that the protesters hadn't "proved" many of their charges.

The United Church of Christ had hoped to use the case as a wedge to open more opportunities for Negroes on radio and TV in the South; but it is finding the action expensive, since the decision will be taken to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeal. "If the black population is to receive fair treatment from the TV industry, and if the public is not to be defeated in its right to correct harmful television practices, we must pursue our appeal," a spokesman for the church group said.

In their battle the Jackson Negroes will have the help of two of the FCC's most forceful commissioners, Kenneth A. Cox and Nicholas Johnson. Their 76-page dissent on the WLBT renewal accused their fellow commissioners of manipulating procedures in favor of the station and ignoring the facts to protect the Lamar Life Insurance Co., its licensee. They also charged that the majority had flouted the court decision by glossing over the record and giving undue weight to the "probable future performance" of the station owner.

Commissioners Cox and Johnson considered it unfair to put the burden of proof on the Jackson Negroes and their friends. They expressed displeasure with a commission that "picks this moment to find 'the public interest' served by the renewal of a license for a station which had not only made no effort to include and serve Negroes but which has for a decade maintained blatantly racist programming policies." And they suggested that "The only way in which members of the public can prevent renewal of an unworthy station's license is to steal the document from the wall of the station's history in the dead of night."

PUBLICATIONS

THE NEW NAZIS is a shocking informative report on the activities of neo-Nazis throughout the world. Each country and its Nazi groups are studied individually. Many Nazi front groups are identified, and Nazi penetration into non-Nazi groups is exposed. The appendix gives addresses of anti-Nazi and neo-Nazi groups around the globe. Send $1.00 or write for free list.

VIKAR PUBLISHING CO.

Dept. N, Box 2241, Springfield, Mass. 01101

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-N, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SUMAC"
A tri-quarterly, will appear in September, publishing poetry, fiction, criticism. The first issue includes work by Robert Duncan, Louis Simpson, Kenneth Koch, John Thompson, Denise Levertov and others. Edited by Dan Gerber Jr. and Jim Harrison. $3.50—one year.

Ms. and Subscriptions.
Box 29, Fremont, Mich. 49412.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woof. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Enfranchising. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 262 7th Ave., N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woof calls on every Communist to inwardly renounce Atheism, and to pray secretly, if necessary, for world wide human rights and governments of the people, for the people, and by the people — and for a better after death life than Atheism can promise. Reader, send this to a Communist.

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of Significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

"SELECTED POEMS" OF GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from The author at: 145 West 11 Street, New York City 10011.

FREE PAPERBACK LISTS. Write, inquire how thousands save! PAPERBACKS, HARDBOUNDS, RECORDS. Fast service. New York Book, 48 West 43rd Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.

Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harrisburg Maine 04041

Crossword Puzzle No. 1258

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Abdominal pain? Take an oil emulsion in a small amount of it. (5)
- 4 Both soldiers and civilians might be called upon to charge them. (9)
- 9 Are medals appropriate for Hugo's gipsy? (9)
- 10 Responsible for a literary quotation, old style? (5)
- 11 Bother! (9)
- 12 Order of columns. (5)
- 13 Release the old editor's family in Africa? They might be jumpy! (9)
- 17 Subject of Bentley's "clerihew" in which "the Third ought never to have occurred." (4, 6)
- 20 Such as 23, 24 and 9. (5)
- 22 Brook was shot, evidently, for the possible protection of those inside. (4, 5)
- 23 Rather common masculine counterpart of 24. (5)
- 24 Birds have a point in one of those feminine 21. (9)
- 25 Appropriates money, but not regularly. For the Roman, was it a day or just an hour? (5)

DOWN:

- 1 Belief in a direct order? (6)
- 2 Stony ones cannot hold love out, according to Shakespeare. (6)

- 3 It might make the point more deadly. (6-5, 4)
- 4 Protection against so-called lead poisoning. (6-5, 4)
- 5 Migratory birds? They might help if you're looking for a lift! (9, 6)
- 6 Ranges in composition and form might show them in April. (8)
- 7 18, for example. (8)
- 8 Chinese custom of sneering, by the sound of it. (8)
- 14 Beauty is reputedly the sort to ooze about! (4-4)
- 15 "Thirty days hath September" is such a device. (8)
- 16 China is often cracked. (8)
- 18 Not a team aspiring to be an original-thinking type. (6)
- 19 Man is, I imagine, not quite! (6)
- 20 What my lady does in "The Spanish Student." (6)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1257

ACROSS: 9 Trousers; 10 Reason; 11 Ballroom; 14 Ossian; 15 Absolute; 17 Freehand; 20 Casaba; 22 and 1 Balfour Declaration; 24 Blister; 26 Tenuto; 27 Air brake; 28 Thistle-down. DOWN: 2 Eau Claire; 3 Lie down; 4, 20 down and 12 Rose-colored glasses; 5 Turtles; 6 Ovals; 7 Treats; 8 Moment; 13 Handy; 16 Last straw; 18 Reader; 19 Aqueous; 21 Breaks; 23 Flush; 25 Fall.

ART

UNIQUE, original, 9X14 water colors by outstanding African Artist. Unconditional money back guarantee. $3.50 each. Beikongo Galleries, 1441 Broadway, New York City 10010.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

EMPLOYMENT

OVERSEAS POSITIONS offer high salaries, free travel. Comprehensive new "Guide to Employment Abroad" covers all possibilities in sixty countries, all occupations. Includes exclusive "Directory of American Companies Overseas." Only $2.00 postpaid. Satisfaction guaranteed or payment refunded. Hill International Publications, P.O. Box 79-H, East Islip, New York 11730.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin, 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

I WANT TO MEET RUSSIANS FACE-TO-FACE ON AUG. 23* THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

as a step toward
preventing nuclear war
3 Week Study-Exchanges
Leave NYC: Aug. 23 or Christmas
or MEET CEC in Moscow

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N-8/5, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036
WRITE-WIRE-CALL (212) LT 1-8113

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: Estate Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors. Indigenous designs, free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let Team Make You a Team" For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

EPISCOPALIANS — Join a radical-Christian peacemaking organization. For details write: EPISCOPAL PEACE FELLOWSHIP, Box 101, 229 E. 59th Street, New York, N.Y. 10022.

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/85, 125/10 and 1,000/775. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109. (405) 775-3140.

ABSTRACT QUILT. Custom designed by an artist. State desired colors. Allow 3-4 weeks. Twin $80. Full $100. Queen $115. King $125. Naomi Berton, Box 191N, Storrs, Conn. 06268.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled Pro editor-writer aids authors in revising Mss. for publication. Box 612, c/o The Nation.

SOCIALIST. COMMUNIST, other old presidential campaign buttons, etc. wanted for exhibit. Box 614, c/o The Nation.

"If we accept truth as an individual criterion, then we have also to make it the cement to hold society together."

—says J. Bronowski in

SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES

First in America to publish these essays, The Nation now offers SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES in book form as a bonus to all new subscribers.

"If I were trying to select six works, in order to explain to an intelligent non-scientist something of the deepest meaning of science, Bronowski's would be one of them."—C. P. Snow

Contributors like Bronowski help us pierce the fog of untruth in the national life.

Join us.

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me, free, J. Bronowski's SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 8-5

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

THE NATION

AUGUST 19, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
AUG 19 1968
LIBRARY

Comfortable with Nixon

KARL PURNELL

LOBSTER LAND: A TRAVELER IN CHINA

ALBERTO MORAVIA

Party Vetoes the People

Pennsylvania for Humphrey

JAMES HIGGINS

Brecht in Poland

ANDRZEJ WIRTH

Footnotes to Sherlock Holmes

THEODORE ROSZAK

2-69N PL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

dismal prospect

New York City

DEAR SIR: The other day at a family supper my little grandson, just turned 10, expressed great nervousness about the Vietnamese War. He said he knew he was going to be drafted and killed in that war. We tried to reassure him by saying that the Vietnamese conflict would surely be over long before he became of draft age.

I was appalled to realize that children as young as my grandson are fearful over the Johnson Administration's madcap military adventure in Vietnam. There must be millions of boys throughout the United States who are terribly worried about this interminable war.

Here, then, is another powerful reason for President Johnson to bring an end quickly to the agony that afflicts America as well as Vietnam.

Corliss Lamont

so sorry

Pittsburgh, Pa.

DEAR SIR: This correspondence is in reference to an article, "Battle of Chicago: A Study in Law and Order" by Joseph L. Sander [The Nation, May 20].

We appreciate your mention of our products, but we wish to advise that "CHEMICAL MACE®" and "MACE" are the Trademarks of General Ordnance Equipment Corporation for its non-lethal weapons and liquid contained therein. "CHEMICAL MACE®" is covered by Registration Number 823,563 issued on February 2, 1967.

You are undoubtedly aware that if our Trademarks, "CHEMICAL MACE®" and "MACE" come into wide use as generic terms we might lose our Trademark rights to them, and we are sure you will want to assist us in preventing this.

In order to protect our rights, we would respectfully ask that whenever the terms "CHEMICAL MACE®" or "MACE" are issued in any publication to describe our non-lethal weapons or the liquid projected by them, it should be placed in quotation marks, fully capitalized and accompanied by the symbol ® which indicates that it is a Registered Trademark.

Also, if you wish to refer to this type of device by a generic name probably the best term would be "non-lethal weapon."

May we extend our thanks for your cooperation in this matter.

John A. Campbell, President
General Ordnance Equipment Corporation

A member of the Smith & Wesson Law Enforcement Group

Trudeaumania

Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR SIR: Marc de Villiers [editorial, The Nation, July 22], appears to be suffering from the ailment that has plagued so many of my countrymen in recent months. It is called Trudeaumania, and its essence lies in the illusion, carefully nurtured by Mr. Trudeau himself, that his "swinging" style of campaigning heralds some wonderful new tidings for Canada's future.

He might recall, however, that the introduction of a new razzmatazz style of campaigning on the part of European Socialist parties, particularly in Britain and Germany, has coincided with the rise of distinctly conservative trends within them. The party leader, in other words, who has nothing very exciting to offer, not even himself, must offer instead a carefully created image of himself. This, I suggest, is what Trudeau has done, and the Canadian people fell for it, lock, stock and barrel.

Henry David Rempel

EDITORIALS

The Republican Gamble

In nominating Richard Nixon, the Republicans have made a calculated gamble. The delegates believed, correctly, that Nixon could unify the party more effectively than could Reagan or Rockefeller. They are well aware that the Republican Party is today a minority party and that Nixon is not the strongest nominee they could name in terms of winning Democratic and independent votes. But they assume—and this is the gamble—that disaffection with the Johnson-Humphrey Administration is so massive that they can win even with the old loser.

Some weeks back, Don M. Muchmore, one of the ablest of the pollsters, told Nation readers (July 22) that the outstanding feature of this year's election is to be found in "the presence of a radical epidemic negativism, virulent and extensive." The big party today is the Opposition Party. The "opposition" vote—that is, the combined vote of all those who for whatever reason want to see the Johnson-Humphrey Administration ousted—is clearly a larger constituency than either party can attract, assuming that Humphrey and Nixon are the nominees. As the Republicans see it, all that Nixon need do is shellac the Humphrey-Johnson Administration (and no one that can give him lessons on how to mount that attack) and be vague about his own programs and policies.

This is not a bad gamble. The Vice President cuts a slightly more ludicrous figure with each passing week. He had become "poor Hubert" even before the President withdrew; now he appears in an even more absurd posture because he simply cannot extricate himself from LBJ's cruel embrace. Nor can he hold together the disintegrating coalition on which the Democrats have relied in the past. And at the state and local levels the Democratic Party shows signs of great weakness, notably in such key states as California, Michigan and New York.

Furthermore, the Republicans have a neat hedge on their gamble. Should the election be thrown into the House, they hope to gain enough additional Republican seats so that they could win the Presidency, even though Nixon failed to garner the necessary votes in the Electoral College. This, too, is not a bad gamble. The Republicans picked up forty-seven seats the last time around and, given the tide of opposition, they might easily win thirty-one more in this election. Even before Miami, they had begun to pour money into the "promising" districts, particularly those in which the election of a Republican would tip the state's delegation in favor of the GOP. The Wallace movement will hurt the Republicans nationally, but Wallace followers are more likely to vote for Republican than for Democratic Congressional nominees.

Of course the Republican gamble rests on the assumption that the Democrats will nominate Humphrey. Senator McCarthy's nomination would upset the entire strategy. McCarthy is free of the Johnson tag; his strengths as a candidate are precisely those needed to accentuate Nixon's weaknesses. McCarthy has put together the elements of a new coalition. He arouses the kind of rank-and-file, or "amateur," enthusiasm that the Democrats must have to win. He is popular with independents. He runs strongly in suburban communities. He appeals to liberal-moderate Republicans. He makes a strong appeal to youth, to the new middle class, and to women. And he has been gaining strength with the minorities.

Nixon's triumph, as the entire press is saying in unison, constitutes a remarkable personal achievement. He is a shrewd political tactician and he planned this campaign, every phase of it, with care and precision. This time he was not disturbed by conflicting advice from "experts"; he was his own expert and he made no mistakes. It would be hazardous to assume that Nixon has "grown" or "changed." He is intelligent; he is enormously hard-working; ethically insensitive, he is not corrupt. He has thought about his problems—including even his "cosmetic" problems (deep tan is the answer to dark beard shadow)—and has sought to solve them. But for his big problem there is no remedy: he is the complete and total opportunist. As someone once said, he never abandons his principles because he hasn't any. In reviewing the Mazo-Hess book about Nixon, Milton Viorst wrote: "What emerges is not a man with feelings and beliefs but an actor upon the stage of history, for whom someone else might well have written most of the lines."

Not that he is incapable of writing the lines; he has written some of his own best lines. But even when he writes them they do not seem to be his, and in one sense they are not, because he instinctively regards "ideas" and "values" as fictions or guises which can be shifted, changed, shelved, donned, discarded, or distorted as circumstances may require.

The only consistent theme in Nixon's public life has been his "anti-communism." His first, quick reaction to any difficult situation, even now, is to counterattack by redbaiting. He is, as James Reston has written, "a man of the cold war and the 'Communist conspiracy.'" In this respect he has been consistent; in this respect he has not changed and will not change. Politicians who acknowledge past mistakes or who change their views in response to changed circumstances are to be commended; consistency in itself is no great thing. But one cannot take Nixon's new "peace" line seriously because one knows that with him any change in position is purely tactical. Not only would he turn hawkish in a second, if he thought it expedient, but one has an uneasy feeling that, on balance, he would rather be hawkish than dovish.

In this campaign he has been on good behavior, but even so there have been occasions when he resisted the old quick redbaiting riposte only by a measure of self-control that required, visibly, the most strenuous effort. For all his surface coolness, he is a man with an inordinate lust for power; what else could have prompted him to attempt a comeback after the humiliating defeats of 1960 and 1962? And there are, one feels, elements of instability in his make-up; after all, he has had one nervous breakdown in public—the disastrous press interview in California—and the memory of it cannot be erased.

A book dealer in Chicago, close to the Blackstone Rangers, recently told Thomas A. Johnson of The New York Times: "Black people know this convention [the

IN THIS ISSUE

August 19, 1968

EDITORIALS

98

ARTICLES

- 102 Comfortable with Nixon Karl Purnell
- 103 Lobster Land: A Traveler in China Alberto Moravia
- 107 Urban Farmers: The Green Belts of Cuba Timothy F. Harding and Donald W. Bray
- 109 Pennsylvania for Humphrey: The Party Vetoes the People James Higgins
- 112 Students of New Paltz: A Nice Little Revolution Wade Thompson
- 114 Harry Golden
- 115 Guns, Congress and the Networks Maurine Christopher

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 117 Brecht vs. Brecht: His Reception in Poland Andrzej Wirth
- 118 Night Letter (poem) Martha Friedberg
- 120 Revolution of Merit Allen Lacy
- 121 A Blast at Everyone G. William Domhoff
- 122 "Quick Watson! The Footnote" Theodore Roszak
- 124 The Moderately Content Gerda Charles
- 124 The Poet at Seventy (poem) R. Pawlowski
- 125 Theatre Julius Novick
- 127 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher	Associate Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.	GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor	Associate Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS	PHIL KERBY
Executive Editor	Literary Editor
ROBERT HATCH	HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 4

Democrat] doesn't really mean anything to them. It's just Daley bringing his gangster buddies into town for a little funning—a big Appalachia, legal this time." One can hardly blame the Rangers for feeling that way about the Democrats. The other "mob" has just concluded another Appalachia in Miami, the well-to-do mob, largely white, largely Protestant, middle-class, comfortably insulated from all unpleasant realities, foreign and domestic. (See "Comfortable with Nixon" by Karl Purnell, p. 102, this issue.) Listening to the speeches, with one or two exceptions, one got the impression that we are as a people the finest, noblest, ablest, most compassionate that history has ever known; nothing wrong with us, our institutions, or our society that a simple "change of leadership" will not correct. The appearance of an attractive, not-too-dark Negro on the platform seemed to convince the Republican "mob" of its racial benevolence. Even so, there was some slight improvement over the 1964 Cow Palace "mob." The party has achieved at last the appearance of unity. It has adopted a slick platform. And the liberal-moderate element is, in some respects, more potent than the count of delegates would suggest; given competent leadership it might have prevailed.

So the spotlight now shifts to Chicago. Will the Democrats have the wit to counter the Republican gamble in the only way open to them—by the nomination of McCarthy—or will they cooperate with the Republican strategists and nominate Humphrey? If they do, then Look magazine may well be right in suggesting that the two-party system is about to break up.

Old Man's Bluff

Every time we look (see editorials in issues of April 8 and April 22), Spain has raised its price for renewing the lease on the U.S. military bases which expires on September 26. The deal now, according to discreet murmurs from Spanish diplomatic sources, is to include an increase in the already very high level of our direct military aid, a full-fledged defense treaty (Spain is not in NATO, and England and the Scandinavian countries will not let it in), exemption from President Johnson's restrictions on capital investments abroad, and the right to try American personnel who commit crimes off the designated bases.

Franco argues that his "services" have become more valuable to the United States, what with the Russian navy curvetting about in the Mediterranean, de Gaulle's withdrawal from NATO and his ban on military overflights, and the transfer of a large French naval base in Algeria to the leftist government of that country. He also urges (at least by indirection) that he no longer needs the prestige of American bases to lend "respectability" to his regime; Hitler and Mussolini are long dead and the "jakkal" epithet has lost its sting.

Perhaps so. But Franco is nevertheless not in a position to bargain with bared teeth: His economy is in fearful shape, his students are openly rebellious, his workers are finding ways to organize outside his notorious National Syndicates—and he is 75 years old.

This last fact is the one that the State Department negotiators should keep in mind. A bargain can undoubtedly be struck somewhere between the present agreement and the hungry goals of the Spaniards. But granted that we want to keep our Polaris base at Rota (the air bases become less significant every year), are we willing to rent it at the price of hostility from Franco's successors?

American spokesmen talk of humanizing the regime from within—which is what people always claim they are doing when they cannot otherwise justify a distasteful alliance, and which in this case does not seem to have been a conspicuously successful instance of benign infiltration. Meanwhile, month by month, the voice of freedom in Spain grows bolder. Franco can doubtless continue to shout it down, partly because it is not worth spilling blood to destroy a 75-year-old enemy with no apparent heirs. A great many Spaniards, a constantly growing number, are awaiting the old man's funeral. The question, as one highly placed Spanish official said to Richard Blumenthal of The Washington Post, is whether they will decide to bury the United States in Franco's coffin.

The Undiscussed Issue

"For 27 years now," Business Week writes (July 27), "national defense has been taking by far the biggest single chunk of the federal budget. This year, the military's share runs to $80 billion, nearly as much as the pretax profits of all U.S. corporations and close to 10 per cent of the gross national product." But the editors add what everybody now knows: "Neither peace in Vietnam nor a braking of the arms race with the Soviets is going to release any sudden bonanza of dollars for domestic use."

Quite the contrary: the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as well as individual viewers-with-alarm like Admiral Rickover, complain that, partly because of the Vietnamese War, military technology has been semi-stagnant for almost a decade. The minds of the military prophets in the Pentagon, the think factories and the universities are gestating new families of weapons systems: missiles, spacecraft for fighting and reconnaissance, deep-diving submarines for special missions, and the manned bombers temporarily shelved by Robert S. McNamara.

Yet the only way by which funds can be freed for the rehabilitation of the cities and even first steps taken toward meeting the needs of the poor is to bring the Vietnamese idiocy to an end and at the same time curb the Pentagon spenders before they make off with the funds theoretically made available for welfare.

Just because the death toll and property damage in this summer's rioting has been on a smaller scale than last year's, a great many people, in and out of government, are regaining their complacency. Maybe it will all blow over, they speculate. Thinking could not be more wishful. While some of the Negro militants may be bought off and some may be killed, hell is only postponed, not averted. Within a few years we may see armed helicopters firing at snipers on rooftops.

"Crime in the streets" (code for mob violence) is discussed, if not very intelligently; but averting it by social action—using funds now allocated to "defense"—is scarcely discussed at all. Insofar as there is such discussion, it is mostly by intelligent sections of the business community, such as McGraw-Hill (publishers of Business Week) and some Congressmen, not all of them liberals by any means. (Senator Symington, for instance, is all for new weapons, but he joined the Congressional doves in opposing anti-ballistic-missile construction.) Sens. Gaylord Nelson and Joseph S. Clark can always be relied on for sanity in such matters, together with a few others, but decisive action rests with Rep. Mendel Rivers, Chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

A few weeks ago, as The Nation (July 22, page 37) pointed out, the Congressional Quarterly quoted Pentagon officials to the effect that $10.8 billion could be trimmed from the "defense" budget with a gain rather than a loss in efficiency. Even Defense Secretary Clark Clifford said publicly that the "defense" budget could safely be reduced by $2 billion to $3 billion. But Rivers would have none of it. He allowed two hours of discussion, then rammed through a $21 billion Defense Department budget, a mere down payment on the $80 billion or more that the Department will, by all indications, continue to receive.

The mechanics of these procedures, and the underlying psychology, are the principal problem before the country today—and the most ignored. Not that anybody is visited by the FBI at dawn or thrown into a detention camp if he feels like speaking what is on his mind. Ours is not in that sense a "garrison state"—not yet, anyway. The situation is that neither party dares to initiate cuts in "defense," although there are those in both parties who know that cuts could and should be made. "Defense" has become the sacred cow of the society as well as its economic mainstay. It is the great stabilizer, the flywheel of prosperity, which must not be allowed to slow down.

What would take its place? Many high-powered businessmen talk about possible profits in cleaning up the slums, training the hard-core unemployed, etc. But they are wondering who the customers would be, just how systems engineering would be applied to a job so different from space technology, and who would coordinate the thousands of small problems and conflicts of interest that would arise. "Defense" is so much safer.

In all this the general public concurs. Congress, and even the Pentagon, is ahead of popular thinking in this respect—or rather ahead of popular non-thinking. Such are the fruits of twenty-seven years of cold war and affluent materialism. Only Eugene McCarthy, among all our Presidential "hopefuls," has had the courage to make a head-on attack on the system which produces those $80 billion "defense" budgets. He has awakened a considerable number of citizens to the issue, especially among the young. How many, and to what effect, we shall see at the end of the month.

The Rubber-Stamp Experts

The American Bar Association, which has been holding its annual convention in Philadelphia, numbers among its various committees one on the Federal Judiciary. While the contribution of some A.B.A. committees to the commonweal may be questioned, the Committee on the Federal Judiciary is not without power. If it finds a candidate for the lower judgeships "not qualified," that usually ends the matter.

An article by Fred P. Graham in the August 3 New York Times throws some light on how the Committee on the Federal Judiciary goes about its business. Mr. Johnson has nominated Justice Abe Fortas to be Chief Justice of the United States, and Homer Thornberry, a member of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, to take Justice Fortas' place on the Supreme Court. Judge Thornberry, who was first appointed a District Judge by President Kennedy in 1963, was found by the Committee on the Federal Judiciary to be "highly acceptable" to serve on the Supreme Court. Very likely he is, but the decision was reached with amazing celerity, and the procedure was even more amazing. It seems that Leon Jaworski, a former long-time attorney for President Johnson and also a former member of the twelve-man committee, was designated to pass on the qualifications of Judge Thornberry. From his home town of Houston, Mr. Jaworski held an hour-long telephone conference with the current members of the committee, beginning at 7 A.M. on the day President Johnson announced the nominations. Questioned by the press, Mr. Jaworski explained that the A.B.A. had assigned him to head up the investigation of Judge Thornberry "because I knew him better than the others." The committee then voted unanimously to approve both Judge Thornberry and Justice Fortas for their respective offices.

Such a cursory procedure does a grave injustice to the nominees, in that it tends to support the charges that the nominations were "rubber-stamped" by the A.B.A. and to reinforce the opposition to both men in the Senate Judiciary Committee. It is the most unwelcome procedure imaginable, yet it is just about what one would expect from the A.B.A. It purports to represent the American bar, but it does not and never has. It represents the big law firms—the legal Establishment, which for the most part is conservative, if not reactionary. Why not stop this travesty? Either the A.B.A. should conduct impartial, painstaking investigations or it should get out of the picture. Or, in conjunction with other legal groups, such as the Decalogue Society of Chicago, the National Lawyers Guild, the Negro bar, etc., should set up a standing committee which, with the aid of foundation funds, could conduct meaningful investigations of judicial appointees.

A Sad Month

The Nation records with sorrow the death in late July of two people who had contributed materially to the magazine and given their friendship generously to its editors. The first of these was Jane Kirstein, wife of the former publisher, who died in her sleep on July 25. Mrs. Kirstein was The Nation's first regular UN correspondent, under her maiden name, Jane Stolle. She served in that post from 1958 to 1962, where her sound grasp of international affairs (Mrs. Kirstein had earlier reported to The New York Times from Mexico and Italy) and her journalist's flair for tracking down the stories that would be most meaningful to her particular readership were of immense value to the magazine. Her former colleagues also recall vividly how her quietly impressive demeanor—her presence as a woman of startling beauty possessed of ■ strong intelligence and the power of quick and sympathetic understanding—won for The Nation a respect and confidence at the United Nations that is one of its most valuable assets today. As all who remember the Andrea Doria disaster know, Mrs. Kirstein rebuilt her life from the ashes of an indescribable personal anguish. Her gallantry, entirely unstressed and indeed unperceived by the world at large, was an enduring wonder to her friends.

On July 27 died James Desmond, Albany correspondent for the New York Daily News. Mr. Desmond contributed to The Nation articles on the politics of New York State and the fluctuating career of its governor, written with a succinct authority amounting to wit. However, Mr. Desmond's assistance to the magazine was not confined to what appeared there under his by-line; as a busy and strategically placed professional, he was unfailingly available to the editors for background analysis, late information and brilliantly informed guesses.

Magazines do not mourn, and editors must cope with their private griefs in private. For the editors of The Nation, July was not a good month.

Comfortable with Nixon

KARL PURNELL

Mr. Purnell is a former Republican member of the Pennsylvania legislature and publisher of The Union County Journal of Lewisburg, Pa.

Miami Beach

Miami Beach was the perfect location. The 15-mile strip of sand and asphalt, with its giant pleasure palaces framed against the warm Atlantic, had been dredged up from a hopeless swamp in a remarkable display of capitalist power and innovation. Here, among the sauna baths, the massage parlors, the air-conditioned bars and gourmet restaurants, rich America is invited to relax and forget the problems of the world. Which is precisely what most of the 1,333 delegates to the Republican National Convention of 1968 did. In still another desperate attempt to turn back the clock and smother the problems of a troubled country, they nominated Richard Milhous Nixon because he had assured them that old friendships, old solutions and old politics still counted for something in these turbulent times.

For those worried about the ghettos Nixon advocated ■ good old-fashioned dose of private enterprise and individual initiative. The rebellious youth? There were Julie and Tricia and David Eisenhower, smiling and minding their elders the way young people should. As for Vietnam, it was closed to discussion while peace negotiations were under way.

If all of this seemed little more than a remarkable sleight of hand, the delegates were willing prey. They came from Boine, Ida., Little Rock, Ark. and South Bend, Ind., and they wanted desperately to believe that Nixon was right. They were 48 per cent businessmen, 98 per cent white, 82 per cent Protestant, and they wanted the world to come back into focus. These were not the hard-core, conservative ideologists who had backed Barry Goldwater in 1964. Less than 15 per cent of the delegates had attended the San Francisco debacle four years ago. They were "good Republicans" who realized some changes had to be made—but not too many.

A. I. Habersham, a Negro delegate from Georgia's Sixth District, smiled proudly as he talked of his delegation: "They been treatin' me real good. Take me along to the restaurants—no trouble, no sir, no trouble at all," he said as he surveyed the convention floor just before the balloting began. "The Republicans this year know they got to recognize my people. You know, Mr. Charlie actually came to me and asked me to run as a delegate."

Habersham, an insurance salesman and Baptist minister, was starry-eyed that a Negro would be brought along by the Georgia delegation. If it was a small, even meaningless, concession, it was still a change for the better.

Admittedly, the Republican delegates gave John Wayne a standing ovation when he talked about the importance of teaching his daughter the Lord's Prayer. And they screamed with nostalgia when Barry Goldwater once again defined his brand of freedom. Yet they also gave John Lindsay a thunderous reception, following his remarks. Clearly these were not people who would boo a Nelson Rockefeller as the Goldwaterites of 1964 had done. Ideology, carried to extremes, could be a dangerous thing for these unity-minded Republicans.

In fact, if there was one remarkable characteristic of the conventioners it was their near apathy toward the former Vice President. They like Dick Nixon, but many questioned whether he could win. No one doubted Rockefeller's ability to win. But they felt more comfortable with Nixon and simply hoped he could pull it off in November.

Delegates who openly doubted Nixon's vote-pulling power, or who took James Farmer at his word when he predicted Nixon would never get the black vote, were given a "tail-that-wags-the-dog" approach.

"Of course Nixon can't win on his own," Arlin Adams, Nixon's Pennsylvania manager, confided two days before the balloting. "But don't worry about that, because we'll get an attractive young liberal to carry the cities, the Negroes and the young people for him," Adams, an able secretary of welfare during the Scranton administration, said. This argument, astounding for its bluntness as to Nixon's inability to win, worked like magic.

Adams was able to crack the Pennsylvania delegation, picking up twenty-two votes for Nixon and leaving Gov. Raymond Shafer with forty to deliver to Rockefeller. In New Jersey the same play, plus several patronage offers, became the decisive factor of the convention. Ten hours before the balloting began, ■ wave of hope spread through the Rockefeller camp at the Americana Hotel when it was learned that the Garden State would hold behind Sen. Clifford Case. An extraordinary blitz by the Nixon camp finally buckled the delegation a few hours before the roll call, thus signaling the end of the Rockefeller efforts.

While the large Eastern industrial states were cajoled with the magic image of a Lindsay, a Percy, or a Hatfield, Nixon's Southern managers were using the same approach with a different name. Reagan supporters were told that they could have their man on the second spot if they stayed with Nixon. If they didn't hold, the nomination would be thrown to Rockefeller.

By eight o'clock Wednesday night word spread through the convention that the fight was over. There remained only the cliché-ridden nomination speeches and the demonstrations. There was little bitterness about the outcome. William Scranton, former governor of Pennsylvania, now obscure and unnoticed as he worked for Rockefeller throughout the convention, turned to a Nixon delegate and laughed: "Well, at least our spontaneous demonstration is more spontaneous than yours."

Gov. John Love of Colorado, also a Rockefeller supporter, sighed with resignation as the howling Nixon demonstrators jumped up and down in the aisles: "They keep supporting the same little group of people, and the group keeps getting smaller every year."

When it was all over and the delegates dispersed into the neon glow of Miami Beach's garish Washington Boulevard, a taxi driver muttered as he weaved through the early morning traffic: "Mister, I'll tell you one thing: Nixon can never win. I don't know what's wrong with you Republicans."

Yet the real blow was not to be scored until the next morning. At a long-delayed press conference, before which reporters speculated that it would have to be Lindsay, Nixon stunned much of the convention city with the announcement that Gov. Spiro T. Agnew of Maryland would be his running mate. Unpopular in his own state and a politician of the old school, Agnew is a suicidal choice whose selection was received with disbelief in the Rockefeller camp. It is likely that Lindsay might have picked up much of the New York Governor's support. Nixon, true to form, had chosen another Bill Miller, who might placate many of the Southern states, but would hardly help in the all-important industrial Northeast.

Bad as it all seemed, there was an air of hope among some delegates, who saw the Nixon nomination as the last gasp from the old politicians who have been ruling the Republican Party. "Sure Nixon will lose, but it doesn't mean the end of the Republican Party. Don't forget we lost in 1964 and it didn't kill us," one delegate stated.

Robert Porter, a 26-year-old peace delegate from Williamsport, Pa., spoke about the future of the Republican Party. A drama teacher who was elected by an anti-Vietnamese War organization in his Congressional district, Porter said: "Maybe the liberals in the party have finally learned their lesson. We have got to start early. I think a lot of people are going to begin working now for John Lindsay."

If the Republican Party has once again forfeited an excellent chance to win the Presidency, it should not be surprising. For whatever else the lessons of 1964 and 1968 can teach, it should now be amply clear that the GOP is not a national party. Gov. Tim Babcock of Montana stated this very well when he explained why he was supporting the Nixon candidacy: "You have to get someone who can help you in your own state. The local elections are the most important."

What Babcock was saying publicly is what many of the Republican delegates admitted privately throughout the convention. Winning national power is secondary to regional victory. Almost to a man, members of the Southern delegations admitted that George Wallace would sweep their states in November.

"We can't win with any of these candidates, but we can pick up some local offices with Nixon or Reagan," one Georgia delegate claimed. To him, it was immaterial what happened in Washington. In state after state it was apparent that this concern for regional problems exceeded by far any concern for the national crisis.

During a noontime champagne party given for members of one delegation beside the palm-bordered pool of a Miami Beach hotel on the day of the balloting, a loud-speaker announced: "Will all delegates please arrange to attend a caucus. It is important that all delegates attend this meeting." No one moved from the pool.

Lobster Land: A Traveler in China

ALBERTO MORAVIA

This essay by the renowned Italian novelist is taken from his The Red Book and the Great Wall: An Impression of Mao's China, to be published by Farrar, Straus & Giroux in the early fall. The English translation is by Ronald Strom.

Our program for the day was the Great Wall. It runs along the mountains between China and Mongolia more than 3,000 miles. But we visited a section that was about 50 miles from Peking and saw only a few hundred yards of it. We went by automobile and sat in our usual places:

Dacia and I in back, and the driver and Mr. Li, our guide, in front. The car left Peking and went into the countryside, toward the Western Hills.

It was a magnificent day. Large white clouds, gold around their edges, lazily crossed the sky. The plain of Peking was of a springtime green, bright and clear, as far as the dark blue of the hills.

The Great Wall stimulates thought. It is one of mankind's myths and not merely because of its astonishing length. There is an ideology of the Great Wall—there is a message. There is also a psychology of the Great Wall or, if you prefer, a state of mind. And finally there is a lesson of the Great Wall—aesthetic, political, military, social, philosophical, economic.

The Great Wall is also the Chinese myth par excellence. An idea that has been transformed into a concrete object, visible, enduring, perhaps eternal. In a moment of Chinese-style conservatism, the French tried to construct their own Great Wall: the Maginot Line. But the Maginot Line did not last more than a generation; it was stormed from the flank. Now its little fortresses are auctioned off to amateurs of military ruins. The Great Wall functioned uninterruptedly from 200 B.C. almost till yesterday. And the Chinese have no intention of dismantling it. They have restored the sections near Peking, and it has become the object of tourist pilgrimages. Other countries have their churches, palaces and museums, or their Niagara Falls or Vesuviuses to show. In China they have a wall.

So much has been said about the Great Wall that one is almost ashamed to mention it. One is tempted to say the only thing that probably has not already been said—the tautology that the Great Wall is the Great Wall. But after all, the fear of uttering the commonplace is very common. So I too will have a go at the myth of the Great Wall. Let me begin by saying that the Great Wall obviously has two sides to it: the inner side facing China, and the other one facing Mongolia.

On the Chinese side was, and still is, China—an immense country that, depending on the period of history, teemed with activity, prosperity and fervor, or was depopulated and ran wild in civil wars. Thus one's idea of the Great Wall is noticeably modified. The Great Wall was not always and invariably like a strong safe protecting a treasure. Sometimes there was a treasure and sometimes not, according to the times. The Great Wall actually served to protect, in a purely existential sense, the Chinese people. But from what? For that question we must consider the outer side of the Great Wall.

The Great Wall was built to prevent barbarian invasions. But who were the barbarians? One might answer that they were the Mongols, the Huns, but that would not be exactly right. The barbarians were any peoples who were not Chinese.

On the other hand, there was not, there could not be, as far as the Chinese were concerned, any people, even barbarians. There was simply the void. This void had been created by the Great Wall itself, by the Chinese, from the very moment they began to build the Great Wall. Without the Great Wall, there could be no void.

Thus, coming closer to a true definition, the Great Wall defended and protected China from the void, from nothing. China was what was, what existed, what was important. Outside China there was nothing, nothing existed, nothing had any importance.

The Great Wall of China

The message of the Great Wall and its ideology, then, are strictly Chinese. They are the message and the psychology of a conservatism that is rather special. It is not political, not military, not social and not economic, though there is something of all those in it. One might almost say it was biological and aesthetic. The Great Wall was built against the barbarians because the barbarians might have introduced new blood and new ideas into China. But new blood and ideas unleash evolution and revolution. And China's aim was not to develop or change but to endure. Endure, perhaps to age, perhaps to grow decrepit, but to endure. But biological duration demands orthodoxy, immobility, etiquette, ceremony and ritual. The Great Wall guaranteed the unending continuity of these things. It allowed the Chinese people to endure, with or without culture, in order and tranquillity, or immersed in the chaos of civil war, rich or poor. All this as far as the aspect I have called biological is concerned.

But there was also an aesthetic aspect. Every conservatism results from pushing to its extreme the idea of form as a victory over time. Only perfect form can put the object that reproduces it outside time; only through perfect form can it be expressed for eternity. Artists are conservatives par excellence, even when they claim to be revolutionaries. They want their work to endure forever.

In an artistic sense, let us say, the Great Wall was intended to maintain the form of China unchanged for eternity. It had the same function as the shell of a crustacean. It would not have the form it does if it were not for the shell. One could extend the metaphor. Like crustaceans, ancient China was hard outside and soft inside—unlike men and vertebrates in general, which are soft outside and hard inside. But isn't the crustacean perhaps the best symbol for a conservatism so rigid and so plated with laws, norms, etiquettes, ceremonies and rites that it has no content or is a mere shell for soft interests? Conservatism is a lobster. Ancient China was a lobster. The Great Wall was the expression of Chinese conservatism, just as the shell of the lobster is the expression of the lobster's exquisite softness.

Perhaps then the barbarians were not as barbaric as the Chinese pretended they were. Or, indeed, they may have been barbarians, but they were barbarians on the order of those who invaded the Roman Empire at the time of decline. They were bearers of that particular kind of destruction which is a result of ignorance and youth.

And it was precisely because they were young and ignorant that they provoked new developments and injected new blood. Perhaps it would have been better if the Chinese had been as thoughtless or incapable or irresponsible as the Romans, if they had not built their Great Wall and had let the barbarians enter freely.

All that Europe had in the way of Great Walls at the time of the barbarian invasions was a little Roman revetment between England and Scotland. The barbarians went everywhere. But the Chinese, with their Great Wall, managed to keep the barbarians outside China for a very long time indeed. Thus when the barbarians finally came, civilized by now, it was an easy matter to make them

Chinese, to make them part of Chinese corruption and decrepitude. The Great Wall, as I said, was the Chinese view of the world, their way of existing in the world. Since they could not build a Great Wall on the sea, they did the next best thing by closing their ports to the barbarians of the Western world. It was a great wall of prohibitions, and it lasted as long as the Great Wall of stone. Then all of a sudden, in less than a century, all the Great Walls of China fell, one after another. The void was suddenly revealed then as difference, and China discovered the void within itself. Thus China has absorbed into its inner void the outer, barbarian difference. This is the history of modern China, from the Taiping Rebellion to Mao.

Nevertheless, the problem of Chinese communism today may again be that of the ancient celestial empire. Will China go back to the system of the Great Wall, that biological and formal immobility guaranteed by an ideological orthodoxy, a philosophical dogma? Will it again become a lobster land? Or will China give up the idea of the Great Wall once and for all? Will dogmas and orthodoxies be hurled down, and will China become a vertebrate land, hard inside and soft outside, a horse land (or a man land)?

These were my thoughts as the automobile drove through the well-cultivated countryside at the foot of the Western Hills. Then the road began to climb a bit. There are stupendous mountains in China, in Sinkiang and Tibet, under the Himalayas. But the so-called Western Hills are only hills. Here the Great Wall seems to be justified also by lack of natural defenses.

The road runs along the bottom of a narrow valley, green and flourishing. The stony river bed with shallow limpid water is visible between the bushes. Then the hills gradually close, and while they do not grow higher they become steeper. And the valley becomes a gorge.

We arrived at a small group of peasant houses, low yellow constructions with dried-mud walls and straw roofs. The car stopped and we saw a kind of arch or bridge of white marble, a massive and elaborate structure, a veritable work of art planted there in the middle of the unchanging countryside. It was one of the gates of the Great Wall, and soldiers and excise officers probably once stood guard there. It must have been an inner gate, part of a system of lesser walls that defended the nearby capital. The authentic Great Wall is much farther away.

We got out of the car and looked at the gate. Like all Chinese monuments, it was both massive and ornamental. The idea of solidity was oddly blended with that of refinement. The gate was covered with fine low-relief sculptures on both sides. The subject was exactly what one would have expected, given the place and function of the monument: this was civilization, as represented by heroes, sages and emperors, bending the neck of barbarism, depicted in the form of dragons, serpents and monsters. Anyone entering China would have understood at once. He was leaving the void of barbarism and entering the realm of civilization. Albeit this realm consisted only of ceremony and etiquette; that is, a void like any other.

We climbed to the top of the gate. It had been abandone, like so many artistic creations in China today. Weeds were growing between the bricks, there were cracks in the marble, and the sculptures were scratched, darkened and defaced. The gate ought to be restored, but there is slight chance that it can be done in the near future. Mr. Li's tone was dry and slightly bored as he explained what this gate was. The Chinese today are not interested in the Great Wall, for it no longer serves any purpose. Other times, other Great Walls. The most one can hope for is the restoration of some section of the fortifications, designed in harmony with the times, to be educational and scientific. But the marble arch is too beautiful to be restored.

We returned to the automobile and drove on through the valley, or rather the gorge. Finally, at the point where the gorge is narrowest, we saw the Great Wall, the real one, the one that traverses 3,000 miles of mountains. I recognized the presence, the efficacy, the power of the myth in the emotion that suddenly took hold of me. It is true, of course, that the place itself is indescribably evocative. On both sides of the gorge, the mountains seem to withdraw, as if they were fleeing from the gorge from one peak to another. And along the edge of these two continuous ridges, standing out against the blue sky, the huge gray stone serpent, sinuous and soft, embracing the tortuous turns of the mountain range, also takes flight.

The beauty of the Great Wall is in its faithful pursuit of the meandering mountains. A squared-up wall in the middle of a plain, like the Escorial, for example, has something dismal, abstract and lifeless about it. But to look at the Great Wall is to experience a serpentine vitality. The reptile may be decrepit but it is alive. One is almost surprised that it does not move, slithering off, curl around the mountains, and finally disappear on the horizon. Its vitality is subtle, insinuating, resilient, sly, tenacious, parasitic and symbiotic. There is a kind of marriage between ivy and the tree trunk around which it twines. And this marriage is also very Chinese; it is designed to endure because it is bound to nature, a natural fact, a natural situation.

We walked up to the wall. The way in which the Chinese military engineers went about constructing the Great Wall is clear. The wall winds up and down the mountains like an amusement park roller coaster. Where the mountain forms a peak there is a guard tower, and between one peak and another, i.e., between one tower and another, the wall descends and rises again over a distance that is never too great to prevent a clear view of anything that might happen along that particular section of wall. In other words, one has a clear view of the wall from one tower to the next. Thus the barbarians were effectively held at bay. As soon as they would appear, the soldiers stationed in the towers at the ends of the threatened section of the wall would leap to the defense. And a system of signals from tower to tower could warn Peking of an imminent attack.

Probably the greater part of the Great Wall has been abandoned, as have so many monuments in China. Overrun with weeds, its battlements crumbling, its parapets fallen down and its towers mutilated, the Great Wall must be merely a shapeless ruin of stone and brick in many places. But in that gorge so near Peking, the Great Wall has been restored with the greatest attention. There is even a restaurant. And in the open area before the restaurant several tourist buses and many cars were parked. Dense groups of Chinese tourists were climbing up the wall, toward the towers. They climbed slowly, looking as small as ants in the distance. They carried picnic lunches and bottles of beer wrapped in handkerchiefs. The Great Wall seemed to move them and delight them more than any other monument in Peking. It is "their" monument, the only Chinese monument that has something universal to say—a myth of mankind in general.

We picked out what seemed the shortest and least steep section of the wall and started to climb ourselves. One can go up the wall by broad steps or by extremely steep inclines. These ramps are so steep that one must crawl up them, and to come down again one must lean far back. It was a calm clear day, but oddly enough a wild cold wind was blowing on top of the wall—evidently the wind that whirls in the void beyond the wall. And there was the void: we looked out at it between the battlements. Beyond the gorge, past a kind of ridge of shrubs, was an immense green plain, bright, golden in the sun, mysterious and thriving. And the idea came back of the void from which the wall was intended to protect China. All it was was something different and perhaps, who knows, something better. Perhaps the Great Wall was not only intended to defend and to protect but to prevent comparisons and confrontations.

Moreover the revolution that has renovated China came from there, from that immense plain, mysterious, green and golden in the sun. Over there, in a straight line running thousands of miles, is Lenin's Russia and Marx's Europe. Over there is the homeland of the barbarian ideas that have rejuvenated the decrepit old lady with her tiny feet and age-old etiquette. But the danger now is that these barbarian ideas will be bound up, like ladies' feet, in orthodox dogma, that they too will become matters of etiquette, ceremony and ritual.

We climbed several steps and then began to clamber up a tremendously steep ramp. We climbed into the wind that struck from all sides and seemed to want to hurl us down. We finally reached a guard tower. It was three stories high, with rooms and stairs and passageways. There were crenels for shooting arrows, and projectiles and small windows for the mouths of culverins. Everything had been marvelously restored. Everything was brand

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

new and dead. I turned to our guide. "I suppose the Great Wall at least served some purpose."

"It protected the empire for centuries against barbarian invasions."

"But what happened in China during all those centuries?"

"Well, it's clear what happened. First the empire grew and prospered, and then it went into decline."

"So the Great Wall at some point no longer managed to protect China from its own decadence and corruption."

He shrugged his shoulders, and inside me I knew he was not wrong to do so. My remark was a sophism. "There is no relation between the two. On the one hand, the empire built the Great Wall for purely military reasons. And on the other, China went into decline."

"Let's have a closer look at this. Try to understand me. If China had not built the Great Wall and had remained open to foreign influences and ideas and innovations, perhaps it would not have gone into decline."

"There was no chance of beneficial ideas or influences or innovations coming from Mongolia. Just armed warriors on horseback."

"I haven't made myself clear. For the Great Wall is chiefly a symbol."

"A symbol of what?"

"The symbol of invincible Chinese conservatism."

"There's nothing invincible. China today is a revolutionary country, the most revolutionary country in the world. And the Great Wall is a great work of Chinese military engineering."

When our visit was ended and we returned to the car that was to take us back to Peking, I couldn't resist quoting Lao Tzu's words of the Tao. "The court is corrupt, The fields are overgrown with weeds, The granaries are empty; Yet there are those dressed in fineries, With swords at their sides, Filled with food and drink, And possessed of too much wealth. This is known as taking the lead in robbery. Far indeed is this from the way."

These words were written before the Great Wall was built. What can Great Walls protect except that which should not be protected? Life, at its fullest and most mature, has no need of Great Walls.

URBAN FARMERS

The Green Belts of Cuba

TIMOTHY F. HARDING and DONALD W. BRAY

Mr. Harding teaches history at California State College, Los Angeles, where Mr. Bray is an associate professor of government. Both men are specialists in Latin American affairs.

In Cuba today, Hispanic visionaries can work in an atmosphere of down-to-earth effectiveness. Don Quixote has found discipline. Yet the new work ethic has, if anything, enhanced the traditional Latin dream ethic. The current Havana green belt project is a case in point.

A few months ago near Havana, Fidel Castro talked with a small farmer who was about to join the stream of exiles leaving for Miami. The revolution had helped him little; he lived in the same old shack and could not find or afford labor to clear and plant most of his acreage. Castro asked the man whether his attitude would change if the government cleared his land of scrub brush, provided him with a new furnished house, livestock and field hands, and gave him all necessary technical and financial support to make his farm profitable. The suspicious farmer responded that he could never repay the government for these services. Fidel replied that the revolution asked only for his cooperation, not for repayment. The man's eyes widened and the Havana green belt—"Cordón de La Habana"—was born. That was in April, 1967. The farmer's land was cleared in one week. An access road was built to his property. His land was seeded and a water reservoir constructed. Today, the man is the local president of the National Association of Small Farmers and one of the leading spokesmen for the Cordón.

The Cordón idea has overnight become a massive socio-agricultural undertaking. A belt around the capital (almost 7 per cent of the Province of Havana) is being converted into a vast forest of millions of productive trees. This was formerly an area of mostly open, under-utilized land, left in scrub or unimproved pasture.* At a forced-march pace, climatological, soil, hydrographic and land-use studies were made and a master plan was drawn up for the Cordón. In addition to the expanse of coffee, fruit and beans, the plan calls for a new botanic garden and zoo in a large park, a recreational forest, many zones of ornamental plants and sizable areas for dairy stock and sugar cane cultivation. Eighty reservoirs are being constructed to provide water for irrigation and recreation throughout the Cordón.

The Cordón is not an isolated effort but the first experimental stage of what will become a series of belts stretching from one end of the island to the other. In Havana Province a dairy belt will be added around the south edge of the present Cordón and that will be followed by a 330,000-acre vegetable Cordón, around the dairy belt. These plans are made by region with little attention

*This was one sign of the irrational use of resources in the days when Cuba, an economic dependency of the United States, imported its urban food supply from abroad although most of the population worked in agriculture. The existence of uncultivated land all over the island is, on the other hand, a great advantage Cuba has over such areas as Haiti or El Salvador where the top soil has long since been overworked and eroded. The ingredients which the Cubans are adding in the Cordón are urban labor, technology and efficient overall planning.

paid to whether the land is in private, collective or government ownership except for the right of the small landowner to cultivate a portion of his land as he sees fit.

Like all the important, large-scale projects in Cuba, the plan is directed by the consolidated revolutionary party, now officially called the Communist Party of Cuba, though it contains only a small minority of pre-revolutionary Communists and is universally referred to simply as "the party." It was placed in charge because the massive mobilization of urbanites for agriculture at no extra pay is seen as a basically political undertaking. The campaign succeeds only if it can be made meaningful to enough people so that they take upon themselves individually and collectively the responsibility to meet the goals.

Moreover, as the best-organized civilian institution in the country, the party was clearly the proper organization to coordinate a complex task in which all government ministries play a part. Heavy, army-operated equipment was dispatched for land clearing. Enormous plant nurseries were established, the work of 2.5 million man-days, with labor brigades organized to plant seedlings. Elementary and secondary students were mobilized for lighter jobs. Playgrounds, brightly colored, beflagged shade tents, field kitchens and toilets were spaced throughout the Cordon area. More than a million men, women and children from hundreds of schools, government agencies and work centers had to be given specific tasks at designated times and places. Some stores and agencies in Havana were closed periodically to free people for planting, but employees who stayed behind in stores and factories that did not close guaranteed to maintain output levels despite the absence of those who had left for the Cordon.

The authors of this article were moved to join the parade out of Havana to plant coffee trees. The supervisor of the all-male group of planters who agreed to accept our unexpected services was a woman who six months before had been a statistician in a government office. She seemed genuinely pleased by our offer to help. At first our co-workers assumed we were Canadians. They were only mildly surprised to learn our true nationality. Struggling together in sticky soil under a tropical sun, what did it matter? We were compañeros. Music from a nearby mess tent lifted the spirit. When break-time came, French pastry unavailable in Havana shops was distributed to the field workers. In contrast to the food shortages in city markets, the trays in lunch tents were loaded with meat, rice, sweet potatoes, beans and soft drinks. The food available in Cuba is distributed more generously to places where hard physical work is being done.

An unmistakable elan is created by the joining of city dwellers and peasants, working the soil for a common cause. The seriousness of city people gives way to smiles and joking in the fields. Office workers are astonished to find themselves concerned about rainfall, drought, seed varieties and grafting techniques about which they (and the party officials) have become expert. It may be that the peasants are even more astonished to be sweating side by side with librarians and cabinet ministers in a kind of work where they have a real skill advantage. The barriers between urban and rural people and between social classes and occupations melt under the baking sun. People seem to be taking care of one another, protecting this one's bad back, giving the best hoe or smoothest handled shovel to the least experienced worker, gently correcting any blunders in technique.

We talked for three hours with some of the party officials who organized the Cordon enterprise at their "command post" in Havana. They were, like most Cubans who hold positions of leadership, in their 20s. These young politicians are at once hard-boiled organizers and fearless dreamers about the construction of a moneyless society. They described their sociological vision of the Cordon. Besides tying city and country together and dramatizing the agricultural priority of the revolution, it will, they hope, ultimately transform the Cordon small farmer into a non-materialist, a person motivated by moral instead of monetary incentives. That being the case, we asked, why were they leaving 60 per cent of the Cordon in the hands of private farmers and not establishing collective farms? "Our immediate concern," they answered, "is not the form of ownership but production. Schools, stores, electricity and recreational facilities could be provided more cheaply if we grouped families in large settlements, but the farmers of this area prefer to live an independent and isolated life.

"To tamper at this point with that preference would jeopardize the whole undertaking. However, we are going to change their outlook by breaking their isolation through community action. We will give them everything they need free: a new house, furniture, clothing, education for their children, medical care, etc. Students and other volunteers will plant their coffee trees and other valuable crops. Volunteers will help cultivate and harvest their crops without charge, yet the farmer will be allowed to keep the profits from the harvest. After all, what can he do with these profits? He cannot buy land, he cannot hire labor. The use of machinery is supplied free of charge. Any crop loans he receives are canceled if drought or hurricanes ruin his harvest. No automobiles or luxury items are available, even if he wanted to buy them." (As they do become available they will be so rationed that people with large amounts of money will have little advantage.)

These young revolutionaries were fully aware that the small farmer was the person in Cuba least likely to develop a revolutionary consciousness but, they pointed out, the Cordón campaign had so impressed certain farmers that they had already pledged to donate to the government crops which were planted for them by others. It is by this kind of exchange of faith and work that the young Cubans dare to conceive of the rapid abolition of money in their society. By 1970 they plan to furnish free eggs and coffee, and to abolish rent. (Already rents are very low or canceled, since in 1959 all rent payments were halved and converted into payments toward purchase.) Sooner or later the farmer will develop a collectivist spirit and perhaps even move voluntarily to a new settlement with better services; but if, despite everything, he keeps his old mentality, then his children, who cannot inherit his land, will want to leave the farm anyway because they will have been educated for technical and professional careers.

The Cordón officials explained that the use of urban labor in agriculture made sense to them, not only because of its sociological implications but also because, once the land is cleared and agriculture becomes more mechanized, less labor will be needed in farming each year. Thus there is no reason to prepare for large numbers of permanent agricultural workers.

In return for free agricultural produce in the future, the urban population is working today in agriculture without compensation. They are working for Havana's abundant food supply of tomorrow without calculating individual reward. And insofar as the Cordón campaign has been a triumph of moral incentives, it is a monument to Che Guevara, for it was he who championed that position in Cuba before he left to promote revolution abroad.

PENNSYLVANIA FOR HUMPHREY

The Party Vetoes the People

JAMES HIGGINS

Mr. Higgins is assistant editor of the York (Pa.) Gazette and Daily.

FACT: Four years ago, on April 28, 1964, Lyndon B. Johnson received 209,606 votes in the Democratic Presidential primary election in Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania delegation to the subsequent nominating convention, after New York and California the third largest delegation, could hardly be criticized for supporting, as it did, the people's choice. In this year's primary, on April 23, Sen. Eugene McCarthy received 428,259 Democratic votes. (The Johnson-Humphrey combined vote was 72,263 and Sen. Robert Kennedy got 65,430.) But when the 130 Pennsylvania delegate votes are cast at the Chicago convention on August 28, the chances are—I am writing this on July 30—that Humphrey will receive on the first ballot about 100 votes and McCarthy, if he's lucky, the rest.

QUESTION: How can it happen that, four years ago, the Pennsylvania delegation to convention reflected voter sentiment expressed at the primary polls, whereas this year most of the delegation is ready to reflect exactly the opposite of what more than twice as many voters indicated as their political feeling: namely, that they oppose a Johnson Administration candidate and prefer somebody else, particularly Senator McCarthy?

ANSWERS (More or less; I attach that "more or less" because it has become almost impossible, it seems to me, to make sense out of the American political system or to obtain reasonable explanations of its processes and of the decisions, if you can call them that, of its practitioners):

I have talked recently with eight persons involved in Democratic politics in Pennsylvania—two on the national level, three on the state level and three on the county level. To one degree or another they are all "leaders." The general impression I got was of men wandering in a wilderness trying, sometimes desperately, sometimes good-humoredly, to convince themselves that they're getting somewhere. It struck me once or twice during my chats that, valuable and instructive as the Bolivian diary of Che Guevara may be, the journal I'd like to read would be the candid daily record of a man whose life experience is that of conventional U.S. politics.

I posed two general questions to the politicians: Why were the Democratic Party executives in Pennsylvania determined that as many convention delegates as they could control should vote for Hubert Humphrey? And how, given the primary indications of popular Democratic hostility to Johnson-Humphrey policies, and of favor for the candidacy of Senator McCarthy, could the party executives exercise majority control of the delegates?

As for the first question, nobody really seemed to know, except that Humphrey happened to be in the national line of succession and, well, there he was, you had to make the best of it. Professional Democrats in Pennsylvania, operating an organization that had lost the last two gubernatorial elections and its state-wide registration edge over the Republicans, received two stunning blows this year. Their effect was increased by the fact that former Gov. David Lawrence had died in 1966 and was no longer around to guide, manage and oversee the deliberations of the state party's policy committee. The first blow was the announcement by Johnson that he would not run for reelection. This March 31st announcement, coming about three weeks before the Pennsylvania primary, was followed by the second blow—the amazing size of the vote for McCarthy, whose supporters would have been gratified by even half the number he received. The party professionals, I was informed by a politician who knows them well, were “flabbergasted” by the primary.

Ivey

Under the circumstances, I asked a young Democrat who, in his recent commitment to full-time politics, has proved himself as both campaigner and candidate, wouldn't it have been logical for the professionals to have decided that the primary vote warranted an endorsement of McCarthy? He said politely that the logic of politics was something else again. To the professionals, he said, the logical conclusion to be drawn from the primaries was that they had to work harder for Humphrey, since he was “the choice.” But “the choice” of whom?, I persisted. Is he, for example, the choice of the kids in their 20s who were with you when you ran for office last year? Hell, no, he said, all those kids are out campaigning for McCarthy.

He had just finished telling me that the major problem of the Democratic Party in Pennsylvania was to undo its “image” of a boss-directed machine, with the main levers in Philadelphia (in the hands of Mayor James Tate) and Pittsburgh (manipulated by Mayor Joseph Barr, who is also one of the state's two national committeemen and chairman of this year's convention delegation), and to develop a party oriented to issues represented by attractive, convincing candidates. He also told me, at various points in the conversation, that he thought we were in for at least ten years of conservatism or reaction in the administration of the federal government, that it was the “white-law-and-order” vote which preoccupied professional politicians no matter what their social philosophy, that Humphrey would be the next President, that there was absolutely no chance that the state's party executives, or more than two or three of the delegates not already pledged to McCarthy (unofficially, since delegates to national convention are by Pennsylvania law prohibited from prior public promise of their vote), would change their minds. Humphrey's the man, he said, that's it.

I made one last try to get from him some kind of practical reason for this position. I suppose, I said, that with 60,000 state jobs available to members of whatever party runs the government of Pennsylvania from Harrisburg, there must be a connection between hoping for the election of Humphrey as President and hoping for a Democratic governor in 1970. No, he said, he didn't think so. The jobs don't mean anything any more, if they ever really did. Only a few of them pay anything worth while; and these have to be filled with competent persons, not just anybody who's a friend of a county chairman, so that actually there are a lot of holdovers no matter how the administrations change politically. And as for the peanut jobs, the problem is to find people to take them. I said that since state patronage didn't seem to count, could it be that federal patronage and contracts had something to do with the determination to back Humphrey. Federal patronage, he told me, adds up to a few judgeships and, you know, some housing jobs, poverty jobs. As for the road and building contracts, the defense contracts, the guys in those fields are pretty well insured with both parties; there are exceptions, of course, but not enough to build a case for discovering why Humphrey is the candidate. He just is, that's all. He's the candidate and perhaps the best way to put it is that when Johnson withdrew, Humphrey automatically became the candidate, which means that you find reasons for supporting him and getting him elected. It's a simple political organizational thing.

I had already observed the workings of this process in the person of an older Democrat, a prominent one, whose ideas about the U.S. role in Vietnam were close to those of McCarthy and certainly greatly different from those of Johnson and Humphrey. Nevertheless, he was preparing himself to accept Humphrey as the candidate. He had begun, he said, to see the two men, Humphrey and McCarthy, as reflecting the Boy Scout style and the Jesuit style. He had just about persuaded himself that a Boy Scout was preferable in the White House and more generally representative of the American ideology, if there was one.

I did not mention, since I was there not to argue but to listen, that Nixon might prove to have a Boy Scout appeal superior to that of Humphrey. While I was thinking thus, the older Democrat was telling me that the sensible method for approaching the Presidential political question was to "imagine" a man not as a candidate but as a President in office. He said that on balance Humphrey projected into that spot more definitively than McCarthy. It reminded me of what I had heard, in less abstract language, from a sharp Democratic functionary who is at home in both state and national circles. McCarthy, he said, would make a lousy President, so it's up to us to educate the people who might have voted emotionally for Gene in the primary to get with Humphrey for President. You mean, I said, he's already nominated? Oh sure, he said, we have the delegates.

Which brings up question number two. How do "they" get to have the delegates when more than 400,000 Pennsylvania Democrats voted for Senator McCarthy on April 23? The explanation lies in the manne, oy which delegates get to be delegates in Pennsylvania. It is, to say the least, a curious system, and the more so because when you start to look into it, you immediately receive the news that what you are about to study constitutes a model of democratic intent and form.

On the day before a prospective candidate in Pennsylvania is permitted by law to circulate nominating petitions, the Democratic State Committee announces the appointment of a number of convention "delegates at large." This year the date was January 22 and the number fifty-two. The theoretical basis for selecting these delegates at that particular time is that they can be presumed not to know who might be a candidate and can therefore be further presumed to have free and open minds when chosen. Which, of course, is nonsense. I am sure that the few persons responsible for appointing the delegates, and the delegates themselves, assumed on January 22 that Johnson would be the Democratic nominee—and that they assumed so up until March 31. The true political character of the appointed delegates at large, is revealed, however, not by what probably was in their minds between January 22 and March 31, but by what they have done—or, rather, not done—since the flabbergasting April 23rd primary.

Only one of the fifty-two, to my knowledge, has announced that the primary vote for McCarthy, and for McCarthy's program, will lead him to cast his vote for McCarthy at convention. This delegate is Milton Shapp, who strayed from a highly successful business career into politics several years ago, when he secured the Democratic gubernatorial nomination and was defeated by the present Republican Gov. Raymond Shafer. Shapp has maintained something of a political organization of his own in Pennsylvania, but his defection from the Humphrey ranks has not even slightly shaken the party professionals. One of them said to me, "Miltie's a party of one, strictly speaking, for and to himself in this present ball game." Had Sen. Robert Kennedy lived, there might have been a few more breaks in the delegate-at-large solidarity. But not many, chances are; they were picked too carefully.

Among them, for example, are the persons who no doubt did the picking: the aforementioned James Tate (Joseph Barr gets to be a delegate by virtue of having succeeded David Lawrence as a national committeeman); state party chairman Thomas Minehart (who is also one of Pennsylvania's five elected executives, holding the office of State Treasurer); former Gov. George Leader, now directing the Humphrey build-up in the state; and Congressman William Green of Philadelphia, son of a one-time Congressman of the same name.

A more extensive sampling from the list of delegates at large illustrates the safety of the system. For instance: I. W. Abel, president of the United Steelworkers union, is, like most of Pennsylvania's labor chiefs, a Johnson Administration stalwart. Last fall the AFL-CIO passed the word that any Democratic candidate for any office had to go all out for Johnson or forfeit labor support. The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO has "unanimously" endorsed Humphrey and the state's two top union officials, Harry Boyer and Mike Johnson, are convention delegates at large.

As are Genevieve Blatt, former Pennsylvania Secretary of Internal Affairs, unsuccessful candidate for the U.S. Senate, now a deputy director in the Johnson Administration's Office of Economic Opportunity, secretary of the state committee; Grace Sloan, Auditor General of the state, first brought into state government as an appointee of former Governor Leader; Andrew Bradley, Secretary of Property and Supplies in the Leader and Lawrence administrations, now treasurer of the state committee; Louise John, vice chairman of the state committee; A. D. Cohn, chairman of the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board in the Lawrence administration; Joseph Lawler, Secretary of Highways in the Leader administration, now chairman of the Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission; John Rice, former chairman of the state committee, and Matthew McCloskey, once fund-raising chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

The other delegates at large, and the sixty-nine alternate delegates at large, are mostly county chairmen, state legislators, secondary labor leaders, job holders in Thomas Minehart's or Grace Sloan's Harrisburg offices, or businessmen whose contributions, presumably, have entitled them to a space on the convention floor. All in all, the appointed delegates compose a force under the command of the Democratic powers-that-be in Pennsylvania. And they are selected, especially the alternates who may have a lot of free time on their hands in Chicago, not only for their voting fidelity but for their lobbying capacities among the 108 delegates elected at the April primary on a Congressional District basis.

Here a word about arithmetic is in order; being political arithmetic it is a little complicated. The Democratic National Committee has a formula for assigning to each state the number of delegate votes and the maximum number of delegates who may cast those votes. Early in January, Pennsylvania was assigned 130 votes and a maximum of 160 voting delegates. (The maximum total delegation, alternates included, was set at 290.) The National Committee lets each state committee decide whether the allocation of votes shall be on a "Congressional District, at-large or other basis." The decision in Pennsylvania was to appoint fifty-two delegates at large, forty-two having full vote and ten a half vote each. Four delegates were to be elected, according to Pennsylvania law, from each of the state's twenty-seven Congressional Districts. Therefore, a mere eighty-one convention votes would somehow have to be distributed among the 108 elected delegates. I am not sure just how the full and half votes are distributed among the appointed and elected delegates, but I am confident that it is done thoughtfully and by the same people who thoughtfully appointed the delegates at large.

Of the 100 delegates elected on April 23, twenty-four ran as supporters of McCarthy. These twenty-four were among a total of ninety-three delegates in twenty-one of the twenty-seven electoral districts who identified themselves with McCarthy in their campaigns. The disparity between the popular vote for McCarthy and the relatively small number of McCarthy delegates elected seems puzzling, but really is not. It is a result which the "system" is almost bound to produce.

The names of the candidates for the Presidency and of the candidates for the party convention appear as two separate ballot items. There is no indication on the ballot that a particular delegate candidate will, if elected, represent a particular candidate for the Presidency. The chances are that many voters who cast preferential ballots for McCarthy on April 23 believed that this in itself had a nominating significance; all unknowing, they may well have voted for organization delegates or, since the delegate names are at the tail end of the ballot, skipped the delegate voting altogether. (The total vote cast for delegates was about one-third less than the total vote cast and written in for Presidential candidates.) Thus eighty-four of the 108 elected delegates are, like the appointed delegates at large, mostly guaranteed organization folks: county chairmen, vice chairmen, committeemen, committee-women, county and state job holders, and so forth. Some of them at primary time may have been inclined toward Kennedy. Twelve, at any rate, according to McCarthy's state campaign committee, have promised to support the Minnesota Senator at convention, and the committee hopes to persuade about nine more to do the same before the first nominating ballot is taken on August 26. Even if this optimistic prediction is realized, it will still leave Humphrey with more than two-thirds of the delegate votes from a state where McCarthy—figuring votes conveniently uncounted and write-ins at the Republican primary—probably was the Presidential choice of more than a half million Pennsylvanians.

Of course there is always the possibility that something will happen to change or upset the present calculations of those in charge of the Democratic Party of Pennsylvania. But it appears now that even the danger of losing the state to the Republicans in November—which would mean that one autocratic political organization had triumphed over another—seems less frightening a prospect to the Democratic professionals than losing the party organization to the fresh and energetic people who would become deeply involved if McCarthy were the candidate. My guess is that, rather than support or vote for Humphrey, such people will join the more than 2 million eligible Pennsylvania voters who are unregistered in any party—a bloc equal to the registered voters of each major political party. This strikes me as the most significant political fact in Pennsylvania. This and the July polls, showing that George Wallace's potential Pennsylvania vote in November has climbed to 16 per cent of the estimated total—and is still climbing.

STUDENTS OF NEW PALTZ

A Nice Little Revolution

WADE THOMPSON

Mr. Thompson is the author of Egghead's Guide to America. He teaches English at the State University of New York at New Paltz.

New Paltz, N.Y., is an ancient and tiny community (3,000) nestled in the mid-Hudson valley, halfway between Albany and New York City, just beyond the range of commuters to either city. Its chief attraction consists of a number of old stone houses built by early Huguenot settlers, and its chief desire in life is to retain a kind of old-stone attitude toward everything beyond its town limits. Right in the center of this quaint community there is a huge branch of the State University of New York—so huge indeed that whenever school is in session, the population is more than doubled. Many of the students come from the hippie and yippie sections of New York City, and have learned to wear tribal costumes which quite bedazzle the burghers of New Paltz. The burghers, in turn, wear tribal costumes which quite bedazzle the students.

This, then, is the improbable setting for a revolution—college style, 1968—which took place during the past school year. It didn't quite match Columbia's in convulsiveness, nor the Sorbonne's in profundity but it came close. It began, naturally, with the war in Vietnam. From the very outset of the school year, it was apparent that hundreds of students were failing to see any point to the war, and some of them were getting downright nasty about the matter. In order to explain the benefits of the war to the students, the local Congressman, Joseph Y. Resnick, agreed to engage in public debate with Dave Dellinger, editor of Liberation and eloquent spokesman for peace. Congressman Resnick had been to South Vietnam, where he had noticed several things that had escaped other visitors. He had noticed, for example, that the military picture was splendid, that our fighting men were happy and raring to go, that General Westmoreland had a realistic grip on the situation, and that it would take only another year to get the whole job mopped up. "We are winning this war and winning it big," he announced joyously—to the most incredulous audience I'm sure he had ever seen.

I don't propose to go into bloody and unpleasant detail. Suffice it to say that Congressman Resnick departed New Paltz abruptly, and hasn't been seen here since. Nobody expects him, either. Every time he's asked what happened in New Paltz, he can only sputter something about how biased the moderator was. (Resnick has a point here: I was moderator on that occasion, and could not contain myself. Accordingly I have given up moderating for good.) But the latest and best word is that Resnick has given up politics for good.

No sooner had Resnick been routed than the peaceniks decided to take to the streets. You must understand that the streets of New Paltz are not the kind of things you take to lightly. Believe it or not, New Paltz has a Village Ordinance (§538, a) which prohibits any person from participating in any public assembly whatsoever without first getting permission from the town clerk. Never in its 278-year history has a single citizen of this village been known to protest the slightest thing—much less a war—on the sacred streets of New Paltz. And so help me, even today the village attorney is prepared to advise anyone that, if he must protest the war, he should do so on private property where he will not make a public spectacle of himself.

Backed by their ordinance, the village fathers threatened the peaceniks with wholesale arrests if they tried any monkey business. The American Civil Liberties Union valiantly tried to explain to the fathers that there was such a thing as a Constitution, and that even people in New Paltz were supposed to live by it. Hell no, said the fathers. Hell yes, said the ACLU. Finally, on a dark day last November, under an ominous sky, a tense and stealthy band of outcasts—twenty-one in all—gathered at high noon, directly opposite the Huguenot Bank, hoisted their picket signs (saying PEACE NOW), and began a vigil. And down the street about two minutes later came the Mayor of New Paltz himself, leading a contingent of New Paltz's Finest, and all keyed up for the greatest arrest since the last roundup of Redcoats. I was in charge of the demonstrators on that occasion, and I could not believe, until the very last moment, that we would actually be arrested. But damned if we weren't. Not only that, we had to gouge out more than $1,000 for bail. It's like, man, they really crack down on crime in the streets around these parts.

The District Attorney of Ulster County, charged with the task of prosecuting, went almost cross-eyed trying to figure out what to do. A rational man with some grasp of the law, he had conjectured that Village Ordinance (§538, a) might be unconstitutional under a line of Supreme Court cases stretching from here to out of sight. But how explain that to the voters? If you do prosecute you'll surely lose, and if you don't, those damn peaceniks just might sue the village for false arrest. Oh Lord, give me a sign.

Just as the D.A. was scanning the horizon for a sign, the community of New Paltz sustained another terrible jolt. The police on Long Island had staged a middle-of-the-night dope raid on the students of Stony Brook (also a branch of the State University) and had done it with such slam-bang, cloutish melodrama that hackles were raised all over the nation. Immediately, rumors began roaring around New Paltz that we were about to get the same treatment. Lots of students here experiment with drugs—primarily marijuana, if you call that a drug—and the suspicion that the fuzz is about to roust you from bed at 3 o'clock in the morning is paranoia-inducing, to say the least.

Hoping to alleviate the situation, I wrote a mild letter to the student newspaper, in which I said that (a) the raid on Stony Brook was disgraceful; (b) cops are a lot bigger problem than pot, which probably doesn't hurt anybody; (c) laws against pot are unenforceable, the stuff being just too plentiful (bales of it, I said, are available right on Main Street in New Paltz).

As it turned out, no police raid, comparable to the one at Stony Brook, took place in New Paltz. Maybe none had been scheduled; more likely, the police were afraid that, with the students alerted, they would not be able to come up with a respectable amount of contraband. But the blood pressure of the entire mid-Hudson valley rose ominously. Newspapers in Poughkeepsie, Newburgh, Middletown and Kingston began calling for action against that guy who was baling marijuana on Main Street. The village fathers—already apprehensive about their security after that disastrous arrest—first ordered the police department to equip itself with MACE (honestly!), and then wrote to the president of the college demanding that something be done. Hundreds of parents had their worst fears confirmed: college professors do give aid and comfort to the enemy; they do encourage riots in the street, and now dope addiction! The screws on the D.A. were given another powerful twist.

Meanwhile the faculty at New Paltz had become alarmed by something known as the Hershey memorandum—a public directive from Gen. Lewis B. Hershey advising draft boards, in effect, to use the draft as a club against student troublemakers, and to hell with due process. This meant that whenever a military recruiter came on campus, his very presence would place any number of protesting students under a threat of punitive draft reclassification, even if the students were exercising their legal rights. What to do?

The obvious move was to ban all military recruiting on campus until the Hershey memorandum was withdrawn. And to the eternal honor and glory of higher education in

New Paltz, the faculty perceived the obvious. (If you think that doesn't represent progress, you don't know modern academia.) The faculty petitioned for an immediate halt to all military recruiting, and one faculty member even announced publicly that if we didn't stop the recruiting, "this college would not have the moral integrity of an old whore."

Guess what happened? For years this old whore of a college had yielded herself supinely to the depredations of her military-industrial clientele—"servicing the community," she called it. But now old Alma Mater rose, and announced in a quavering voice to an unbelieving mid-Hudson valley audience that she indeed would refuse to service her military clientele as long as they threatened her own true sons.

And for a few days this seemed to be the best college in the best of all possible worlds. But then about a week later, for reasons never explained, the old whore flopped right back into bed. Who knows what pressures were used to get her back? Whatever they were, they worked. When the next recruiters came, they appeared not to notice that the slightest thing had happened. And the sons of Alma Mater wept for shame.

But not for long. Even if we couldn't get the recruiters ousted, we could still do something. Back to the streets. And this time there would be no dillydallying with nutty ordinances or threats of MACE. The streets were just as much ours as anybody's, and we intended to use them. At two o'clock in the afternoon of April 27, the villagers stared aghast to see Sheriff Martin and the whole New Paltz police force politely escorting hundreds—yes, hundreds—of peaceniks up and down the sacred streets of New Paltz. At the head of the parade was this writer carrying an American flag, and behind the flag were dozens of signs—some calling for an end to the war, others calling for black liberation. The revolution was finally getting into gear.

Three weeks later it reached a climax. This time the students—a thousand strong—conducted a sudden uprising that forced the whole State University to reel back as though it had just got hit by a whiff of MACE. Doubtless inspired by their compeers at Columbia and the Sorbonne, as well as by local action, our rebels decided that they had had their fill of shadow democracy. To get their muscles in shape, they decided first to overturn their current student government—a milk-run operation, said "government" having been more or less quislingesque in composition.

Then they went after the big, real-life government. They invaded official meetings. Students at New Paltz actually intruded themselves upon meetings that were duly convened to deliberate upon official college policies! They did so, not quite obstreperously, but yet not so demurely that they could be dismissed. They demanded a voice. And they demanded it in such a way as to convey the unmistakable message that if they didn't get it, they would have to be dispersed by force.

Surprisingly enough, the strategy worked (very much aided, incidentally, by a hunger strike on the part of one Roger Knapp). It didn't work perfectly because, for one thing, there was no concrete symbol (like Columbia's gymnasium) that everybody could point to and say "shame, shame." For another thing, the students had waited too long before starting their action; the school year was almost over. (Much as I sympathized with them, I advised against anything extralegal: there was no time, and too much danger of losing everything.) On the whole, though, the uprising accomplished quite a bit. The State University conceded the big point: henceforth the students at New Paltz shall have a major voice in the policy decisions of the college—including the hiring and firing of faculty. Not bad for a minor revolution. And in a couple of weeks, the students will be back, with who knows what further surprises for the burghers of New Paltz?

HARRY GOLDEN

MY father came from the little town of Mikulinca in Galitzia, a province in the old Austro-Hungarian Empire, now Poland. After emigrating to America—and until the advent of Hitler—he never lost touch with the relatives he left behind. He wrote them with a punctuality Emily Post would have admired.

When he forgot the addresses, he used to describe the location of the house. "Four streets in from the river, two houses up from the police station." (One of the ways I came to realize that there was a relationship between different languages was by guessing that Polizei meant police.) Not one of those letters ever went astray. Nor did either my father or his correspondents dream they ever would. Mail had a sanctity.

Veteran postal workers remember when Italian immigrants used to send home gold. These workmen would purchase gold dust or ingots, the weight and destination revealing the contents. The Italians sent gold to Genoa or Palermo where it was banked for their retirement. I suspect Mussolini put a fast end to these dreams, though the packages unfailingly reached their destination.

But now I read in this age of jets and superservice that we are not to get properly addressed, innocent letters and bills. Congress is balking at the appropriation the Postmaster General has requested. As a consequence, Marvin Watson, who runs the postal system, has ordered 347 small stations to close up, and has informed the tenants of new building complexes that they will have to pick their mail up at the post office. There will be no deliveries for any of us on Saturday and for a great many of us no deliveries on Friday either.

This government will subsidize everything except the letter. The South is virtually a federal preserve with the money that flows in for the soil bank, for the dairyman, for the peanut farmer, for the cotton grower. A man who owns an oil well is excused from taxation by way of the oil depletion allowance. But our elected representatives are chary about appropriating the money so that we can get our mail.

Frenchmen enjoy four mail deliveries a day. Not to get his daily mail is inconceivable to a Romanian. Disturbed cynics the world over write to the editor or the deputy or the commissar. Getting a letter is a kind of minor Christmas for the folks. It is true that bills also come in the mail, but the really bad news invariably arrives by telephone or telegraph.

The tragic aspect to the whole situation can be summed up by reminding the constituency that some of the towns that will have to surrender their post offices are Adamant, Vt.; New Russia, N.Y.; Seven Mills Ford, Va.; and Nine-points, Pa. Think of the postmarks that have surprised and delighted people the world over during the many years when the United States had what might be called a postal service.

Guns, Congress and the Networks

MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

Mrs. Christopher is radio and television editor of Advertising Age.

Some of the best admen in the country have been putting their skills to work on a radio-TV-press campaign to stir up the public support needed to force a meaningful gun-control law out of Congress this session. These image makers, adroit at consumer persuasion, are having much less success convincing Congressmen that the United States needs a strong national firearms law or inducing the TV networks to sell them time.

All the polls, particularly those taken after this country's two 1968 assassinations, indicate that Americans by a large percentage want gun legislation, but Congress continues to talk of the citizen's constitutional right to arm himself, and is acutely aware of the sportsman's paranoia about having his rifle taken from him and of the danger of passing legislation in a time of high emotion.

Nor has the public outcry for closer supervision of guns much impressed the television networks. The broadcasters, operating "publicly owned" air waves, have been criticized for their willingness to make instant celebrities out of such raucous figures as Stokely Carmichael and Rap Brown. They have been less eager to give a platform to spaceman John Glenn, the official spokesman for the Emergency Committee for Gun Control. This committee was organized by a group of prominent citizens, who think 6,500 gun killings a year are too many.

In New York, the firm of Papert, Koenig, Lois, which handles Piel's beer, Dash detergent and National Airlines, and which was the agency for Robert Kennedy's campaign in the primaries, is coordinating the drive for the emergency committee on a volunteer, public-service basis. The Columbia Broadcasting System, American Broadcasting Company, and the National Broadcasting Company have all turned down Papert's order for five minutes of paid time during which Colonel Glenn would present the case for gun control to the American people.

C.B.S. told the agency it does not sell time for controversial issues. A.B.C., which feared the National Rifle Association might ask for equal time, held that the topic had already been covered adequately in talk and news shows. N.B.C. said it wouldn't sell less than fifteen minutes for a program of this nature. All the chains have taken similar positions before on matters of bitter controversy.

Papert, Koenig, Lois has been disappointed by the sparsity of free public-service spots devoted to the campaign by radio and TV. Nor have newspapers been liberal with free space. But the agency has had no trouble buying space in the press. Full pages have run or will run in The New York Times, The Washington Post, and in papers in Indiana, Missouri and Nebraska. Messages in the last three states are aimed at three of the most outspoken opponents of gun legislation—Sens. Roman Hruska, Edward Long and Birch Bayh. "You say you want stronger gun-control laws, but have you said it to Senator Bayh?" one headline asked.

As the lines of opposition hardened in Congress, the ads became more belligerent. On a day the House debated the Administration bill with its 100 amendments, a Washington Post ad signed by students warned of retaliation at the polls. "It's not now or never. It's now or November." Congressmen may have read it, but they weren't moved. The vote against licensing guns was by a 2-to-1 margin. The outlook is equally gloomy in the Senate where a strong Tydings bill was emasculated by amendments in committee. Nothing is hoped for now—except possibly the extension of the mail-order sales ban to cover long guns.

Part of the impetus for the use of advertising skills to help reduce the gun slaughter comes from Advertising Age, the biggest journal in the field, which has never before taken a position of leadership in an area outside advertising and merchandising. The paper obviously feels that domestic peace is essential to business health, and has called on the media of the country to join an all-out effort to make Congress act.

The newspaper has served as a clearinghouse for hard-hitting, shock-approach ads prepared by four volunteers from North Advertising in Chicago. Most of the ads include this tag line: "Write your Senator . . . while you still have a Senator." More than 500 requests for the ads have come in from newspapers, radio stations, business papers, company house sheets, newsletters, universities and outdoor poster companies. Among the magazines expected to run some of the ads are Ladies' Home Journal, Coronet, Teen Screen and Catholic Transcript.

No backing came from the richest trade group in the field—The American Association of Advertising Agencies. Its president, John Crichton, said the organization had no official policy on guns and there were "other parts of the problem of violence where agencies might be more effective." Howard Bell, the new president of the American Advertising Federation, a grass-roots group with 40,000 members, urged ad clubs throughout the country to support the drive and individual members to write their Congressmen.

In a related development, the TV networks, their major sponsors and their ad agencies have been consulting one another on the matter of excessive violence on TV. When violence and slam-bang action comes under heavy criticism from Washington or elsewhere, telecasters perforce agree that there has been a heady dose of this type of fare, but they always insist that no one has proved any relationship between violence on the home screen and the increasing unrest in the streets, particularly among the young.

The first tangible evidence of their new concern was the rescheduling of shows considered unsuitable for viewing in the raw-nerved days following the murder of a murdered President's brother. A.B.C. postponed two assassination stories—one on the Flying Nun and the other on Big Valley—and an "unusually violent" episode of The Avengers. C.B.S. switched episodes of Wild, Wild West, Gunsmoke and Cimarron Strip, as did N.B.C. with Get Smart, Mothers-In-Law, Tarzan, Bonanza, High Chaparral and The Champions.

Advertisers advised their agencies to check scripts more closely for unnecessary physical violence and some scripts were revamped. In no case, however, did any advertiser attempt to cancel contracts for the blood-and-breakage strips set for fall; nor did the networks drop any of the violent series from their 1968-69 line-up. Hard-hitting action is still the single biggest ingredient in the new season's pot—with almost half the offerings at A.B.C. and N.B.C. falling into the crime-spy-space-Western-action-adventure category. Titles are not available for the seven weekly feature movies, but some of them are sure to develop violent conflict.

Long before the deaths of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Senator Kennedy, many parents and video critics had protested the knock-'em, sock-'em Saturday morning network cartoon strips. Come fall, all the networks promise to move toward lighter stories stressing "more positive aspects of behavior," as one source put it. Off the network screen—but probably into local syndication—will go such combative heroes as Atom Ant, Secret Squirrel and Cool McCool, the secret agent.

Network censors are cracking down on shooting in commercials. Three of four gun close-up scenes were taken out of a Master Lock Company spot on C.B.S.-TV's Ed

Picha—The Special, Belgium

Sullivan show. In the one that was retained, the original film showed a gun being fired toward the screen and talked about the owner of the .45-caliber pistol. In the approved version, the gun fires into the lock to demonstrate how well it holds up under such a blast.

Faced with the growing tendency to associate television with the general American unrest, the National Association of Broadcasters, through its board, passed a resolution defending TV's handling of the riots: "Along with all media, TV must continue to present the world as it is, not as we might like it to be." The board reaffirmed its stated code policy against the "depiction of violence as a means to dramatic effect for family viewing," and ordered the code authority to intensify its surveillance of dramatic program content.

This order had a meaningless ring. The code authority, with its small staff, has traditionally confined its scrutiny primarily to commercials. It never has had and does not now have a procedure for pre-screening entertainment programs. When a former code director, who was concerned by the amount of blatant sex and violence on TV—particularly on some feature movies which were made for theatres—sought to check shows in advance, two of the three networks refused to cooperate with the boss of the industry group to which they all subscribe. If the mood of violence in time subsidies, TV will be able to take little credit for the improved atmosphere.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Brecht vs. Brecht: His Reception in Poland

ANDRZEJ WIŃNII

Mr. Wirth is a Polish drama critic, currently visiting professor in the Drama Department of Stanford University. One of his books is The Structure of Brecht's Plays (in Polish).

An analysis of the reception of the work of Bertolt Brecht in the East and West reveals a paradoxical situation. For the West, Brecht's political views were questionable—his literary originality, on the other hand, fascinating. For the East, Brecht's aesthetics were questionable; while his ideology and political reputation could be more easily accepted, though not without some reservation. That Brecht was accepted at all, however, filled a gap between Western and Eastern intellectuals. With the help of Brecht, the East examined the concepts of social realism and formalism, and the West understood that political commitment can also have an aesthetic advantage, paving the way for the recognition of such writers as Rolf Hochhuth and Peter Weiss.

Shortly before his death Brecht complained that in East Germany his plays were presented almost exclusively on his Berliner Ensemble stage. This was not true for Poland where even plays not yet performed in East Germany had been produced—including the world premiere of his play Schweik in the Second World War. In Poland Brecht soon became an integrated element of the national culture. But first he had been made fit for "domestic use."

The Polish theatre encountered Brecht in 1952, during the peak of the Stalinist period when the Berliner Ensemble visited Warsaw with three plays. These were Mother Courage, The Mother and Kleist's The Broken Pitcher. For the Polish theatre, which had become paralyzed by the use of Stanislavski's naturalistic doctrines, this visit was a revelation: within the framework of officially accepted art, greater possibilities seemed to exist. The visit provoked a heated discussion of Brecht's work, with the official criticism taking a strong stand against him, designating him an expressionist-symbolist-pacifist. There was no need to strive for a precise definition of these concepts; they were considered interchangeable invectives. "Suspicious" aspects of his work were denounced immediately as so-called "formalism," although the function of these formal elements in Brecht's plays weren't understood.

A few critics courageously interceded for Brecht, recognizing from the very beginning that he would have a shattering effect on the too narrowly confined aesthetic rules of the Zhdanov poetics. These people, however, had no influence on the centrally controlled cultural policy. The discussion was officially ended with the edict: Brecht on stage does not represent the art of Socialist realism. It is significant that this criticism "from the Left" remained completely indifferent to the working-class content of Brecht's works. The objective function of the leftist and rightist criticism proved identical! The rightist criticism was prepared to accept Brecht's style, but remained aloof to his social criticism and revolutionary tendencies. The leftist criticism accepted, not without hesitation, Brecht's ideas but not his specific adaptations and style. In both cases Brecht was either neutralized or rejected.

Two years had to pass before it was possible for Brecht's followers in Poland to stage his plays. In 1954 The Caucasian Chalk Circle opened in Cracow. It was, however, still a time when as harmless a sentence of Brecht's as "New plays have new forms," sounded like a provocation.

In the first phase of his reception, 1954-1956, Brecht was used as proof that the contradiction between tendentious and independent thinking could be overcome: a recognition of immense importance for the arts and politics in Poland. At the same time Brechtian theatre became a new form to be mastered in order to undermine the Zhdanov aesthetics.

In these productions—The Caucasian Chalk Circle in Cracow, Puntilla and his Servant Matti in Gdingen, and The Good Woman of Seizuan, Schweik in the Second World War, and Fear and Misery of the Third Reich in Warsaw—the most important factor was the mastery of the new method of acting. However, dominating the form also brought about a recognition of new problems with regard to content, calling for an expansion of the tightly laid down aesthetic rules of Socialist realism. The dilemma became apparent: how to arrive at one's own mode of expression within the strict framework of Brecht's aesthetic orthodoxy?

The dilemma was solved very well in Cracow. The director, Irene Babel, strove for mastery of the alienation-effect method of acting. The set designer, however, ignored the directions of the model for a stylized Georgian milieu, transferred the action of the play to the Polish Tatras Mountains, and furnished it with motifs from the local folklore. Thus the action no longer took place in Caucasia but somewhere in the vicinity of Cracow in legendary times. Here we have an example for an imaginative interpretation of the model, which still left the interpreter freedom for his original expression. Brecht afterward deemed this extension of the model legitimate.

Brecht's concept of indirect didacticism was also new to the Polish stage. Didacticism in the Zhdanov form of Socialist realism used the direct method, demonstrated the conclusions of a thinking process, and considered the audience to be passive consumers of the teaching. Brecht's methodology directly contradicted Zhdanov's realism and in this the Polish theatre found hope. Brecht saved the Polish theatre from ideological and artistic paralysis. Without meaning to, he played the role of a Trojan horse which Poland knew how to use in the fight against the rigid rules of Zhdanov realism.

The second phase of Brecht's reception beginning in 1956 was a period of spontaneous reception of Western art. Brecht was no longer the only representative of innovation in the theatre. Since this was a time of re-evaluation of the compulsory values of Stalinism and a time in which the masses were able to openly express discontent, Brecht's plays became a score (in the musical sense) for the attitudes of the day. Long restrained dissatisfactions sought possibilities of expression in various art forms, including the theatre, where if no new texts were available, existing works were employed to express political tensions.

In Wrocław (Breslau) Jakob Rotbaum's production of The Threepenny Opera sharpened the social criticism of the play by using The Threepenny Novel as a quasi-commentary for the opera. This procedure weakened the satiric-parodistic character of the opera, and shifted the accent from the typical to the individual. But the reception to the performance proved that the fanatic and stern Peachum, and the clever specialist for legal murder, Macheath, were no longer considered historical figures. The song in the finale ("Erst kommt das Fressen, dann kommt die Moral," translated in the Blitzstein version as "First Feed the Face, then Talk Right and Wrong") sounded like an attack on the official morality of Stalinism. (Peachum, whose Protestant psychology was difficult to understand in a country with a Catholic tradition, was interpreted as a Stalinist ideologist.) The subject of criticism was the pragmatic humanitarianism of these times, in which a popular official slogan proclaimed: "Fight tuberculosis, since it delays the realization of our Five Year Plan."

In Poznan The Baden Didactic Piece of Acquiescence was understood as a commentary on a current discussion about the social costs of the revolution. The official censorship, perhaps rightly considering the difficulties in the meat market of that time, was worried about the sentence: "Our planes fly 150 [sic] kilometers an hour, but bread isn't any cheaper for it." The ideological reinterpretation reached a pinnacle: a play demanding a revolution was dangerous for the completed revolution. Brecht obviously hadn't anticipated this effect.

In this period, Brecht was played on almost every Polish stage and became one of the most performed authors, second only to Shakespeare. The center of Brechtian theatre was the Dramatic Theatre (Teatr Dramatyczny) in Warsaw, which defined and coined their own style of acting on the basis of Brecht's texts, and provided the model productions for other Polish stages.

The final phase in Brecht's reception began in 1959; it still prevails today and is probably the most interesting one. We could call this time in the words of the Polish poet Rozewicz "our little stabilization." In this period Brechtian theatre is no longer understood as a formal model (which had already been mastered), nor as a score for social criticism. In the time of "our little stabilization" Brecht emerged as a new classical writer. Brecht's thinking had become universal, his art of acting mastered. Brecht was now being interpreted from the viewpoint of individual experience. Brecht had gained universal value but within the framework of Polish culture. One began to read his texts as open texts without bearing in mind Brecht's own orthodox interpretation. It is striking that Brecht's influence is almost completely limited to production techniques and that he has left no traces on modern Polish playwriting.

In his essay Einschüchterung durch die Klassizität (Intimidation through a Classicist Attitude) Brecht encouraged directors to adjust the classics to the experience of their own times. He himself offered examples of ruthless adjustments

NIGHT LETTER

Dear ancient liberal:
how remote you are by my side at night.

Too worn to rage against a war,
you lie so huddled in your dreaming,
as if you made revisions in your heart
you do not wish me or your self to fathom.

Yet when I think of our lives tonight, falling in rings of applied light,

our own dark wet walks for peace,
the children gone, the phones quiet, this weird release,
the sun embalmed on their empty beds,
our meals brief (complaining to the cat instead);

I'm not unhappy in my reticence, or in the distances we've learned to keep.

Hell, that's always love: one sleeping,
and one awake forever.

MARTHA FRIEDBERG

of classic writers with his adaptations of Antigone, Lenz's Hofmeister, and Coriolan. On the other hand, he demanded an orthodox interpretation of his own pieces.

Brecht's work became of aesthetic, no longer of didactic value—another danger which Brecht hadn't anticipated. He had wanted above all to instruct, to propagate a new if not a completely pretty concept of the world. In Poland today one speaks of Brecht as of a Shakespeare: Mother Courage is analyzed as The Merchant of Venice would be. One no longer discusses his concept of the world: this concept appears today simply Brechtian, exactly as Shakespeare's world appears Shakespearean. Arturo Ui and Mother Courage are great roles for great actors, whose right it is to express their own national experience.

The new trend culminated in two important productions in 1962: the Warsaw productions of Arturo Ui in the Contemporary Theatre (Teatr Współczesny) under Erwin Axer's direction, and Mother Courage in the National Theatre (Teatr Narodowy).

A comparison between Helene Weigel as Mother Courage and Irene Eichler in the same role leads to an interesting confrontation. Irene Eichler tries to interpret Brecht from the Polish point of view. She is not the war hyena of Brecht's intention, and as played by Weigel but an indestructible saleswoman, as in the poem of the Polish poet Tuwim. In the moon landscape of the totally annihilated Warsaw this figure appears first in his poem on the ruins of the city, void of people, with the absurd cry: "Come to tea! Come to tea!" Irene Eichler is acting contrary to the text in interpreting the canteen woman as a positive figure. At the same time, however, she is acting with—not against Brecht—in that she is an allusion to figures in other Brecht plays, to Schweik, Matti, Azdak, Galy Gay and to Baal's vitality.

Like Herr Keuner, the anti-heroic hero of Brecht's aphorisms, Eichler's Mother Courage decides to survive violence and the war with her children. She decides to survive on the smallest scale of a folk-hero who has been overcome by superior power. She is a black-market dealer, but she feels like a folk heroine. She appeals to the specific experience of the last occupation of Poland, the time in which smuggling food was punished by death, and chooses the heroism of dealing on the black market as a method of survival, thus playing a positive figure, that of a folk heroine in a time of violence.

Were the limits of the freedom of interpretation exceeded? Is such an interpretation only possible on the basis of another text? That was the main problem which was discussed in Poland in 1962 when the Berliner Ensemble presented their second guest performance after an absence of ten years.

That discussion resulted in the view that one must arrive at the same conclusions about Brecht at which he himself arrived in viewing the classics. Brecht had made intimidation by the classics appear ridiculous; he had called for changing the function of the classics in accordance with the times. Why should Brecht be spared the fate that the classic writers from Shakespeare to Schiller and Lenz experienced? The new criticism of Brecht resulted paradoxically from the confrontation of Brecht with Brecht.

Commentary is one of the world's great magazines.

But you can have it for nothing.

No strings attached. Just an invitation to accept the current issue of Commentary free of charge.

We're betting that the one issue will be enough to hook you. If it does you'll be joining a small, but elite group of people who regard Commentary as one of the world's great magazines.

Our readers would just about fill Yankee Stadium. But what an extraordinary group it would be. They'd range politically from Dwight Macdonald (who calls Commentary the best magazine for any purpose) to Clare Boothe Luce (who calls it the only literature magazine published in America).

An impressive delegation from Washington would be there too—ranging from occupants of the White House to some of the most severe critics on Capitol Hill.

A brilliant array of intellectuals would be in the crowd and here too the range would be wide—from, for instance, William F. Buckley, Jr. to Paul Goodman.

Our Aim Is Not To Please

Commentary is a magazine of opinion concerned with everything of interest to people of intellect, taste and curiosity. Its aim is to clarify issues, challenge oversimplifications, discourage polarizations, encourage original thinking, and spark honest debate.

Obviously, to earn the high regard of so many highly regarded people it had better be challenging, literate, and unafraid of controversy. Commentary is. It must avoid platitudes and pat answers.

Commentary does. Its contributors must be among the most lucid and pertinent experts anywhere. They are.

In any issue you might find Michael Harrington, Daniel P. Moynihan, or Bayard Rustin exploring serious problems of the moment.

Or contemporary historians like Theodore Draper, George Lichtheim, and Robert L. Heilbroner going below the surface of urgent questions and setting them in an illuminating long-range perspective.

Or such penetrating literary critics as Edmund Wilson, Lionel Trilling, and Leslie A. Fiedler. Jack Richardson, one of America's foremost younger playwrights, reviews the theater for us. America's most important fiction writers have appeared in our pages: Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud, Philip Roth, James Baldwin among them.

Commentary's excellence has not gone unnoticed by educators. Reprints from it are used as texts on university campuses from coast to coast.

We'll Give You A Good Argument

Commentary is probably the only magazine in the world that has sparked the formation of discussion groups: over one hundred from Manhattan, New York to Manhattan, Kansas and on to San Francisco, too.

Groups interested in current affairs get together each month to discuss the contents of our magazine. Although these groups began spontaneously, we can recognize a good thing when we see it. Now we provide a monthly discussion guide for any group interested in using Commentary magazine's thought-provoking articles to start arguments.

Commentary was initiated two decades ago by the American Jewish Committee to make a significant contribution to serious publishing in America. It is published by the Committee. But, now as then, it does not serve any parochial interest, nor does it seek to advance anyone's special line. Commentary was ecumenical long before Vatican II, and remains. The New York Times describes it, "an exciting and important forum for coherent ideas about the whole American culture."

You Have Nothing To Lose

Commentary is not a magazine for everyone. It has something special that not everyone appreciates. That's why we are making this unusual "see-for-yourself" offer.

A year's subscription, 12 monthly issues, costs $9. ($12 at the newsstands.) A 7-month subscription costs $5.50. There are no cut rates, no gift rates, no special renewal rates. However, we would like you to see for yourself why Commentary is regarded as essential reading, and we will send you your first copy free.

If the first issue is everything we say it is and you want to continue getting it, do nothing. We'll start your subscription with the second issue you receive. If you decide Commentary is not for you after reading the first issue, tell us. We'll refund your money in full.

You have nothing to lose and a great magazine to gain. And if we ever get our readers together at Yankee Stadium, we'll reserve a seat for you.

Commentary Magazine
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022

NA-1

Gentlemen:

I accept your challenge and your offer. Send me the current issue of Commentary free, and enter my subscription. If I decide that Commentary is not for me, I'll let you know and you'll cancel my subscription and reimburse me in full, plus a quarter for my postage, time, and trouble.

☐ 7 months $5.50 ☐ 3 years $24.00 ☐ Check attached
☐ 12 months $9.00 ☐ 5 years $35.00 ☐ Please bill me
(Outside U.S.A. add $1.50 per year)

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Zip _____

Today we do not have one Brecht but many different Brechts. There is Vilar's French Ui, Lomnicki's Polish Ui and Schall's German model of Ui. There is a French Mother Courage played by Montero, the Polish Mother Courage by Eichler, and the model Mother Courage of Weigel. The universal character of Brechtian art finds expression in the multiplicity of the various national interpretations.

Only yesterday, Brecht was for the philosopher presenting an ideological proposal for the art of socialism; today he has become a dramatist. Not for the first time has the theatre proved itself capable of living longer than the ideology of an author.

Revolution of Merit

THE ACADEMIC REVOLUTION. By Christopher Jencks and David Riesman. Doubleday & Co. 580 pp. $10.

ALLEN LACY

Mr. Lacy teaches philosophy at Kirkland College, a new women's college coordinate with Hamilton College.

In The Academic Revolution Christopher Jencks and David Riesman have undertaken the enormous task of writing a historical and sociological analysis of American higher education. On most counts, they have succeeded in their undertaking. The Academic Revolution is a delightful book, observant, richly detailed, and larded with grace and wit. It is also an important book, one which will probably shape for years to come both the academy's consciousness of itself and the larger society's understanding of its educational institutions.

As Jencks and Riesman describe it, the present educational establishment in America is, in its higher reaches at least, the product of a successful and fortunate revolution. The value-preferences of the great universities (and of their sublimary colleges) are meritocratic. Local and parochial concerns; traditional eccentricities inherited by particular institutions; accidents of geography, sex, religion, ethnicity and social class—all these things Jencks and Riesman see as subordinate to one overriding purpose: identifying, admitting, and eventually certifying students of potential achievement. The universities see themselves as gateways to success and prestige, and since their self-image is accepted fairly uncritically by the general population, it becomes an authentic fact.

It was not always thus. In an earlier day, institutions of higher learning worshiped other gods than the gods of merit and ability. The early college in America was largely a pillar (more decorative than functional) of society at large. With the Jacksonian era, colleges proliferated recklessly as instruments of various special-interest groups, thus expressing developing subcultures within American life, and serving their values, whether local, religious or ethnic. A college professor was not, until fairly recent times, a man with "a mission transcending the college where he happened to teach"; he was, rather, an employee of a local shop, whose values he was himself fairly likely to espouse. Furthermore, during the first 100 years of our existence, higher education had very little influence on national life. "Colleges probably played a far smaller role in nineteenth-century America and did far less to define people's attitudes toward themselves or one another than nineteenth-century churches did. . . . Taken as a group the nineteenth-century colleges portrayed in institutional histories strike us as depressing and sterile places."

In their account, Jencks and Riesman identify the American graduate school, from the late 19th century on, as the subverter of the earlier order. Educational institutions change because they fail to attract only those students and faculty who are entirely committed to the institution's goals . . . or who at least are content to leave these goals unexamined and unchallenged. But with the development of the university graduate school, primarily from the 1890s onward, a powerful force making for change on many campuses was comprised of faculty trained at Chicago or Columbia or Johns Hopkins, and nursing none too secret notions of remaking their employer in the image of one of these national institutions. Furthermore, as graduate school became increasingly the ambition of many undergraduates, a number of undergraduate colleges became transformed into what The Academic Revolution calls "university colleges," colleges such as Oberlin and Amherst, "de facto prep schools for a small number of graduate professional schools." Thus even though much of the educational framework of earlier years was preserved, its substance was changed from within by agents (often agents unaware) of the meritocratic values of the graduate schools.

The "revolution" of which the authors speak is the transformation of older special-interest institutions as a result of forces flowing from the graduate professional schools. To this transformation Jencks and Riesman trace much that is good in American higher education. College faculties today, even undergraduate faculties, are far superior to their predecessors in both training and interest. "Today's BA's know more," they write, "than their predecessors in any earlier era." They are better prepared when they enter, and they learn more during their undergraduate days, in part because the tone of academic life is increasingly set by those students who desire to prove sufficient academic competence to enter graduate school. Furthermore, there are broad human benefits, as well as strictly academic ones, flowing from the revolution: the emancipation of the young, for one, and great increased social mobility, for another.

Not all of the effects of the revolution, and of the subsequent hegemony of the graduate school, are benign, of course. Riesman and Jencks fault the separation of the scholar's work from his life, the occasional marked inflexibilities of departmental and disciplinary structures of organization, the common neglect of effective pedagogy in favor of sometimes arid scholarship, and the brash colonialism and imperialism of graduate schools toward the undergraduate colleges in their own universities, to name several of their criticisms. Still, they are on the whole confident of the system, and they believe that its more grievous failures can be remedied by minor tinkering—by instituting, for example, postgraduate internships in teaching, and by setting up programs whereby students can be encouraged to take their undergraduate and graduate training in different fields, through an intermediate year of study between the A.B. and the professional degree.

In almost every way, The Academic Revolution is a valuable reference for the development of American society in the 20th century. The chapters on Roman Catholic colleges and Negro colleges alone are sufficient to establish the book's importance. If read with Riesman's earlier Constraint and Variety in American Education, it provides a good basis for comprehending the transition from the 1950s to the 1960s. (Many of the themes developed in the later book are present in the earlier, even if the ambience is strikingly different: Constraint and Variety was written in 1956, when academic prophets were bewailing the passivity and conformity of college undergraduates, their uncritical willingness to accept their parents' goals for themselves and to substitute the cultivation of personal relationships for social and political concerns.)

One may question, however, the complete adequacy of The Academic Revolution as a handbook for the present moment. It may well be that the immediate future development of the American university will be discontinuous with much of the past. Riots are neither panty raids nor pep rallies, but there is very little in this book about the present turmoil on American campuses . . . for obvious reasons: one must, after all, stop writing a book at some point in order to send it to the printer. In fact, except for occasional comments near the ends of chapters, there is very little reflection on events since Berkeley.

It is very clear, in any case, that once the students have ransacked the president's files, smoked his cigars and drunk his sherry, things can never quite be the same again. Jencks and Riesman view the university from a rather confident stance: to read their book in one sitting is rather like reading all the back issues of the Bulletin of the American Association of University Professors for the past ten years. But the most formative force in American education today is probably not the AAUP but SDS, even if indirectly. Recently, a high official in one of our largest state universities told a group of faculty that the single question on his mind was what he should do when his office was occupied by 1,300 bearded revolutionaries. His concern, so alien to the 1950s, is not today pointless. (And just recently, a friend, teaching in a small teachers' college in rural Virginia, told me that his president believed that "the next Columbia will take place in my office." His concern, of course, is unwarranted, since the school in question is rather near the end of the academic procession, attracts uniformly docile young ladies of minimal revolutionary skills, and is thus no doubt near the bottom of whatever list SDS may keep of possible candidates for confrontation. Still his opinion is instructive, and his unfounded fear indicates that there are elements in the present academic situation in need of more examination than they receive from Jencks and Riesman.)

A Blast at Everyone

THE RICH AND THE SUPER-RICH.
By Ferdinand Lundberg, Lyle Stuart.
812 pp. $12.50.

G. WILLIAM DOMHOFF

Mr. Domhoff teaches at the University of California, Santa Cruz. He is the author of Who Rules America? (Prentice-Hall), co-editor and contributor to C. Wright Mills and The Power Elite (Beacon Press), and is at present working on a book of essays to be published by Random House on the American power structure.

As a researcher who has just written a book that covers the same ground and comes to much the same conclusion (but who still learned a lot from this one), and as a reader who enjoys in others bombast, sarcasm and polemic, I very much liked Ferdinand Lundberg's belated second book on America's big rich, and I heartily recommend it to anyone with the time, patience and disposition to make it through 812 pages of raw data, biting humor and purple prose. For those lacking one of these requisites, the first and last chapters will suffice: the book could have been shorter and better organized.

After an unforgetable thirty-year absence from the topic (during which time he could have been fighting the good fight for the views put forth in his America's Sixty Families in 1937), Lundberg has reappeared with a vengeance. Now he not only rakes the big rich over the coals; he also takes out after C. Wright Mills (who was a little unfair to Lundberg in a footnote), Marxists (who love Russia and the masses too uncritically and blame too much on capitalism), academics (who are innocents and apologists, feeding from foundation troughs), and the stupid masses (the suckers, the boobs, the dependent, the handicapped).

The thesis is that the control of this country lies in the hands of a few hundred thousand wealthy families, probably with the 200,000 households (.2 per cent of the total) who hold 22 per cent of the wealth. Lundberg laughs at the "managerial revolution" thesis, piling data upon data and example upon example to show that the big stockholders still control the corporations even if they do not always run them. As for political control, that is accomplished through campaign donations, gifts by lobbyists, and by paying fat retainer fees to the law firms of Congressmen. (Lundberg here relies on journalists and says nasty things about political scientists.)

Mr. Lundberg does not insist that the corporate rich be called a ruling class, even though in one place or another he emphasizes intermarriage, private school attendance, club memberships, a plushy life style and a different psychology (they think they are better than we are) as concomitants of their great wealth. While he finds them generally objectionable as a group, they are not all bad: some are even clever.

But it is not primarily their cleverness that leads to their rulership—they actually rule by default because the masses are too dumb to act in their self-interest. The cleverness of the rich consists in good measure of the ineptitude of the

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

Vol. XII, No. 3 SUMMER 1960

HERBERT WEISINGER

The Proper Study of Myth

HANS NATHAN

a translation of
About Musical Interpretation
by Alfredo Casella

HARRY BERGER, JR.

Ecology of the Medieval Imagination:
An Introductory Overview

WAYNE DODD

Tragedy and the Mortal Condition

WILLIAM WASSERSTROM

Cagey John: Berryman as Medicine Man

Subscription Rates:

$1.00 for single copies
$3.00 a year (4 issues)
$5.00 for two years

Available at bookstores or from

110 Morrill Hall
Michigan State University
East Lansing, Michigan 48823

masses. We are so dependent and handicapped that we don't even deserve the vote, Lundberg throws up his hands in dismay: "What can one do for people who believe their true friends are characters like the Reverend Billy Graham, Norman Vincent Peale, Archbishop Fulton Sheen, and Francis Cardinal Spellman?"

For those who are not satisfied with mere description the book contains a detailed indictment of the corporate rich and their feudal system, although it loses a little something by being scattered throughout. Then too, the book's occasional overstatement and hyperbole may allow apologists to call it "unbalanced."

In general, the corporate rich and their corporations fit Edwin Sutherland's definition of habitual criminals, mostly for conspiracy and fraud in business, even to the point of using "mouthpieces" to get off the hook; they have made a joke of the tax structure, putting the burden of their state on the backs of the people; they use their so-called charitable foundations illegally for business purposes and for self-serving projects; they do all sorts of shady things in their dealings with government and politicians; and they use their economic resources for selfish and superficial ends "rather than in socially and humanly needed public directions."

However, since in this space I can't say the many things I'd like to about Lundberg's huge book, my comments will have to be unduly selective:

(1) He has titillated the believers and perhaps shocked the innocents, but he probably has not won us any new converts from among the skeptics. This is not merely because of the inevitable minor errors and questionable historical interpretations that they will gleefully pounce upon. It is also because they will want more discussion of the "nature" of "power," and more detail on how the corporate rich supposedly control the government. (Analyze a few decisions and show us how they do it.)

Actually, an excellent conceptualization of power is implicit in most of his remarks. In theoretical terms, I think it can be said he usually uses "power" as a "disposition" or "inferential" concept, inferred from certain social indicators—in this case wealth distribution, fancy mansions and the tax structure. Unfortunately, though, he does not always sustain this view, and when he repeatedly says (wrongly, I think) that Harry Truman alone decided to drop the A-bomb, and Lyndon Johnson (with only military advice at best) to escalate the war in Vietnam, he switches to another way of studying power and concedes to his critics the very points they made in rejecting Mills's The Power Elite.

(2) Lundberg sometimes overemphasizes the few really big wealth holders like the Rockefellers at the expense of the corporate rich as a whole. This plays down the importance of "system" that he elsewhere emphasizes. Louis Auchincloss, for example, is not in my opinion a member of the upper middle class but one millionaire member of a multimillionaire family that interlocks with dozens of old, major and very wealthy families of the ruling class, including the "Greenwich" Rockefellers.

(3) Social clubs are not the key places where policies are discussed and a measure of consensus reached. They are one part of a system that includes corporate boards, foundations and a set of institutional links to the government that Lundberg does not discuss—e.g., the Council on Foreign Relations, the Business Advisory Council, The Committee for Economic Development and the Brookings Institution (wherein the corporate rich learn from hired academics and prepare for government service).

(4) I am impressed by Lundberg's data on the influence of specific corporations and industries on certain Congressmen, but I think the Executive branch more important and more directly controlled by the biggest and most farseeing cliques within the corporate rich (who have quite a time with the NAM and other cautious—or isolationist—brethren who have influence in Congress). While in places acknowledging corporate rich appointments to the Executive branch, he downplays its importance and concedes it too much independence from them. I believe the Executive branch is indistinguishable in its decision-making personnel from the corporate boards, foundations, associations and institutes noted above, and that various of these corporate rich organizations are intricately and complexly involved in its functioning.

Two quick examples. Lundberg calls the withholding tax a politician's stroke of genius. In fact, it was thought up by Beardsley Ruml of the Council for Economic Development, discussed and agreed upon within CED, and then taken to the government. Nor is it true that no corporate masterminds helped with the New Deal. They did, and in large part through the Committee on Foreign Relations, the American Association for Labor Legislation, the Twentieth Century Fund and the Business Advisory Council, among others.

What is to be done is the question always asked of such a book. Lundberg has one small hope, that the "new class" of experts and intellectuals, imbued as they are with the secular-scientific spirit, and armed as they are with its methodology and technology, will get tired of the mentality of their rich masters and gradually change the system over the next several decades. For myself, I don't know, but I was struck by the author's earlier quote from an ancient Greek concerning whether it is better to grow rich or wise: "Why rich," he said; "for I see the wise men spending their days at the rich men's doors."

'Quick Watson! The Footnote'

THE ANNOTATED SHERLOCK HOLMES. By Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. Edited, with introduction, notes and bibliography by William S. Baring-Gould. Clarkson N. Potter. 2 boxed vols. 1513 pp. $25.

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak teaches British history at California State College at Hayward. His book, The Making of a Counter Culture, will be published by Doubleday later this year.

There is a story that during the First World War, when the forces of the Entente were in dire need of expert espionage, a French military attaché appealed to Lloyd George—in all seriousness—to call upon the services of Mr. Sherlock Holmes. If there are any around who think this is a somewhat unrealistic proposal, it is no thanks to the gallant band of Sherlockian scholars who, for more than thirty years now, have been doing battle with the incorrigible skepticism which insists that "the best and wisest man who ever lived" was merely a fictitious character.

Since Christopher Morley inaugurated the "Baker Street Irregulars" in 1934, these engaging pedants have exercised themselves tirelessly to demonstrate the historical authenticity of the four novels and fifty-six short stories which they refer to as the Holmesian "canon" (or Conan). They have filled their own learned journals with articles on "Holmes and the Telephone," "The Cab-Rank in Baker Street," "Holmes as a Bee-Keeper" and "The Medical Career and Capacities of Dr. J. H. Watson." (There is even one rather eccentric effort by Rex Stout which attempts to prove that "Watson Was a Woman.")

They have waged heated debates at chapter meetings as to whether the Sixth Duke of Holderness who appears in "The Adventure of the Priory School" was meant to represent the Sixth Duke of Northumberland or the Eighth Duke of Devonshire. (The literature on this point remaining indecisive, there still is room for further research.) They have given us monographs on "The Iconography of Sherlock Holmes" and "Sherlockian Heraldry." They have even provided us with book-length biographies of Holmes and Watson. Under their inspiration, the famous Baker Street sitting room has been preserved in all its cozy detail at the Sherlock Holmes Pub opposite Scotland Yard—along with a library of Holmes's criminological treatises and a small museum of treasures, including the very paw prints of the hound of the Baskervilles, embedded in plaster.

The Annotated Sherlock Holmes is undoubtedly the supreme monument of this antiquarian whimsy. All the stories are there, fully equipped with maps, diagrams, the original pulp magazine engravings, hundreds of photographs of Victorian settings, artifacts, dress and personalities, and copious notes drawing upon the vast body of Holmesiana. Nothing that could be illustrated, elaborated, explained or complicated has been left without its exhaustively conscientious exegesis. The notes review, for example, the nine papers that have been written on Holmes's obscure reference to a Chopin composition in A Study in Scarlet—each coming to a different conclu-

The question is not can America police the empire . . .
the question is: Can America be policed?

LIBERATION NEWS SERVICE

A Special Summer Issue of VIET-REPORT on:

Since 1965 VIET-REPORT has provided far-sighted, in-depth coverage of U.S. attempts to maintain pro-western regimes in an increasingly hostile Third World. In 1968 the problem has shifted: Can domestic America survive the political and racial conflicts which its globalism has helped provoke?

Government agencies and private corporations, social scientists and military planners have begun to invade the ghetto, setting for themselves the task of "conflict management" in America's own underdeveloped "native quarters." Strategies range from token economic incentives, "community development," tax-supported corporate investment, "Model Cities," guaranteed incomes, to outright counterinsurgency.

These plans share one goal: they set the stability of the existing order over and above the self-determined interests of the urban poor.

Can any of these strategies prevail—and at what price? How can the black and the poor resist? Where do white radicals stand? Is "Liberation" only a ghetto problem?

COLONIALISM & LIBERATION in AMERICA

A 64-PAGE REPORT ON THE BATTLE TO MAKE THE GHETTO
SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY.
--- FROM PAY-OFFS TO PACIFICATION . . .

VIET-REPORT Confronts These Issues Head-On

WE HAVE DRAWN TOGETHER A GROUP OF THE FINEST RESEARCHERS AND MOST EXPERIENCED ACTIVISTS—BLACK AND WHITE—FROM THE RANKS OF THE NEW LEFT, TO PRODUCE A DOCUMENT THAT IS A POLITICAL EVENT IN ITSELF!

VIET-REPORT

133 WEST 72ND ST.

New York, N.Y. 10023

- ☐ Please send one-year sub. (9 issues) at $4.
- ☐ Please send two-year sub. at $7.
- ☐ Renew my sub. pronto at $4.
- ☐ Just rush Special 64-page Issue at 75c.

Enclose is my $ — contribution to keep V-R on top of the struggle.

Name
Street
City/State

sion as to the piece the great man had in mind. The 100-page introduction is, as they say in the learned professions, "a magisterial survey of the field": biographical sketches of the Master, Moriarty, Watson and Watson's shadowy collaborator, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle; treatises devoted to the Baker Street residence, to Holmes's career on stage, screen and radio, and to the innumerable Holmesian parodies. Thereafter the tales follow in a chronological order painstakingly dated to the day and month. Finally we have the 17-page bibliography of Sherlockian studies—in triple column.

I suppose one could set all this down as one of the more baroque excesses of Pop or camp . . . or some such. But if so, it is the original and longest running manifestation of Pop enthusiasm. Its practitioners refer to it all quite humbly as "the lower criticism." In these handsomely designed volumes, their precious labors make for a grand rereading of all the familiar old stories.

But the delight I find in this mock scholarship is that it turns out to be such an impudent and well-deserved parody of what passes, alas! for "real" scholarship on the academic assembly line. Here, for example, are a few doctoral dissertations recently processed through some of our better universities: "William Egon von Fürstenberg and French Diplomacy in the Rhineland Prior to the Outbreak of the War of the League of Augsburg," "Military Administration in Thirteenth Century England: A Study Emphasizing the Contributions of the Wardrobe in the Wars of Henry III and Edward I, 1216-1307," "Archetypal Elements in the Faerie Queen, with Special Reference to Book Six."

Such is the typical busy-work over which our graduate schools keep the apprentices sweating and fretting. In view of the zest and expertise with which the Sherlockians flourish their pedantic niceties, I am not at all certain why the run-of-the-mill real thing that goes on in our academic professions has any greater claim to constituting a "significant contribution to knowledge." And it certainly isn't as much fun to do or read.

suburbia already beautifully conveyed in an earlier novel, An Impossible Marriage. Miss Hansford Johnson is as much the poet and chronicler of this area as John Betjeman is of his; the "soft, violet evenings" on Clapham Common; the houses, "mean and flashy"; the grayly facetious quality of its social occasions. No wonder the young men long to escape. Both have literary ambitions, both are in love with the idea of Bohemia, Chelsea, Soho pubs. Undergraduates manqué, not untouched by sophistication, they nevertheless pursue with an absurd and touching innocence, "the wild time."

Jo lives at home with his mother (a wonderful, complex study of that usually oversimplified figure, the possessive, invalid parent) and brisk, unmarried sister.

Kit, who has real talent and is already beginning to publish, plans to marry Alison, a young, unexpectedly famous first-novelist. He introduces her to Jo who falls deeply and permanently in love with her. Kit drifts away and finally marries Polly, a well-born, demure miss with a will of iron. (One knows these demure, brass-bound misses!) Jo nurses his unrequited passion, Alison her pain. They cannot help each other.

Around this nucleus gather the rest of "the crowd"; a sparring, lively couple, the unfaithful, handsome Georgina and her journalist husband; Piers, the intellectual military man Alison eventually

THE POET AT SEVENTY

I did

Not think I had been followed
Into this room; but the dull
Glaze of each afternoon has Filled my curtains; their yellowed
Gauze is a dead skin I can
Not shed. Yet, I can recall
Nothing but words—the slow soft
Sounds I used to shape the hands
And legs and eyes of this earth
Into one sound, one air, and
One blood. It was enough, I Thought, for the night. This would do;
I was content. Then a door
Opened to another room
And the silence of the cold
Morning light swelled around me
And broke across my crooked
Back. I could not move or see,
And I dreamed a dream of me
As a child, swinging on a
Brown porch swing high into trees
That I could not come down from
Until the blue sky had twirled
Me into it. My body
Was light entering the world
As flesh burning until I
Was only light; and when I
Fell to earth and made a shadow
Behind every tree and rock
I struck, I screamed until I Woke and moved into any Dark corner I could find.

Like

An old dog who has scouted
The woods for a place to die,
I have come here, unable
To shake away even the Sight of a bowl of fruit that Sits near me on my table,
Darkening under this light.

R. PAWLOWSKI

The Moderately Content

THE SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST.
By Pamela Hansford Johnson. Charles Scribner's Sons. 468 pp. $6.95.

GERDA CHARLES

Miss Charles is a British novelist. Her latest work is A Logical Girl. (Knopf).

As the man said . . . all criticism in the end is subjective. Bend over backwards as he may, the critic's judgment ultimately depends on whether his personal experience, temperament or vision chimes with that of the artist. A writer who for me possesses this precious, chiming quality is Pamela Hansford Johnson. She notices and tells precisely what I would wish to be noticed and told.

The Survival of the Fittest is a long novel, spanning the last thirty-odd years, but though it traces much of the history of the period it is really a study of a group—in the more enclosed sense of the word. It is a fascinating theme. The group, the gang, our lot . . . how much of human destiny, one wonders, depends on the particular set one chances to find oneself in; college, rooming house, relatives—or simply street? One hard glance at this question is almost enough to make fatalists of us all.

The group in this novel are primarily linked by neighborhood. Two young men grow up together in the narrowly respectable district of Clapham in South London. It is a region of Edwardian marries; Fay, a nice, gay, good-natured girl who loves Jo but marries someone else when he won't have her. Against the background of a darkening world, Spain, Czechoslovakia, Munich, the war and then the peace, the group waxes and wanes, disperses and unites, changes partners . . . Kit's Dylan Thomas-like fame as a writer, drinker and lecturer grows; so does Alison's reputation as a novelist. In a late chapter some of the group meet for an elegiac, strange, sunlit afternoon in Richmond Park. Their children are growing up, they themselves fattening, mellowing, their "wild times" not only gone but seen for what they were: beer not champagne, a remote, suburban imitation of the high style.

Toward the end of the book Kit dies drinking vodka—appropriately enough in Russia (this exquisitely observed Russian chapter is an enormous pleasure to read)—and at the very end Jo is dead too. He has never married, has accomplished nothing, lived moderately content but seemingly to no purpose.

In this long novel, never less than supremely readable, often shot with pure and marvelously fresh perception, it is the character of Jo which, standing at the center, holds (or should hold) the moral heart of the book in his hands. Always courageous, Miss Hansford Johnson in this as in other fields has chosen to illuminate and indeed to bless such unfashionable virtues as endurance, acceptance, the settling, without screaming, for less; the not-so-bad-after-all. Yet it must be admitted that this fine purpose does not quite come off. For all the deaths and disgraces, the minutely observed bliss and anguishes of love, what is lacking (and what, perversely, the reader wants) is the sense of tragedy. As Belpheoe says (Belpheoe is the gorgeous name chosen for a most charming and affectionately drawn little portrait of Edith Sitwell): "Be grandiose. It is a great shield, grandiosity."

But if grandiosity is missing it is the only real flaw in this otherwise witty, melancholy, beautiful and generous novel.

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVICK

San Francisco

The American Conservatory Theatre (ACT) is the biggest and the busiest repertory company in America. Its annual budget amounts to a whopping $2.3 million, which must certainly be an all-time record for a noncommercial American legitimate theatre. ACT maintains a company of about fifty actors (this figure fluctuates somewhat), who perform rotating repertory simultaneously in two theatres in downtown San Francisco, and make guest appearances all over California and elsewhere. This year's repertory includes some twenty-five plays; a determined spectator can see seven different productions in a single week.

Moreover, ACT appears to take seriously the claim implied in its title that it is a conservatory as well as a theatre. Under the rubric "Conservatory Training Staff," the program lists thirteen names: a good-sized faculty, especially as a number of the company's directors and actors also do some teaching. The idea is that every member of the company should be constantly in training, constantly perfecting his old skills and mastering new ones in the intervals of running from rehearsal to rehearsal and from performance to performance.

The company's talents are expended on a highly eclectic schedule of plays. Except for Shakespeare and Molière, ACT has never acknowledged the existence of any playwright who flourished before about 1890, but it does manage to offer a little of a great many things: naturalism, documentary theatre, poetry (dramatic and lyric), prose-poetry, satire, absurdism, tragedy, comedy, farce and revue: old chestnuts and new works. If the company should turn out to have a tragical-comical-historical-pastoral or two up its sleeve, I should not be altogether surprised.

One thing that living in America has taught us all is that biggest and busiest and most expensive does not necessarily mean best. But the American Conservatory Theatre is good: unquestionably one of the half-dozen foremost resident professional theatres in the United States. Its founder, general director and animating spirit, a slim, bald, mad young man (in his 30s) named William Ball, has a flair for theatrical effect that is almost as apparent in the productions he directs, and in the way he runs the company, as it is in his own appearance and manner.

The acting company includes a number of good workaday professionals, and a number of highly talented artists. The work of the designers, on the other hand, is not particularly interesting, probably because of the fierce demands of such a copious repertory. But at least nobody can accuse ACT of seeking to divert its spectators with flashy, expensive décor.

On this visit I was able to see only seven of the company's productions (plus one outside production, of the musical Your Own Thing, presented under ACT sponsorship), and thus my impressions are based on a rather small random sampling of the company's work. I was able, however, to see two of the four new works that the company has presented this season. One, written by Brian McKinney, ACT's press agent, bears the endearing title, Deedle, Deedle Dumpling, My Son God. It is a sort of modern Candide: the story of an ingenious youth and his attempts to make his way in a bewildering world. All the men Johnny meets are played by the same actor (Peter Donat), and all the women by the same actress (Michael Learned); at the end, the entire action is briefly recapitulated and explained as a test imposed upon Johnny by his parents.

But a play cannot be unified retroactively. Deedle seems to begin all over again with nearly every scene; it functions as a heap of fragments (some of them, however, quite interesting). Mr. McKinney is a somewhat self-consciously literary writer, careful to leave hints that he is making a series of variations on the old Quest myths; he alludes also, in veiled terms, to Adam, Cain and Abel, Tiresias, and other ancient worthies, which makes for pleasant guessing games. Fortunately, the play is saved from pretentiousness by Mr. McKinney's comic gifts, and by the performance of David Dukes in the leading role. Gangling, hoysish and bewildered, Mr. Dukes locates the part somewhere between Anthony Perkins and Dustin Hoffman.

The other new work I saw in San Francisco was Long Live Life. Jerome Kilty's adaptation of Chekhov's letters into a mosaic of monologues, staged by Mr. Kilty to look as much like a play as possible. It is pleasantly playful, full of plaintive Chekhovian whimsy ("I'm fine, except for one trifle—my health"), and it rises at the end to a very pretty

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT  MUTUAL REAL ESTATE
INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

☐ Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name

Address

Zip

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. This offering is subject to the approval of the State of New York.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 8-19-68

233 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 5 Months, $4

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

FILMS

HUELGA

A film about the California grapeworkers' strike—its spirit, the Teatro Campesino, the march to Sacramento. Narrated by Cesar Chavez. 16mm. black/white, 15 minutes. rental $20.

Holden Enterprises
5812 Castello Avenue
Van Nuys, California 91401

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY CAMPUS: unique lecture notes. Hundreds of courses, taken directly in class by professionals from world-famous teachers. $1.54. Send for free catalog. Fybate Lecture Notes. Dept. N, 2440 Bancroft Way, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

SITUATION WANTED—FEMALE

ADMINISTRATIVE ASSISTANT, full/part time. Literate, mature, responsible. Experience non-profit organizations. Meaningful work primary consideration. N.Y. Box #615, c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN: 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big Little Store, 1271 Washington, San Francisco, 94109, (405) 775-3140.

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors. Indigenous designs. Free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

I WANT TO MEET RUSSIANS FACE-TO-FACE ON AUG. 23* THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

as a step toward
preventing nuclear war
1 Week Study-Exchanges

*Leave NYC: Aug. 23 or Christmas
or MEET CEC in Moscow

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
Dept. N-8/9, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036
WRITE-WIRE-CALL (212) LT 1-8113

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled Pro editor-writer aids authors in revising MS. for publication. Box 612, c/o The Nation.

ABSTRACT QUILT. Custom designed by an artist. State desired colors. Allow 3-4 weeks. Twin $80, Full $100, Queen $115, King $125. Naomi Berton, Box 191N, Storrs, Conn. 06268.

SOCIALIST, COMMUNIST, other old presidential campaign buttons, etc. wanted for exhibit. Box 614, c/o The Nation.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy write: Maris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 44th Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

melancholy. But it is a bit thin, even a bit tedious, and notably short on direct confrontations. It deals mostly with Chekhov's love affairs, and these seem to have been interesting enough in themselves: but the letters, which are the matter of the play, are too reticent to convey much of what went on. There is something effete about Long Live Life; every time Ramon Bieri as Maxim Gorky stomps onto the stage with a burst of rude energy and noise, he shows just what is lacking in the production as a whole.

Fortunately, the ACT productions of A Streetcar Named Desire and Long Day's Journey into Night are considerably more robust. In Streetcar, the important supporting roles are not well played; Stella tends to fade into the woodwork, and Mitch seems uncomfortable with the way he has elected to pronounce his words. As Stanley Kowalski, Ray Reinhardt is not so much a phallic symbol as an ordinary, selfish, somewhat comic slob, more Eli Wallach than Marlon Brando. This characterization works well enough right up to the rape scene at the end; but surely Stanley should not get laughs when he emerges menacingly from the bathroom in those famous red silk pajamas. The production is justified, however, by DeAnn Mears's performance as Blanche DuBois. Except for a few moments when Miss Mears cheapens the character by overdoing her flirtatiousness, Blanche in her celebrated aching fragility is, quite simply, there.

I had seen and been thoroughly bored by Long Day's Journey on my previous visit to ACT, but the current—and quite good—production is entirely new. Its most notable feature is the performance of David Dukes as Edmund, O'Neill's portrait of himself as a young man. Droopy, withdrawn, driven to taking refuge behind a book, this Edmund is sick to death of the family hatreds and quarrels though he never can resist getting drawn into them all over again. An edge of irony in his voice, as he talks to his hovering mother and father and brother, shows that he understands them all, and himself as well, and suggests that some day he will be able to write their story; he becomes the most intelligent and the most interesting character in the play.

Most of the ACT productions are staged by various staff and guest directors, but I was able to see three that had been directed by Mr. Ball himself. Under Milkwood, the senior among them, is a lineal descendant of the production of Dylan Thomas' rhapsodical prose-poem that Ball staged Off-Broadway in the days when he was still a free-lance director. It is a lovely piece of work; Ball's gracefully fluid staging of what was meant as an essentially static "play for voices" is always an embellishment, never a distraction. Tartuffe, another old production, is also beautifully staged, but gave me the feeling that Ball is more interested in making pleasing patterns and ingenious routines than in coming to grips with the hard core of the play.

While I was writing this article, the American Conservatory Theatre announced that it would "cease to exist" unless it could raise $104,000 within two weeks. Thus by the time you read this ACT may be defunct. That a theatre which has played to so many hundreds of thousands of people, and been the focus of so much attention and admiration, should find its existence in such immediate jeopardy, is an indication—one of many—of how dangerously shaky our noncommercial legitimate theatres are. In spite of what I consider to be its shortcomings, the closing of ACT would be a sad loss as well as a grim portent. J.N.

Ball's Hamlet is new this year: a very oddly old-fashioned production, full of fine elocution and swirling capes; the actors keep striking attitudes that make them look like Garrick or Mrs. Siddons. Paul Shenar is a handsome, blond, storybook Prince of Denmark, polished and dignified, but scarcely impassioned or spontaneous. The best performance of this elegant but tame evening, to my mind, is Scott Hyland's Laertes. He makes Laertes an appealing, lost little boy, instead of the usual interchangeable juvenile. But surely there must be something wrong with a production in which Laertes is more sympathetic than Hamlet.

In spite of all my admiration for ACT and its work my final feeling is one of slight disappointment. The idea of the company—the copious repertory, the training program—is somehow more exciting than any actual production. In spite of all the good intentions and all the publicity, I felt no real sense of innovation, of discovery, no sense that ACT was about to become an important source whereby the American theatre might regenerate itself. To complain thus is to ask a great deal, but ACT encourages us to ask a great deal. What I am asking for may come in time; the company is, after all, just three years old. But I find something uncentered in its smörgåsbord eclecticism, an emphasis on means instead of ends, a lack of urgency. ACT seems interested only in theatre for theatre's sake; but the greatest theatres have always been vitally interested in making statements about the real world, in what they could communicate as well as how.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1259

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Music box lines for the fringilline types. (4, 8)
- 10 South American flower. (7)
- 11 Defy, as an example of acute misbehavior. (7)
- 12 and 15 down How one usually holes out? Definitely no! (3, 2, 1, 4, 4)
- 13 Two vessels the hack might be responsible for. (9)
- 14 The old farmer proves to be both mate and valet. (9)
- 16 Real precise! (4)
- 17 Put some spirit in what may be mainly ornamental. (4)
- 20 A VIP poet in office, as it might be. (10)
- 23 The best way of doing it reputedly is to attack the finale after the passage between C and G. (9)
- 25 A relatively long time to get one of 9. (5)
- 26 Old-fashioned before a little bit of solitary. (7)
- 27 It goes forwards and backwards in the sort of cuneiform records found in Asia Minor. (7)
- 28 Should they involve low-ceilinged rooms with brief romances? (5, 7)

DOWN:

- 2 A poet is the sort that can put you to sleep, perhaps. (7)

- 3 Tires because of his work? (Not one of the lean kind!) (8)
- 4 Descriptive of things having a shore? (7, 2)
- 5 Stage a sit-down, in case you're chicken! (5)
- 6 It might involve putting some money down, but work shortly into some change. (6)
- 7 and 8 An old-fashioned after-dinner speech, antithetical to what the doctor might have said concerning the girl Siamese twins. (5, 2, 4, 3, 6)
- 9 Well-thought-of opening for the minister. (6, 7)
- 15 See 12 across.
- 17 In such as Durante, a terrific specimen with a long nose? (8)
- 19 Chests of heavy smokers, perhaps, when listened to? (7)
- 21 Fancy. (7)
- 22 Shade of bunting. (6)
- 24 Not an active compound of nitre. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1258

ACROSS: 1 Colic; 4 Batteries; 9 Esmeralda; 10 Raven; 11 Interfere; 12 Ionic; 13 Springboks; 17 King George; 21 Names; 22 Fire drill; 23 Ernie; 24 Ernestine; 25 Peccolates; 26 Nones. DOWN: 1 Credit; 2 Limits; 3 Curare; 4 Bullet-proof vest; 5 Traveling cranes; 6 Earnings; 7 Inventor; 8 Sinicisms; 14 Skin-deep; 15 Mnemonic; 16 Eggshell; 18 Edison; 19 Simian; 20 Sleeps.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read. Have it sent postpaid for $1.00 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside
Maine 04842

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLETCHER (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

THE TRUMPET—Digest of Independent Liberal Thought—1 year (12 issues)—$1.00. POB 822, Rockford, Ill. 61105.

POEMS FROM PLACES by Robert William Harper may be ordered from author at: 491 Plaza Blvd. (N-149), Morrisville, Penna. 17057. $1.25 postpaid.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SUMAC", a tri-quarterly, will appear in September, publishing poetry, fiction, criticism. The first issue includes work by Robert Duncan, Louis Simpson, Kenneth Koch, John Thompson, Denise Levertov and others. Edited by Dan Gerber, Jr. and Jim Harrison. $3.50—one year. Ms. and Subscriptions, Box 29, Fremont, Michigan 49412.

IS HUBERT REALLY A LIBERAL?

Where did he stand on Vietnam in 1950? On China in 1960?

Send for "The Humphrey & McCarthy Records on Foreign Policy."

16 pp. 25c; 50 — $7.50; 100 — $10.

Prepared by Nat'l Comm. for Sane Nuclear Policy, 381 Park Ave. So., N.Y.C. 10016.

TUNGSTEN—REAL CAUSE OF VIETNAM WAR? Tungsten, vital to modern technology and the nuclear industry, is the most sought-after metal in the world today. The richest deposits are in China and North Vietnam. Read about tungsten and its relation to our Asian policy in William Winter Comments. 25c for the complete 2-part series. William Winter Comments, Box 817N, Sausalito, California 94965

STARTLING evidence concerning who had president Kennedy killed. FORGIVE MY GRIEF, Vol. 1—188 pages. Vol. II—192 pages, by Penn Jones, Jr. $5.95 plus $4.00 mail to Books, 530 New Road, Waco, Texas 76710.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

BUY YOUR BOOKS THROUGH THE NATION

Whom Will America Choose This Time?

J. Edgar Hoover may not be running for President—at least not yet. But with American politics, one never knows . . .

There is a scientific approach to elections, however. HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS, compiled each election year by Dr. Louis Bean, analyzes American voting patterns during the past ten Presidential elections. It can help you interpret the primaries, the polls and even Election Day returns.

Available from the Scarecrow Press, Metuchen, N. J., HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS will be a free gift to every new subscriber to The NATION.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS by Dr. Louis Bean.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign).

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

N 8-19

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

THE OPTIMISM OF PRAGUE VERA BLACKWELL

THE NATION

BURLINGAME
AUG 26 1968

AUGUST 26, 1968 35 cents

Backlash of Technology

WHERE POWER BELONGS

ANTHONY WEDGWOOD BENN

CONSERVATION FOR SURVIVAL

ROBERT and LEONA RIENOW

No Money for Safe Landings

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

New Lease for Liberalism RONALD RADOSH

Huck Finn Enriched GEORGE MAYBERRY

ff-Broadway Tours Europe ROBERT PASOLLI

5-624 P-2337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

rights for radicals

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: This year dozens of university and college faculty have found themselves fired or with unrenewed contracts as a result of their radical scholarship and/or advocacy of radical positions. . . . Rights assured by the First Amendment seem not to hold for scholars. Often they are told they may speak of radicalism, but are fired when they act. There is a scandal . . . which is overtaking the higher education in America.

In the effort to analyze, expose and oppose this trend, the New University Conference invites victims of political discrimination or those who know of such cases to send us particulars. . . . We need to know what form of radicalism is most likely to evoke suppression . . . and what kinds of institutions are most repressive. . . . We are interested in discrimination against faculty in such ways as failure to hire or renew, failure to promote (or to give raises), or outright dismissal; we also seek information concerning discrimination in the granting of fellowships and assistantships to graduate students. We want to know what scholarly and/or political activities of the aggrieved individual are believed to have prompted administrative action, and the reason offered by the institution for its conduct. (Please specify if confidentiality is desired, and if so to what extent.)

The example of the mass student movements has inspired many groups . . . to organize themselves to work for radical transformation of the institutions within which they work, and of the society. . . . University and college teachers and graduate students have formed such an organization—the New University Conference. It is a national membership organization of radical scholars, students and intellectuals: we invite your inquiries and membership (5810 S. Woodlawn, Chicago, Ill. 60637).

Robert Ross
Jesse Lemisch

trail of the Panthers

San Jose, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Michael Harris' story on the Black Panthers ["Black Panthers: The Cornered Cats," The Nation, July 8] characterizes them more as a bunch of thugs with bad marksmanship than as a group of citizens protecting rights of the Second and Third Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. No wonder: he omits a number of relevant facts.

For example, when he describes Bobby Seale as a near fugitive almost always on the move, as though he were guilty of a crime, and says that police "walked into his apartment" on January 25, Mr. Harris does not mention that the police had no warrant, that they did not walk in but crashed in, that they ordered Mr. Seale and his wife about with weapons leveled point-blank at their chests, and that they searched the premises with the delicacy for which police have come to be known when dealing with black people.

Mr. Harris' article might have been written too long ago, for he fails to point out that Eldridge Cleaver had his freedom curtailed by the California Adult authority for engaging in political activities, not for violating his parole as the Authority alleged, which Solano County Judge Raymond J. Sherwin stated on June 11 when releasing Mr. Cleaver from jail.

As to the trial of Huey P. Newton, it would seem pertinent to mention that several times previously Newton had been arrested by the Oakland police on trumped-up charges. Why does Harris not reveal that the grand jury indicted

(Continued on page 148)

EDITORIALS

Behind Nixon's Grin

The media agree that Miami was Nixon's finest hour, but an hour is all it was. As soon as he had reached the peak, he skidded down the other side and demonstrated that the old Nixon remains unchanged. Almost up to the moment of victory, his manner was relaxed and ingratiating and his political performance superb. Memories of the loss of control after Nixon's defeat by Pat Brown in 1962 were almost forgotten. But the stress under which this tireless climber labors shows up in a crisis, and he lost most of what he had gained. Again the image he wants the public to accept was revealed as nothing more than a mask, hiding the man he does not want the public to see.

The tape of Nixon's talk with the Southern delegation—which was made without his knowledge or permission, and no doubt to his mortification and that of his staff—is a most revealing political document. Thinking himself alone with cronies, he created a credibility gap even before winning the nomination, since what he said to the Southerners was not what he had been saying publicly. He clearly gave Strom Thurmond the power to reject any Vice Presidential candidate not to his liking.

Nixon could not have won on the first ballot without the support of the South; he could not risk a second ballot, and for that support he was willing to pay almost any price. He had said that the first requisite of the Vice Presidential candidate was fitness to exercise the powers of the Presidency, should the occasion arise. He then chose Agnew, a nonentity. It was a classic instance of the "politics of accommodation." Agnew would displease the North, but not to the point of rebellion; he would placate the South and make its delegates feel that further appeasement might be in store.

The image that Nixon had been trying to project was that of a mature, confident conservative who, over the years, had become mildly liberal and tolerant. Mary McGroarty quotes a "young moderate" who said hopefully during the balloting: "I don't think his administration will be so bad. He's bound to be liberal—the country is." Some say the country is in a conservative mood; others think that, because the times demand tolerance and social justice, it must be swinging liberal. Who is thinking wishfully we shall find out in November.

But of the falsity of Nixon's liberalism we already have proof. He gave short shrift to Rockefeller, Romney, Percy, Hatfield, Lindsay, Evans, Chafee, et al. He doesn't trust them, and when it comes to campaigning he reverts to the style with which he began his political career more than thirty years ago. He thinks he can win by stressing crime in the streets, with injections of redbaiting and a soap-opera sentimentality to tickle the lowest common denominator among the voters.

Often an outsider can see through a political phony more clearly than can his fellow countrymen (although it must be said that few American commentators have worshipped at the Nixon shrine). In the August 11 London Observer, Anthony Howard discusses Nixon, without malice but with devastating effect. Nixon is the local boy who made good and who, as far as one can judge by his utterances, never had a poetic or decently cultivated thought. Whatever his faults, John F. Kennedy at least did not lack style and grace, and his English was that of a man who respected the language. Nixon, though he is not obscure except when he wants to be, somehow makes everything sound banal. While Howard does not remark on that particular characteristic, he says that the candidate's tastes are mundane and predictable: his church, Dr. Norman Vincent Peale's "Temple of Positive Thinking"; his favorite delicacy, cheese covered with ketchup; his only interest outside of politics, his family. And all the grinning photographs of the gregarious, democratic American are a fraud—a fraud that becomes palpable whenever his fears are aroused, which is every time his political ambitions are in jeopardy. His choice of Agnew as a running mate reveals him, Howard finds, as the selfsame secretive, scheming politician he has always been.

Daley Asks for Trouble

It is quite true, as the politicians say, that only one man makes decisions in Chicago; it is unnecessary to add that Mayor Richard J. Daley is the man. But sometimes the toughest guys make the biggest mistakes, and it looks as if His Honor is headed for one.

He began preparing for it in the spring, as described by Joseph L. Sander in "Battle of Chicago: A Study in Law and Order" (The Nation, May 20). To summarize the account: Lengthy arrangements had been made by the Chicago Peace Council for its annual parade-demonstration, which ended with beatings, people being struck by vehicles, assaults on the press, and sixty-three arrests. "It was the feeling of at least one member of the parade committee," Mr. Sander concluded, "that the city government is trying to get across the message that it will not tolerate peaceful demonstrations by local citizens and that any who try to make their grievances known to the public will be made to wish they hadn't." Furthermore, that the citizens of Chicago have entered "a new period of a general suspension of constitutional guarantees."

This view of the events has now been irrefutably confirmed by a report on "Dissent and Disorder," issued under date of August 1 by the Roger Baldwin Foundation of ACLU and prepared by an independent citizens committee, for which Elmer Gertz, well known to Nation readers, and David Kahn acted as counsel. The chairman of the investigating body was Dr. Edward J. Sparling, president emeritus of Roosevelt University; all the other members were prominent religious, industrial and academic leaders. There are photographs, a full account of what occurred, and an appendix of evidence and testimony in federal court. One conclusion is that "Mayor Daley's 'shoot to kill' order of April 15, regardless of its technical legality, could not help but encourage an 'anything goes' attitude on the part of the police force." It was just another case of one man making the decisions in Chicago.

Of course, when only citizens of Chicago—and peace-demonstrating ones at that—are concerned, Mayor Daley has little to worry about. Though civil libertarians and the

IN THIS ISSUE

August 26, 1968

EDITORIALS

130

ARTICLES

135 Credentials Showdown:

Who Speaks for Mississippi?

Curtis Wilkie

Backlash of Technology

136 Where Power Belongs

Anthony Wedgwood Benn

138 Conservation for Survival

Robert and Leona Rienow

142 No Money for Safe Landings

Karl M. Ruppenthal

144 Planes Over Saigon:

Operation Self-Destruction

Karl H. Purnell

145 The Optimism of Prague

Vera Blackwell

147 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

149 New Lease for Liberalism

Ronald Radosh

150 Beyond Libel

Frank J. Donner

153 Private Responsibility

Stanley Poss

154 Huckleberry Finn Enriched

George Mayberry

157 Theatre

Robert Pasolli

157 Comfort (poem)

Jean Farley

159 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher:
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor:
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL ROSEN

Executive Editor:
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YULESS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHUS; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERNILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; Two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change will address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 5

like may exonerate him, they never had much use for him nor he for them. But if, as now appears, he should be planning to impose his version of law and order on Chicago during the Democratic convention, he will find himself in hot water, and the Democratic Party with him. The eyes of the nation will then be on Chicago, and if the Mayor tries to operate during the week of August 26 as he operated on April 27, he is likely to trigger a reaction he may come to regret.

The choice of Chicago as the convention city—apparently an arrangement between President Johnson and Mayor Daley—was unfortunate to begin with. An opportunity was afforded by the telephone strike to switch the convention to Miami Beach, where all the communications facilities were already in place and ample hotel space was available; but Daley insisted that the Democrats stay in his beloved bailiwick. His powers as Mayor are subordinate to his powers as Chairman of the Democratic Central Committee of Cook County; it is the latter that makes him one of the old-line big-city bosses.

Racial disorder has been endemic in Chicago, complicated by the spasms of the ethnic groups, each of which is equally loyal to the customs of the old country and to white supremacy. It is probable that there will be both Negro and peace-group protests at the convention site. It has been surrounded by a barbed-wire fence, and measures for strict security have been instituted. Apparently live TV coverage will be confined to the interior of the auditorium. If disorder occurs outside, video tape will have to record it. The media should make every effort to show whatever happens, when and as it happens. Daley is not above the law; if he thinks he is, that is his second big mistake.

Pomp or Carnage

Nairobi, Kenya

Little can be done to save the lives of those bloated children of Biafra until the civil war in Nigeria is over. That is the heart of the matter; all else is peripheral. The pitiable pictures in the London press, the stricken conscience of the British people, the rush of volunteers to feed and nurse Biafran babies, the American powdered milk piling high on the docks of Lagos, the mad scrambling of relief workers to crack Nigerian inefficiency and push the supplies somewhere, somehow—all mean little as long as the war goes on.

Some idealists believe that the world's indignation, outcry and shamed anger over the thousands dying in Biafra will force the two sides to end their war, in the name of decency and humanity, but that is doubtful. "No group can stop a war because people are dying," said Alison Ayida, an influential Nigerian civil servant, in a meeting with foreign newsmen in Lagos recently. "It's never been done in a war before, and it won't be done in Nigeria—unless you stop the cause of the war. That's what war is all about." The federal government feels that it is about to crush the rebellion in Biafra, and it is in no mood to be cheated of this victory by pictures of starving children.

There is some hope that the war will come to an end through a negotiated settlement at the peace conference that opened in Addis Ababa August 5. But the hope rests mainly on a belief that the Biafrans have faced the hopelessness of their position and are ready to surrender. The federal government seems prepared to do little more at Addis Ababa than accept that surrender. It offers no concessions of its own, except for a few devices to help the Biafrans save face, and a few humanitarian gestures toward a defeated people.

If the Biafrans refuse to surrender, the federal armies are ready to march into what is left of Biafra and crush the heartland of the Ibo people, the main tribe of the secessionist state. Nigerian officials maintain they have been restraining their forces because of the world demand for a last try for peace. In the Nigerian view, Addis Ababa is the last chance; if it fails, slaughter begins.

Some Nigerians even insist that an invasion would be more merciful than all this talk and delay. They say that fewer people would die in a federal onslaught on the last three towns of Biafra than would die of starvation during weeks of negotiations. (The federals want to kill thousands of Biafrans in order to save thousands—a neat, simple and horrifying formula.)

There is a possibility that the invasion may come before the peace conference reaches any conclusions. The Nigerian field commanders, who are chafing under their restraints and disdainful of humanitarian do-gooders, are a powerful lot who sometimes act independently of their commander in chief, Major General Yakubu Gowon, the federal military ruler. These commanders, impatient with federal deliveries, have at times gone off to London and bought arms on their own. It is conceivable that they will go ahead and slaughter Ibos on their own.

In short, the Biafran rebellion is nearing its end, which will come either in the pomp of the Addis Ababa conference or the carnage of a federal onslaught.

In the name of a mythical Nigerian nation, the federal armies, equipped by the British, marched off more than a year ago to subdue a tribe that had suffered so greatly within this so-called state that it wanted to leave. Nigerians and the British (and, as a matter of fact the American embassy officers) saw this as a police action which would straighten matters out in a few weeks. Instead, it has taken all these months and cost thousands—some say 100,000—dead of bombs, bullets and starvation. All for a fervid nationalism based on some lines that British imperialism drew arbitrarily on a map less than a century ago.

STANLEY MEISLER

Dogma Number Two

Prior to March 31, 1968, there was almost universal acquiescence in the near-axiom that "you can't deny an incumbent President renomination." The Nation did not accept this assumption, partly because renominations had been denied, though not in recent times, and more relevantly because circumstances alter cases and it seemed to us that current circumstances had completely undercut the hoary assumption.

Now the land is plagued by a second dogma, stating that it is utterly unrealistic to expect a party to repudiate a major policy of an incumbent who belongs to that party. The argument is that the party must, willy-nilly, nominate candidates who will back up and justify the record of its preceding administration. It may prove to be so in Chicago, but we see no better inherent reason for accepting this dogma than for bowing to the preceding one (of which it is in fact a variant).

Specific evidence against the never-admit-a-mistake doctrine is the strong showing made in the primaries by the combined vote of Eugene McCarthy and the late Robert Kennedy, not to mention the 53 per cent margin by which Senator Fulbright won renomination in the state of Arkansas, despite the feeling that he has been too much preoccupied with issues of foreign policy and pays only lip service to segregation. Then there is the steady accretion of support that McCarthy continues to pick up: Patrick Lucev of Wisconsin, a strong Kennedy supporter; Senator Yarborough in Texas; in Ohio, Senator Young and Edward Lamb, and the pro-McCarthy trend in the California delegation. As a straw in the wind, at a recent very large lunch of the American Management Association, when the industrialist Martin Stone was unexpectedly introduced as co-chairman of the McCarthy campaign in California, the audience in the ballroom of the New York Hilton burst into loud, sustained applause.

The unexpected can always happen. If, for instance, an understanding were reached in Paris and a cease-fire followed in Vietnam, the situation would be radically changed. But short of such a phenomenon, Dogma Number Two is fallacious, because patently the Democratic Party cannot be unified on the premise of a rousing endorsement of the record of the Johnson-Humphrey Administration; the Democrats cannot hope to outdo the GOP in tomfoolery. Perhaps it cannot be unified completely through the nomination of a critic of Vietnam policy, but the prospects of unity are much better in that direction, and it would give the American people a choice. Above all, it would inject an element of morality into our politics. Dogma Number Two deserves no more respect per se than Dogma Number One—and, these being special times, it is reasonable to be hopeful.

Difference Between Generals

In West (July 28), the Sunday magazine of the Los Angeles Times, James Real has an enlightening and lively article on Generals Curtis LeMay and David Shoup, both of whom he interviewed to elicit their present views on Vietnam and on U.S. diplomatic and military policy in its broader aspects. LeMay, it will be remembered, attracted world-wide attention with his recipe for victory in Vietnam: "Bomb them back to the Stone Age." Talking to Real, he "guessed" he wouldn't put it "quite" that way again, but any change seems to be in the phrasing, not thinking. He now says: "We must be willing to continue our bombing until we have destroyed every work of man in North Vietnam, if this is what it takes to win the war."

There are two kind things that can be said about LeMay. For one, The Christian Century praised his "utterly frank, non-nonsense language," with the qualification that what he proposes "would make a Hitler envious and a Genghis Khan blush." The other comes from the late Walter Millis who, reading LeMay's memoirs, found a "repellent fascination" in the brutalizing process which brought LeMay to the top of the Strategic Air Command. LeMay's justification for the massacre of civilian populations, he remarked, may be brutal logic but it is logical. LeMay does not shrink from the utmost in brutality if that is what it takes to win a war—any American war.

One gets the impression from Real's story that if it weren't for his four stars LeMay would be generally regarded as a conspicuous political nut. His continued fury against Robert McNamara borders on pathology, and his denunciation of the movies oversteps it. "I happen to be one of those people," he says, "who think that the movie industry is pretty well infiltrated by Communists." He bases this on The Blue Max and The Night of the Generals, in both of which German officers are portrayed in an unflattering light. (Only partly; they are heroic, but they sleep around.) This, LeMay says, "fits right into the Communist master plan of taking over a country It cuts down the public's confidence in their military and police forces. The rest of it's easy They had a big flap once about Communists in the studios. Seems like a lot of them are still there."

General Shoup, retired commandant of the Marine Corps, and General LeMay are old colleagues. They got along well when they served together on the Joint Chiefs, but the two could hardly be further apart in their present views. Shoup is a man of broad culture as well as extensive military experience. He served for many years in China and speaks with affection of "the great and wonderful Chinese people." He feels that the moment negotiations between the North Vietnamese and the United States began we should have stopped all offensive operations. He would have taken this step unilaterally, and he is confident that Ho Chi Minh would have reciprocated—if it had not been made a condition.

Shoup is against not only our operation in Vietnam but all ventures of the kind. "People keep honking about four Presidents having made commitments," he says. "We never made commitments, legal or otherwise, to furnish combat-type forces to anyone We've given the same 'word' to forty-three nations. At some point you have to say 'no.' Why can't we let people actually determine their own destiny?" (Italics in original.)

Reason Dethroned

At the time of the carnival-trial of Bruno Richard Hauptmann for the murder of the Lindbergh baby, a Canadian newspaper exclaimed: "What a press! What a police! What a country!" Similar jibes were in order when Lee Harvey Oswald was shot under the noses of the Dallas police, overeager to oblige the press and TV photographers, and at the subsequent farcical trial of Jack Ruby. After the assassination of Robert Kennedy, Art Buchwald wrote: "The United States must look like a gigantic insane asylum where the inmates have taken over." The exaggeration is pardonable.

Now we witness another kind of spectacle, quite as bizarre but deviating from reason in a different fashion. At the Millington Naval Air Station near Memphis, an Air Force C-135 touched down at 3:08 A.M. on July 19 and a "strange tanklike vehicle" was driven alongside. Amid a throng of armed policemen a man—his wrists manacled, his legs in irons, and a bulletproof vest over his shirt—was hustled into the armored car, which tore off toward the Criminal Court building. There the courtyard was filled with heavily armed police and sheriff's deputies, and sharpshooters were stationed at vantage points nearby, as if in preparation for an invasion by a foreign power. Thus was James Earl Ray, accused of the murder of Martin Luther King, transferred to the custody of the Memphis authorities.

A few days earlier, in Los Angeles, Sirhan Bishara Sirhan, charged with shooting Robert Kennedy but presumed innocent until proved guilty, made his fourth courtroom appearance, but not in an ordinary courtroom. At first, while he was still incarcerated in the county jail, he was arraigned in a chapel turned into a courtroom, close to his quarters. Subsequently he was moved to the Hall of Justice, where he pleaded not guilty in another improvised courtroom, with panels of armor plate installed across the windows. When he is eventually tried, it will be in a regular courtroom on the eighth floor, with his route sealed off in a kind of tunnel, all windows armor-plated, and Sirhan, the judge, jury and attorneys protected by a shield of steel and bulletproof glass. The reporters outside the shield will be unable to shoot one another, since all will be searched for weapons before being allowed to enter.

While it is certainly proper for the Memphis and Los Angeles authorities to have learned the lesson of Dallas, some of these precautions seem designed more for drama than for security. Moreover, such spectacles tend to support the question raised by Jerry Landauer in The Wall Street Journal: is there not substance in the belief of some authorities that the news media are glamorizing assassination? For an obscure person there are two quick routes to fame: martyrdom or assassination. Landauer quotes Nicholas N. Kittrie, professor of criminal law at American University: "Men like Oswald and Sirhan primarily seek some identity, some achievement. The media are their reward and what the criminal law does to them afterwards is quite secondary."

If such personalities cannot climb to transitory fame over the bodies of prominent men, ordinary people will do, but in that case quantity is necessary: eight nurses strangled in a Chicago dormitory, fourteen people shot dead by a sniper at a Texas university, five women murdered in an Arizona beauty parlor, etc.

The newspapers, and radio-TV, are obliged to give the news, but are 125 reporters really necessary for a nine-minute court appearance by Sirhan? And are the security precautions so out of relation to any reasonable assessment of the risks as to create the possibility of a successful motion for change of venue on the ground of general community bias?

Ideally, the media and the law enforcement agencies should exercise the rule of reason, for which there is no substitute in the sane conduct of human affairs.

Pressed far enough, a perfectly sane principle, such as the right of the people to be informed can be turned into an absurdity, or worse. If a decent self-restraint is too much to ask, the media managers might, as a matter of prudence, curb their impulse to go overboard on the lives of assassins, lest the current reaction against violence in TV entertainment should extend to reportage as well.

Damyantees

A lady we know in Atlanta (to borrow a convenient journalistic device from The New Yorker) came home from a year in England in August, 1965, to find her country at war and the papers reporting daily on the villainies of "the enemy." To find out why we had gone to war, and with whom, she appealed to her Congressman, who replied that he was sure she didn't want his "opinions" and that he had forwarded her letter to the State Department for the true word.

Soon thereafter, she received a parcel of booklets and stapled documents, the most impressive of which was a pamphlet, printed on heavy stock and bound in a dark blue cover on which the title was emblazoned in gold: "Aggression from the North."

Being an Atlantan, our friend began on the instant to feel her blood roil. As she says, "Southerners respond to that phrase like Pavlov's dogs to the bell. Any aggression from any north must be resisted" by any loyal liegeman of Jefferson Davis. To resist unsuccessfully—but "with honor"—does still greater service to his wraith.

The President and the Secretary of State, she observes, are both Southerners. The war in Vietnam is no topic for laughter, but the Atlanta lady insists that there is very little jest in her speculation as to how the war would have looked to these gentlemen if the geography had been reversed, if Ho Chi Minh had been the master of Saigon and had launched his forces against General Ky, away up north of the Mason-Dixon Line, in Hanoi. Can it be that Johnson and Rusk have been whistling Dixie all this time?

First-Hand Knowledge

State Sen. John G. Schmitz of California is a conservative who believes that government has gone past the point of no return down the road of the welfare state. So strong are his feelings that Gov. Ronald Reagan has become too liberal for him to tolerate.

Schmitz recently had another of his many skirmishes with the welfare state; he lost again—this time to himself. It seems he was listed in the Senate Journal as absent on "legislative business," which enabled him to collect a $25-a-day living allowance. The Senator was indeed absent, but the "legislative business" consisted of driving his family, in a state-leased car, to Virginia, where he went for a two-week tour of duty with the Marine Corps. During his absence, he collected his per diem allowance from the state, plus his Marine pay and travel allowances, plus his regular $16,000 annual salary as Senator.

When Schmitz talks about the welfare state, he speaks with authority; there is no substitute for personal experience.

WHO SPEAKS FOR MISSISSIPPI?

CURTIS WILKIE

Mr. Wilkie is city editor of the Clarksdale (Miss.) Press Register. He won this year an American Political Science Association award for reporting of public affairs.

Clarksdale, Miss.

Four years ago the ragtag Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party put on a show that upset an otherwise harmonious convention at Atlantic City. Now a revival of that drama is about to open. Two Mississippi delegations are again prepared to appear at the National Democratic Convention, and the prospect of another fight over seating faces the convention's credentials committee.

The "regular" delegation, controlled by segregationist Gov. John Bell Williams and including a clot of Wallace sympathizers, is being challenged this time by a group calling themselves the "Loyal Democrats of Mississippi" and representing a coalition of blacks and whites who promise unqualified support of the national party and its nominee. However, their position is based on more than loyalty. With respect to the rival delegation, they charge "gross violations" of party standards involving the selection of grass-roots delegates in at least thirty of the state's eighty-two counties. They cite the "Hughes document," adopted as Democratic policy this year, which requires that state delegations be chosen without regard to race, and be pledged to support the party's nominee.

Race was certainly a factor in the selection of the state's "regular" delegation. Although three Negroes were named to the forty-four-man delegation—a precedent for Mississippi—their participation is in doubt. Charles Evers has already resigned and is siding with the challengers. Even if the other two remain, it is hardly proportionate black representation from a state 43 per cent Negro.

The Loyal Democrats charge that Negroes were systematically shut out of the first step toward choosing delegates when precinct conventions were held in June. For example, in the Coahoma County precinct of Mattson, it is alleged that thirty-eight Negroes showed up at the proper time and elected their delegate. During the proceedings, "some seven or eight white voters came into the building . . . and held a separate meeting and did not join the precinct meeting which was already in progress when they appeared." The white group was recognized.

Their plans thwarted to vote themselves into the delegation legitimately, the Loyal Democrats made plans to send a delegation of their own and are now in the process of holding local conventions for that purpose. The group that will go to Chicago will be led by Aaron Henry, president of the Mississippi NAACP and director of the Freedom Democrats' attempted coup in 1964. There are other veterans of that fight in the ranks this year, but there are also new faces—white faces. Hodding Carter III, head of the biracial Young Democrats and son of the Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist, is serving as co-chairman with Henry. There are, somewhat surprisingly, white labor leaders; and much more surprisingly there are white lawyers and planters—men from backgrounds traditionally bent on preserving the system in Mississippi.

The Loyal Democrats will be divided about equally between blacks and whites and their delegation will not be bound by the unit rule as is the "regular" delegation. The challengers are working carefully to include members for Senator McCarthy as well as for the Vice President. Indeed, they have enlisted the aid of a three-man national legal advisory committee of Joe Rauh, a McCarthy partisan and supporter of the 1964 MFDP challenge; Mayer Feldmann, a Humphrey man, and Ted Sorenson (many loyalists were Kennedy backers). "Who we're for must not be a part of the seating question," says Henry.

There is some dissension among the various factions of the Loyal Democrats, which include the remnants of the original MFDP (the nearest thing to the New Left in the state), the more moderate NAACP which claims Henry, the Young Democrats, the AFL-CIO and Negro Masonic and teachers associations. They hope, however, to present a solid front at Chicago, where their chances of ousting the state's power structure appear better than in 1964. The "regulars" have been on a kamikaze course for some time. In the past two national conventions they, successively, nominated Ross Barnett for President and peevishly quit town before business got started.

If such behavior did not outrage the national party, the antics of Governor Williams should. After being drummed out of his seniority position as a twenty-year Congressman for supporting Barry Goldwater in 1964, he went home and ran for governor on a platform of martyrdom, all the time sneering at the national Democrats, freedom riders, oddballs, et al. At this summer's state convention, the long-time chairman of the party, crusty old Bidwell Adam, had the audacity to say that he thought the Mississippians ought to be at least willing "to meet people halfway." He was deposed, and his place was taken by former Goldwater and Williams backer Leon Bramlett.

The governor did not welcome Humphrey when the Vice President visited the state recently, and he promoted his apparent death wish for the "regular" delegation by such pronouncements at the state party convention as:

We, the people of Mississippi, have shown already that Mississippi and her sister Southern states will no longer be taken for granted like a woman of easy virtue, suffering all the indignities and insults that could be heaped upon us and still return uncomplainingly to the boudoir of our masters. We want to remain in the house of the party of our fathers, but on one condition, and one condition only: That we be treated as full-fledged members of the family and not as unwanted political stepchildren.

TV viewers of the battle of Chicago may well be spared such oratory, since Williams will probably not deign to appear. But he has made sure that the bulk of his delegation shares his views, and he knows that rebukes in far-away places can build political capital at home.

BACKLASH OF TECHNOLOGY

WHERE POWER BELONGS

ANTHONY WEDGWOOD BENN

Anthony Wedgwood Benn, M.P., is Minister of Technology in Britain's Labour government.

Just as technology is revolutionizing industry, so it is out-dating our political institutions as well. Our educational system, our system of local government, the civil service and the legal system are all now under critical examination because technology has made them obsolete.

But what about Parliament itself? Can we assume that it will go on, in exactly the same form as we now have it, forever and ever? I very much doubt it.

Much of the present wave of anxiety, disenchantment and discontent is actually directed at the present Parliamentary structure. Many people do not think that it is responding quickly enough to the mounting pressure of events or the individual or collective aspirations of the community. It would be foolish to assume that people will be satisfied for much longer, with a system which confines their national political role to the marking of a ballot paper with a single cross once every five years.

People want a much greater say. That certainly explains the student protests against the authoritarian hierarchies in some of our universities. Much of the industrial unrest—especially in unofficial strikes—stems from the resentment of workers and their sense of exclusion from the decision-making process. Frustration also provides much of the driving force for nationalism in Wales and Scotland among those who want to participate more fully in policy making. Even the Black Power movement is an indication that colored immigrants are not prepared to rely entirely on white liberals to champion their cause.

All these tendencies are indicative of a general—and inevitable—trend away from authoritarianism and toward personal responsibility. We are moving rapidly toward a situation where the pressure for the redistribution of political power will have to be faced as a major issue. The implications for our system of Parliamentary democracy are far-reaching. The redistribution of power by decentralizing it is of great importance. But it is much more complicated than an exercise in geographical fragmentation. It means finding the right level for each decision and seeing that it can be taken at that level. It also means transferring much more power right back to the individual.

Our Parliamentary system has changed radically over the centuries. At first it was little more than a means by which feudal landowners tamed the power of kings. In the 19th century landowners and industrialists were forced, by the emergence of the middle and working classes, to share their power. But these people were not content to be represented by anyone other than themselves. That is how the Labour Party came to be formed.

Looking ahead we must expect equally radical changes in our system of government to meet the requirements of a new generation. I am not dealing here with the demand for the ownership or control of growing sections of the economy. I am thinking of the demand for more political responsibility and power for the individual than the present system of Parliamentary democracy provides.

I am thinking of a participating democracy under which more and more people will have an opportunity to make their influence felt on decisions that affect them. If that is our objective, as I believe it must be, what special characteristics would a popular democracy have that is now lacking in the Parliamentary democracy? It seems to me that there are six areas in which change is imperative:

(1) People must be given the right to know more about government and what it is doing. Nothing buttresses the established order so effectively as secrecy. The searchlight of publicity, shone on the decision-making processes of government, would be the best thing that could possibly happen. For centuries this was the only power the House of Commons had. The new Ombudsman, the probing of the specialist committees and the partial lifting of the old fifty-year clamp on public records are all moves in the right direction.

But I would be surprised if the process stopped there. In Sweden departmental and even cabinet papers are, unless they involve national security, named individuals or commercial secrets, available for public inspection. In this country there is considerable pressure to reveal exactly how the intricate structure of interdepartmental and cabinet committees actually works. The more light we throw on the workings of government the less we shall have of the obsession with personalities. While the public and the press are denied the right to know what is being discussed and how decisions are being arrived at we are bound to have columns and columns of personal titillating masquerading as serious political comment.

(2) Government should be allowed to know a great deal more than it does about the community it was elected to serve. This requirement is essential if we want to see decisions made on the basis of fact. You cannot manage an advanced society, which is a vast, complex, interconnecting system, unless the facts are available. That is one reason why we are now strengthening the statistical services and encouraging the publication of more data.

In the seventies, computers will be widely used for managing the economy by means of a sophisticated process control system not dissimilar from that now used in large automated plants. The value judgments will all be human and political, but we shall have a reasonable chance of achieving what we set out to do. All this depends on having information available to program the system. If we had this information at hand to guide us in social policy the present arguments about selectivity would fade away. The day will come, and probably soon,

The possibilities that are opening up are not without serious dangers. Processed information about individuals could be the basis for a police state, and a mass of new safeguards would be required. But on the positive side this information could and should compel government to take account of every single individual in the development of its policy. Just to exist will be to participate.

If some real issues were actually put out for a decision in principle by referendum, the situation would be transformed. This would involve genuine responsibility. We might not all like the result; at any rate, by sharing responsibility, an interest in public policy would be stirred in every household. Here, too, technology may ultimately help us. Electronic referenda will become feasible within a generation and with them could come a considerable upgrading of the responsibility and understanding of ordinary people.

prising how little thought has been given to the interrelationship between them and democracy.

Perhaps this is one explanation for the fact that protest is edging ever closer to violence. Persons with minority views—strikers, those who dislike immigrants or are immigrants, the ones who oppose the war in Vietnam or want self-government for Cornwall—have precious little access to the community through the mass media. Minority opinions do find an outlet in books and through relatively small circulation papers and magazines. But access to the microphone or TV camera is very strictly limited—both by the B.B.C. and commercial TV.

What broadcasting now lacks is any equivalent to the publishing function. At the moment it is controlled by editors with slots to fill and a few selected minority views get into some of the slots. But three minutes of cross-examination, while you are roughed up by a folk hero TV interviewer, or a sequence of film showing a protest march, is no substitute for the right to speak.

The day may well come when independent groups of publishers would be allocated so many hours of broadcasting a month and told to help those who have something to say to national audiences. Unless we make a move in that direction we shall simply be denying ourselves access to a whole range of ideas which we ought, as responsible citizens, to be allowed to know about through the mass media.

(5) We must build up the strength of representative organizations of all kinds so that they can be consulted and as far as possible become self-regulating. The obvious model here is the professions which have been consulted and have for centuries regulated themselves. In the 19th century the trade unions emerged to represent working people and they too have been consulted and are being asked to take on new functions.

We shall also have to look again at the role of the pressure group. The function of government is to spot trouble before it becomes explosive, pick the brains of those who have thought the problems out, and evolve from these ideas a series of practical remedies. The more representative and professional pressure groups can be, the more government can work with them and the more responsibility can be devolved. This is one way in which power can be redistributed.

CONSERVATION FOR SURVIVAL

ROBERT and LEONA RIENOW

Mr. Rienow is professor of political science at the State University of New York, Albany. He is the author most recently, with his wife Leona Rienow, of Moment in the Sun: A Report on the Deteriorating Quality of the American Environment (Dial Press).

Conservation is no longer a "cause"; it is a crisis. Its features are drawn in taut lines by forces unprecedented in human history, like a human face contorted by foreboding and strain. Conservation today bears scant resemblance to the historic pattern of the familiar wallflower at the ongoing dance of material progress.

Under the impact of a rocketing population, an insatiable spiral of economic expansion, as well as a gargantuan and pitiless technology, the very character of the concern of conservation has shifted. Once preoccupied with the quantity of resources, its attention is now focused on the quality of environment. Once a question of supply, conservation is now an issue of survival—of species, of habitat, of mankind.

Daily, the country is, or should be, shocked by the brinkmanship of the exploitation we live by. Dr. Barry Commoner has reported that some tested baby food has been found to contain enough nitrogen fertilizer to endanger life. Dr. Lamont C. Cole warns the American Association for the Advancement of Science that had a ship the size of the Torrey Canyon, loaded with concentrated herbicides rather than with crude oil, sunk off our coast, it would have crased the photoplankton of the sea which produce 70 per cent of the world's oxygen, and man and beast throughout the Northern Hemisphere would quickly have found themselves gasping for breath. As for air poisoning, despite mandatory crankcase and exhaust control devices on Los Angeles automobiles, the amount of

(6) Much more responsibility must be shifted to regions and localities. This does not involve the fragmentation of society into mere geographical areas. It means identifying decisions which ought to be taken, in and by the areas most affected by those decisions.

It will be an agonizing and difficult task to separate from Whitehall powers that have been exercised there for centuries. But this sort of surgery is inevitable, and the machine that will be left will be all the more efficient for being free of detail it cannot manage, leaving it to concentrate on the immensely complicated job of reaching more scientific decisions on national matters.

The pressures for changes along these lines are inevitable, and are among the main political issues that will be argued about in the seventies and beyond. However unwelcome this pressure, adjustments will have to be made. Otherwise, discontent, expressing itself in despairing apathy or violent protest, could engulf us all. It is no good to say that it could never happen here. It could.

hydrocarbons spit into the air daily has leaped from 1,870 tons in 1960 (before controls) to 10,860 tons a day, and the mustard blanket wraps that city—and most cities—more tightly than ever in its choking embrace.

Secretary Udall comes up with the mournful list of seventy-eight American species of wildlife which we have pushed to the brink of the never-never land—among them the American bald eagle, the national emblem. In December, 1967, thousands of oil-blackened waterfowl washed ashore on Maine's sub-zero coast, there to starve and freeze to death, victims of an illegal oil spill.

In the next thirty years, says Russel E. Larson, dean of the College of Agriculture at Pennsylvania State, the world must duplicate all the progress made through agriculture since the beginning of time, if we would avoid world-wide starvation. And in 1967, eighty nations of the world were for the first time moved to meet in Washington, D.C., in "a massive cooperative international effort to find solutions for man's water problems," in the President's words.

All these calamities and crises which now tread on one another's heels are symptoms, environmental warnings. We are burdening the land with more people, production and machines than it can possibly sustain.

"The problem," observed biologist Hugh H. Ilits of the University of Wisconsin, "is one of a single species of animal who is making the earth unfit for habitation by conquering it." It is a problem unique to our age. Not until 1915 did the United States reach its first 100 million population. On November 20, 1967, an unthinking, if not an ignorant, crowd stood in the foyer of the Commerce Department and applauded wildly as the census clock registered the 200 millionth inhabitant. In thirty-five years, perhaps even in twenty-five, if bullish tendencies prevail, another 100 million Americans will appear on the scene. These are the increased hordes who will inundate the parks, blight the landscape, crowd the beaches, destroy the air and make life unbearable for one another.

They are also compounded of an individual and collective appetite that is driving society to dyspepsia. Every "7½ seconds a new American is born," begins our Moment in the Sun. "He is a disarming little thing, but he begins to scream loudly in a voice that can be heard for seventy years. He is screaming for 26,000,000 gallons of water, 21,000 gallons of gasoline, 10,150 pounds of meat, 28,000 pounds of milk and cream, 9,000 pounds of wheat, and great storehouses of all other foods, drinks, and tobaccos. . . ."

"He is requisitioning a private endowment of $5,000 to $8,000 for school building materials, $6,300 worth of clothing, $7,000 worth of furniture—and 210 pounds of peanuts to pass through his hot, grasping little hand. He is yelping for a Paul Bunyan chunk, in his own right, of the nation's pulpwood, paper, steel, zinc, magnesium, aluminum, and tin. . . ."

This infant will grow into the world's most prodigious consumer, citizen of a nation that accounts for one-fifteenth of earth's people but consumes one-half of its total product (and aspires, by the year 2000, to consume 83 per cent of it). We wallow in statistics projecting a gross national product by the turn of the century that will be more than double our present GNP—and appear charmed by the vision of 244 million cars on the road in that same year. We plan on a building pace of five times present experience. It is this double threat of more people demanding more per capita production that makes the modern conservationist run scared.

Nor can he muster much hope to save the beauty and balance of man's surroundings when he considers the relentless, savage power of the forces of predation. The exploiters are armed with an artillery of modern machinery as to make the universe quake.

A "mechanical monkey," for instance, has been announced with cheers. It embraces a living tree in a death hug and climbs to the top, chewing off all branches as it goes. It promises to consume every last unprotected tree of our once vast forests. "We shake up the earth and make it tremble!" exulted one TV documentary on man's subjection of nature. In Florida, a land speculator has developed the giant "tree-crusher" which shaves a 27-foot swath through the region's great cypress swamps for more housing developments.

The replacement of the bulldozer with the immense earth-churning cats, plus powerful new chain saws, have enabled the lumbermen of the Pacific Coast to promise the extermination of all of the prehistoric coastal redwoods within this one generation. "The redwoods are commercially valuable," declared a lumber company spokesman, "and therefore they must be cut."

True to their promised goal, as soon as the Senate, in November, 1967, cautiously approved a modest 66,000-acre park on Redwood Creek (with options for Secretary Udall to add to it the treasured "Emerald Mile," just upstream from its boundary) the barons acted. Overnight, the owners moved their mammoth machinery into the Emerald Mile, quickly felled a dozen of the 300-foot-tall giants, and rigged up the skidroads to strip down this breathtakingly beautiful spot. The old imperiousness of the 19th-century lumber baron was resurrected from ghosts Americans thought long banished.

Indeed, the "climate of conservation," as far as the redwoods are concerned, has the stability of a wraith. After long-drawn-out hearings, the House Committee under Wayne Aspinall of Colorado shocked the entire nation by slashing the 66,000-acre park passed by the Senate to a miniscule 32,000 acres (more than two-thirds of it composed of already saved redwoods in two state parks)! Lest anyone think this figure respectable, Yosemite ite claims, by comparison, 759,000 federal land acres, Yellowstone Park is composed of 2,213,000 acres and even little known Isle Royale National Park in Michigan contains 539,000 acres.

But that was not the worst. The committee thumbed its rather soiled nose at democratic procedures as well as at the desires of 95 per cent of the public polled on this special park proposal. The miserly 32,000-acre substitute was presented to the House under a suspension of the rules—a gag rule that denied more than fifty park proponents in the Congress any opportunity for amendment or debate.

Senate conferees Henry M. Jackson, Clinton P. Anderson, Alan Bible, Thomas H. Kuchel and Clifford P. Hansen now face a September confrontation in conference committee with House conferees Wayne Aspinall, Roy A. Taylor, Harold T. Johnson, John P. Saylor and Theodore Kupferman. The American people have this last-ditch opportunity to make their voice heard by these conferring gentlemen, if they act at once. As it is, the face of conservation in California now wears a sardonic grin.

Surface mining alone has defaced 3.2 million acres of land, and with the aid of a monstrous machine equipped with 200-ton jaws, the rate of disfigurement is now 150,000 acres a year which, it is estimated, we shall soon come near to doubling. Thus it is that today the defender of the environment tries to stand up against these demographic and economic forces with the breath of catastrophe and despair blowing down his neck. And as the forces of destruction expand, the land shrinks. No longer is the conservationist operating in a framework of almost wicked plenty—our virginal resource abundance which both dizzied and corrupted. Now each assailed spot becomes a final battle for its kind.

When the Eastern New York Chapter of Nature Conservancy wrenched Great Bear Swamp near Westerlo from the path of the Army Corps of Engineers' bulldozers, they were saving the last northern outcropping of the giant rhododendron in New York State. When nature lovers rushed to stave off development of the Wild Buffalo River in Arkansas, it was the last such river left in that section of the country. When the Audubon Society and others joined forces to set aside habitat for the Kirtland's Warbler in Michigan and the Atwater prairie chicken in Texas, it was in each case the last such habitat available on planet earth.

Nor is the issue always confined so narrowly. The ecologist today worries about ecosystems. He sees us tampering with climates, willfully exterminating entire species, altering many thousand-year-old habitats. Says biologist Dan McKinley of the State University of New York at Albany in his colorful prose: "A broad ecological disaster will now be final, in a world where untapped frontiers no longer beckon us and temper our mistakes. . . . The man who burns his incense to an expanding economy must learn to investigate what is going up in smoke."

Today's conservationist must view the landscape not in spots and dabs as he once did but in its entirety. He must be concerned with a biotic community, with complete ecosystems. His vision has perforce come to encompass the whole web of life, including man. Thus he no longer sees just a poison bait carelessly planted here and there or an aerial spray drifting down on a field of cabbage, but bewails rather the systematic nation-wide saturation of the American environment with an annual 700 million pounds of biocides, herbicides and pesticides. He sees the predacious disruption of a whole watershed.

As a consequence he mourns not only a specific wildlife loss from an occasional chemical "spill"—but the blotting out of an entire species such as the Atlantic salmon, or the Great Lakes sturgeon. The California condor, the timber wolf, the grizzly bear, the roseate spoonbill, the southern sea otter and many more—even the Eastern bluebird—are struggling gamely against man's ingenuity in order to stay alive. Never before in history has there been concern over the ability of nature to defend herself, but Professor Itlis expresses the new attitude. "It is abundantly clear," he says, "that one of the most important jobs of the conservation movement today is to expose the fallacies of the indestructibility of nature."

Certainly no one who honestly confronts the assorted revolutions in population, in production and in expectations can ignore the limitations on resources. On this finite, raked-over little globe gluttony must soon have an end. Even the most optimistic find hope only in the "resources" of manipulation, foreign importation and scientific innovations—shaky piling indeed.

Lucky "breakthroughs" and scientific serendipity aside, however, the startling emphasis today is not primarily a statistical one. A qualitative deterioration is impoverishing and debauching our environment. Scientists no longer worry as much about the coal and oil supply as about the life-endangering contaminants their combustion throws into the atmosphere. Public officials have transferred their concern from the inventory of chemicals available, to septic rivers, the 100,000 defiled lakes, and the poisoned estuaries that have resulted from these products. The question as to whether we shall always have enough plastic and paper is blotted out of sight by the mountains of "discards" and trash we must wade over and through. Whether we have enough steel to make automobiles becomes secondary in urgency to the blight of junkyards and the aggressiveness of the motor vehicle.

Maybe the more visionary scientists are right when they assert that some day they will need "only mass and energy" in order to create anything; we can then stoke the stomachs of the most crowded population with tasty viands concocted of granite, industrial dust and kelp. But the modern ecologist must weigh against the satisfactions of fecundity and stomach stoking the losses in quiet, in health, in open space, in dignity, in sanity itself, and in the preservation of natural beauty.

This qualitative malaise is nature's backlash that, at long last, is beginning to raise some welts. "Committing that sin of overweening bumptiousness, which the Greeks called hubris," wrote Aldous Huxley, "we behave as though we were not members of the earth's ecological community, as though we were privileged and in some sort, supernatural beings and could throw our weight around like gods."

The crisis has come upon us suddenly; by the same token, the sting of the ecological backlash can be countered only with emergency measures while we buy time. Harsh and limiting expedients are justified if they will allow us to come to grips with the basic economic and social distortions. This generation is experiencing the convulsions of a dying nature. Only mouth-to-mouth resuscitation will revive her now.

For example: the seas of the world are suffering progressive deterioration and mindless abuse. Whole species are being fished to death by unregulated mechanical rakes that comb the ocean floor, by percussion, explosion, and the greedy rivalry of prowling fleets of scores of nations existing in feudal maritime disorganization. Until international law can regulate in some measure the exploitation of the world's maritime waters, holding actions must be adopted. If, unilaterally, this country can prevent the fatal destruction of the estuaries, breeding grounds for two-thirds of the ocean's sea life within its jurisdiction, legislation to that end should be risked.

Again, 462 million tons of particulates are spewed into the air each year with catastrophes of deadly proportions impending when weather inversions press these masses of pollution too long and smotheringly over the metropolises. Any measures—restrictions on the automobile or tinkering with the smokestacks—are a boon.

If we would save the Emerald Mile, or the Northern Cascades, or the Grand Canyon from precipitant destruction, quick Congressional action is imperative. If we can stave off the rising tide of infectious hepatitis (50,000 new cases a year) and mononucleosis (resembling leukemia) by reducing the septic threat of the river sewers, we shall have to act boldly in this staying action. If New York Councilman Robert Low's bill to prohibit transistor radios in buses, subways and public places will aid in preserving the hearing, health of the heart and normalcy of the blood pressure (as Dr. Samuel Rosen declares), such a bill can hardly be tossed aside as "futile" or "immaterial."

However, to be realistic, it must be repeated that these holding actions are not solutions but expedients, and their most drastic implementation now promises, dismally, to offer little more than temporary relief. The real solution to this whole complex of civilized afflictions is a package of such cultural intricacy—it calls for revolutionary shifts in values and social goals—that time and intense effort alone can bring it about. In the long run, the conservationist cannot really save any natural wonder, any threatened species, any significant open space, breathable air, potable water, or the amenities of civilization unless he grapples with the self-destroying expansionism doctrine.

How can what Aldo Leopold termed "the ecological conscience" replace the ingrained American creed of unceasing growth? We denigrate the stature of our President by forcing him to become little more than a barker for the new jobs industry creates and the increasing glut of goods the market provides. How can we, in the words of Secretary Udall, "disentangle our minds and hearts from our purse strings?"—even to save ourselves?

By this time even the most crass and obdurate expansionist must face up to the pitiful incompetence of both industry and government to protect the natural heritage or safeguard the future. Industry is profit oriented; government is power oriented. The nation needs a stewardship of our remaining treasure that is posterity oriented.

Of late, many suggestions are springing forth as to how to effect this new sense of values and at the same time protect what is left. Federal Power Commissioner Charles R. Ross himself brought to attention the idea (publicized by Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference) of the British National Trust—guardians of the public weal—whose duty it is to examine all proposed projects in the light of historical as well as environmental damage. Composed of the most prestigious and impartial citizens personally selected by the Chancellors of Oxford, Cambridge and the University of London, the Trustees of the British Museum and National Art Gallery, the presidents of the Royal Academy of Arts, the Youth Hostels Association, the Entomological Society and Royal Horticultural Society, as well as heads of the National Trust for Scotland, Ramblers Association, Government of Northern Ireland, Commons Preservation Society, Society for the Promotion of Nature, and one or two others, it has served well "to save the pleasures of England from the social and economic revolution which is threatening our landscape."

"With the wealth of organizations in addition to the Sierra Club, such as the National Geographic Society, the Conservation Foundation, and the Wildlife Federation, this Nation could easily establish such an illustrious and influential body whose opinion would normally carry the day." "At the very least," adds the Commissioner, "the advantages of any development would have to be clearly in the Nation's interest before this Commission or the Secretary would overrule the objections of such a body." In the same vein, Rep. John V. Tunney of California is pressing hard for a "Council of Ecological Advisers"—eminent citizens divorced from commerce—to speak out for the public interest. It is certain that bureaucratic heads and pressure-tormented officials would, as Commissioner Ross has revealed, welcome such a trust for it would take the heat off their own necks. Best of all, for the first time in American history, the suicidal effects of the growth fixation would lie nakedly and honestly exposed.

Prof. Nathaniel Wollman, writing in Daedalus (Fall, 1967), is convinced that our only hope lies in the power of such a board of environmental experts to reduce our reliance "upon a technical elite for making the correct decision. . . ." And writer Robert Boyle restates the same idea in more earthy fashion when he says in Sports Illustrated: "Putting an engineer in charge of a resource such as a river is like hiring a plumber to design a fountain."

Drawings by Earl Thollander, Cry California

Always heretofore, when public agitation has risen to a head for some reform measure to save the land, the head has been neatly decapitated by the high-powered economists of the threatened interests (see the $40,000 or so of ads placed in the biggest newspapers from coast to coast in January by the California Redwood Association to scuttle the proposed National Redwood Park bill). Public rights and desires are left headless and speechless, and usually bleed quietly to death.

For another instance of this one-sided propaganda: right now when public anxiety is at its height concerning our foul rivers, we are slapped in the face with the statement that the $20 billion a year which it might cost to bring them back to a state of "pristine purity" is about as much as the nation spends for its public school education. Most people, we are assured, would find such an undertaking "ridiculous." The crusade falls on its face.

But if we had a public-oriented group of economists of the stature of Professor Wollman of the University of New Mexico, they might quickly tear such smug arguments to bits. Twenty billion dollars a year is "roughly one-third to one-half the amount by which one year's GNP exceeds the previous year's GNP. Should we decide, therefore, to restore our streams to purity," he concludes tellingly, "the cost is a delay by four to six months of the expected increase in all other goods and services that we would otherwise enjoy." Here at last we have both sides of the coin. Would that we now had at hand a National Ecological Trust where the rebuttal powers of Mr. Wollman and others like him might be broadcast to the entire populace rather than be hid, as they now are, in the esoteric covers of that weighty little Journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Daedalus.

For the findings of such a trust would be broadcast. By its very prestige, if not by the shock of its disclosures, it would command all communication media instantly. There arises here, however, the ancient enigma of the irresistible force and the immovable object. Once again the inborn growth obsession lifts its formidable head. We have built a whole set of sturdy institutions, economic and social, on the annually accelerated gouging of the environment. But in the words of architect Robert W. Patterson, "You cannot multiply forever both people and the things that people want unless you plan to take over more territory than the sterile moon represents." As we have emphasized in Moment in the Sun, the tragedy of our times is that we have institutionalized the agents of appetite and victimized the advocates of deeper satisfactions. We stand sullenly frozen in the consequences of our folly—the doctrine of ever more people demanding ever more things—while our leader, standing before Congress, recites our phenomenal growth statistics and laments "Why are you not happy?"

NO MONEY FOR SAFE LANDINGS

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

An airline pilot for more than twenty-six years, Mr. Ruppenthal is director of the Transportation Management Program at Stanford University.

Dramatically highlighting the congestion in the skies, ■ representative of the Professional Association of Air Traffic Controllers recently reported "losing" Air Force Two. "Of course I don't mean to say that the White House Jet was really lost," he said on a nation-wide television program. "What I mean was that we lost radar contact with the plane and had to actuate non-radar traffic control procedures." Then almost as an afterthought, he added that Airways Traffic Control personnel have no way of knowing whether the Vice President of the United States is actually on board any given flight. But they presume that he is, since Air Force Two is the number designation of any plane in which the Vice President travels.

The spokesman for the controllers then went on to state that his colleagues were not engaged in a slowdown, nor were they attempting to exert undue pressure for any reason. But, he said, they had recently reviewed the hazards in air traffic control and had decided to go by the book. Not that anyone had been ignoring the rules, you understand! But a careful reading of the rules would make any prudent man cautious.

He didn't actually say it, but he almost quoted the nostalgic Southern Pacific advertisement that once graced the congested highways of the West. Near the top of an incline, after fighting traffic for many miles, a motorist often saw an SP billboard breezily suggesting, "Next time try the train." Indeed, a few airline clerks have been suggesting that very thing to passengers in a hurry. "It takes too long to fly," said one impish blonde ticket clerk.

The skies indeed are crowded. Unable to remain in the New York holding pattern much longer, one flight from Frankfurt diverted to Boston and refueled. Again New York bound, it was again directed to the holding pattern. Once more low on fuel, it diverted a second time to Washington. By then the congestion had become so severe that the flight was canceled and the passengers taken to New York by a bus, which, incidentally, had a flat tire along the way! Total holding time for the flight far exceeded the flight time from Frankfurt to New York.

Other flights have suffered similar fates. A five-hour flight from Los Angeles to New York often takes seven hours. A two-hour flight from Chicago may be delayed for at least as long as the flight itself. A South African athletic team homeward bound from Fayetteville, N.C., was advised to take the bus to New York rather than risk missing their transatlantic flight. (Actually, its departure was delayed for four hours after they boarded it.)

Few passengers in recent weeks have escaped the impact of the congestion. Delays beget delays—once a flight is seriously late, it is difficult for the airline to resume a normal schedule until eventually an entire flight is canceled to allow the equipment to catch up with the schedules. Once-orderly airline terminals sometimes resemble refugee camps. Harassed airline employees are beginning to show signs of strain as long-suffering passengers voice their complaints.

So loud are their voices that they resound in the sacred halls of Capitol Hill. Long accustomed to the usual style of protest and almost impervious to run-of-the-mill complaint, Congress may indeed listen. And that, no doubt, is what the airways traffic controllers have in mind.

For some time highly trained and usually dedicated airways traffic-control personnel have been working long hours with a system that is becoming increasingly inadequate. Built basically to handle the DC-3, the system has managed somehow to keep pace with the much faster planes. But the attempt to cope with the situation has taken more and more out of the controllers.

Traffic Control procedures have been changed. Today it is not unusual for the final controller at an airport to clear three planes to land at the same time. It is true that the planes will be spaced behind one another on their final approach to the airport. If all goes well, the first plane will have cleared the runway before the second is ready to touch down. But should something happen—should the one plane be delayed in clearing the runway—it is incumbent upon the controller to tell the second plane to go around. Such constant attention to important detail is hard on any man. And the resultant strain is not reduced by the knowledge that hundreds of lives are in the controller's hands.

No single event brought about the controllers' reappraisal of their jobs and their decision to operate by the rules. Most conscientious controllers have been honestly concerned about safety. They have been well aware of the catastrophe that could result if their attention lapsed at a crucial moment. Morally responsible for the safe separation of aircraft operating under instrument flight rules (IFR), controllers also bear some legal responsibility. Some of them have been fined or otherwise disciplined for mistakes or errors in judgment.

The most immediate effect of rigorous adherence to the regulations is upon the airline passengers themselves. But for the airlines the delays may spell disaster. When a two-hour flight requires four hours, an airline's direct operating costs are doubled. The industry cannot afford cost increases of this magnitude—particularly in a year of declining profits.

Probably the most important cause of the air traffic congestion is the war in Vietnam. Vainly trying to keep federal expenditures within tolerable bounds while wasting billions of dollars on the war, President Johnson in his budget message asked government agencies to hold the line on expenditures. In spite of the fact that the Federal Aviation Administration had requested funds for advanced traffic control systems and additional traffic controllers, he requested that the agency be content with what it already had. Faced with a balky Congress, he later agreed to additional budget cuts. In order to pass the 10 per cent income tax surtax, Johnson agreed to further domestic spending cuts. Like all nonwar agencies, the FAA was caught by the ax.

Acknowledging that the controllers were doing a difficult job and doing it well, LBJ admonished them to shoulder additional burdens with no increase in men. But soon the tension was too great; the rubber band could be stretched no more.

Of course it is true that not all of the U.S. airplanes should really be in the air. A large number of duplicating flights could be eliminated with little impact on the public convenience. In its desire to please all of its airline clients, the Civil Aeronautics Board has sometimes certified too many lines to serve the various routes. The result has been too many flights and too many empty seats flying in the nation's dense air traffic markets.

Another contributing factor has been Congressional reluctance to bestow sufficient power on the Department of Transportation. In this affluent but uncoordinated America, the federal taxpayer foots the bill for the interstate system of highways which so reduce rail passenger travel that federal subsidies are sometimes necessary to provide for the operation of essential commuter trains. Already federally subsidized, the local service airlines may have to ask for increased payments because of the costs of airways traffic delays. Yet the Department of Transportation has no authority to rationalize transportation or to insure that the taxpayers' funds are prudently used. It is all but powerless to prevent the growing congestion in the air.

Given no improvement in the situation, the U.S. airlines could conceivably grind to a halt. The highly skilled controllers have given the nation only a small taste of the chaos that could ensue should their legitimate demands be ignored. But while the action of the controllers is dramatic, the situation that confronts them is not unique. It is representative of the fiscal starvation that faces most civilian agencies as a result of the emphasis on war.

Once again the Congress is on a spot. Having demanded a substantial reduction in nonmilitary expenditures as the price for approving the income tax boost, it has had to reverse itself and produce additional money for airways traffic control. And once it is acknowledged that the needs of the civilian economy cannot all await the end of the war, other civilian agencies are in a position to make their demands.

If it is obvious that airways traffic control cannot stand still until such time as war expenditures are reduced, it is equally obvious that official exhortations to make do with inadequate funding will not suffice for the Post Office, the National Park Service, the National Institutes of Health, or other agencies. The problem for these other agencies is to find ways to dramatize their plight. Slow attrition of the Post Office or other agencies of government service does not carry a threat to the lives of the citizens. Nevertheless, the impact will be severe. In the long run all the civilian programs undertaken by the United States will pay some of the cost of the war. Like the system of airways traffic control, they will approach a state of collapse. And the ensuing damage will be so great that it will take more than Presidential exhortations to erase the scars.

PLANES OVER SAIGON

OPERATION SELF-DESTRUCTION

KARL H. PURNELL

Mr. Purnell has reported frequently from Vietnam for The Nation.

Just before Saigon's police chief, Col. Nguyen Van Luan, was killed by a misfired American rocket, he noted bitterly that U.S. air strikes in the city's suburbs were helping the enemy more than hurting them.

"The Vietcong has no Air Force of his own so he uses ours," he said a week prior to his death—a remark which must be classed as one of the most ironic of the war.

The continued use of American air and artillery power in the cities of Vietnam since the Tet offensive has created more refugees, destroyed more allied property, and killed more civilians in the urban areas than all the Vietcong rocket and mortar attacks during the entire war.

In Hue alone, U.S. jets and helicopters, plus Marine 106-mm. cannon, turned Vietnam's once most beautiful city to rubble and created more than 200,000 refugees. In Saigon, at least half a million Vietnamese fled their homes before U.S. planes leveled them. The number of civilian dead can only be surmised, but conservative estimates put the figure in the thousands.

When it became apparent in February that the United States would respond to Vietcong infiltration of the cities with the same massive fire power used for years in the countryside, many Vietnamese observers in Saigon were quietly crediting Gen. Nguyen Vo Giap with a new and shrewd tactical innovation.

"Giap realizes that the government's last refuge in Vietnam is the cities. Now he is out to destroy these havens by turning our own guns against us," a prominent Vietnamese Senator told me.

Its simplicity made Giap's new strategy seem all the more cunning. By infiltrating a handful of snipers into a few blocks, he induced U.S. and South Vietnamese military commanders to destroy entire areas. For example, it is estimated that only three snipers were firing from the An Quang pagoda before this symbolic home of thousands of Vietnamese Buddhists was leveled.

One source who should know claims that Giap did not devise this strategy a priori. "Giap never dreamed the Americans would dive bomb their own cities," Wilfred Burchett told me in an interview in Cambodia recently. He said that the decision to attack the cities was a resumption of tactics broken off in early 1965 when the National Liberation Front was prevented from winning the war by the massive U.S. troop buildup.

"By the beginning of this year, Giap had retrained and regrouped his main force units which he withdrew from

Falconer

Mauldin, Chicago Sun-Times

THE NATION/August 26, 1968

action in 1965." The Tet offensive, according to Burchett, indicated that Giap felt the countryside was under control and it was time to begin the final battle for the cities.

Whether the North Vietnamese or Vietcong leadership hit on the theory of using U.S. fire power before the offensive, or have simply seized upon a windfall since then, is of little help to the American commanders faced with the choice of how to combat urban infiltration. As the military see it, they must drive out the snipers either by house-to-house fighting or by leveling the area.

The disastrous outcome of the former tactic was proved in the battle of the Citadel in Hue, where 50 per cent of several companies of the First Battalion, Fifth Marines were killed or wounded during street fighting inside the walled city. The Marines spent three weeks advancing house by house for about fifteen blocks along the eastern wall of the fort. The thick masonry of the well-constructed homes plus the proximity of the enemy (two or three houses away in some cases) made air and artillery strikes impractical. The Marines had to run through the open streets to advance while the snipers fired from concealed positions. Those of us who were there estimated the kill ratio to be around 3 to 1 in favor of the North Vietnamese.

When it was over, a young Marine officer cursed the tactics which cost the lives of so many of his men: "We should have pulled back and blown the place apart." It was done in the main city on the far side of the Perfume River, where 80 per cent of the buildings were destroyed.

"Blowing the place apart" has been the normal strategy used in urban areas since the battle for the cities began early this year. If the price in American lives has been held down, the overall cost has been geometrically inflated.

Not only must an additional million refugees be fed, clothed and sheltered, and thousands of homes be rebuilt with U.S. dollars but a significant shift in Vietnamese attitudes toward the war has resulted. From the poorest peasant angered at the American planes strafing his home, to high officials such as the late Colonel Luan, a growing distaste for the war threatens to crack the fragile government structure now headed by President Thieu.

Dr. Phan Quang Dan, one of Saigon's most popular politicians, has recently been ousted as Minister of State for publicly stating what more and more Vietnamese are privately saying. Dr. Dan told an audience at the Hoover Institute in California that the Saigon government should be more liberal in agreeing to talks with the Vietcong. "Either you kill them all or you talk to them, and killing all of them is impossible," he said. For this suggestion, considered treasonous in Saigon, he was stripped of his portfolio only four weeks after becoming a minister.

The Vietnamese peasants have traditionally been pragmatic in their loyalties, giving allegiance to that side which offers the best protection. The Vietcong's new Air Force, complete with American markings and pilots, is not likely to stem a growing feeling in Saigon and elsewhere in the country that the best interests of the average Vietnamese will not be served by the Saigon government and its foreign allies.

THE OPTIMISM OF PRAGUE

VERA BLACKWELL

Miss Blackwell was born in Prague, and studied at the university there, in London (where she now lives) and at Radcliffe College. She is the translator of Vaclav Havel's plays; writes and lectures on Czechoslovakia.

Suddenly a major East European crisis which had been in the making for some time inside the "Socialist camp" erupted to the surface. Whatever the outcome, its reverberations will affect not only the Socialist countries but the whole world. As I write, the situation is changing almost hourly; however, the central issues are immutable. They will stay with us whatever happens in Czechoslovakia, or to it. They cannot be suppressed by force; suppression would only postpone their resolution.

The Czechoslovaks have confronted the world, East and West, with a fundamental question concerning the principal trends of present-day society: Can socialism be wedded to democracy, can social ownership of "the means of production" be squared in practice with all the democratic civil liberties? The Czechoslovaks have determined to make the experiment. They feel themselves particularly well suited to the task, since Czechoslovakia, alone among the Socialist countries, was at one time a vigorous democratic state.

The experiment was mapped out in the Czechoslovak Communist Party's Action Program, approved by the April plenum of the Central Committee. Some of the democratic reforms contained in the program have already been put into effect: most importantly, the abolition of censorship, the granting of full freedom of expression to all the mass media and to the widely proliferating non-Communist interest groups. Substantial steps toward the separation of party, government and judiciary have been taken. A thorough investigation of the crimes committed during the fifties and a full rehabilitation of the victims of Stalinist terror have begun. Further reforms are to be ratified by the forthcoming Party Congress in September and codified in the new constitution which is about to be drafted.

Those are the moves that have produced the ideological argument between Prague and Moscow. The Soviets believe that the exercise of democratic liberties means an end to the leading role of the Communist Party and the rise of "counterrevolution." Their defeatism is countered by Prague's optimistic assumption that the essential truth represented by the party is strong enough to prevail in a democratic dialogue with any opposition group. Their position is defined in their Action Program: "The Communist Party depends on the voluntary support of the people. It is not implementing its leading role by ruling over the society but by faithfully serving its free, progressive Socialist development. It cannot impose its authority, but must constantly acquire it through its actions. It cannot enforce its line by order, but only by the work of its members and the veracity of its ideals."

We are witnessing, however, not merely an abstract ideological dispute. It is also a clash between the old interpretation of communism and the new. The Czechoslovaks are simply trying to suit Communist theory to the demands of a modern technological state. Modern technology cannot be squared with the intransigent dogma and strict controls that are still the bulwarks of the Soviet system. Similarly, the individual initiative and personal responsibility that are essential to its progress cannot be limited to a thin stratum of technocrats, managers, scientists and researchers, but must be spread widely among the people. Hence, a new economic model cannot be realized without an equally new political model.

What J. K. Galbraith once said about the Western dilemma aptly sums up its Eastern variety: "Ideas in social science always survive by a considerable margin the events that make them obsolete. After the foundations erode, the façade is still held up for a time by the vested interest of minds that do not wish to change." This is why the problem will stay with us, no matter how hard the inflexible minds might try to suppress, or perhaps even obliterate it. The Czechoslovak way opens a road to the future.

Far from trying to endanger the Socialist structure, the Czechoslovak party liberals launched their "peaceful revolution" last January precisely in order to create the non-existent prestige of the Communist Party, to build bridges between the party and the rest of the population (among the 14 million citizens, there are only 1.5 million Communists); and within the party itself, between the top echelons and the rest of the membership.

In the first "revolutionary" months their liberalizing program met with massive support. Later came doubts and hesitations. People became tired of all the speech making. Even the most outspoken and incendiary orations seemed unable to stop a creeping apathy which was the result of the previous twenty years of demagoguery and which was again beginning to immobilize the recently resuscitated "public opinion."

And then, almost literally overnight, the party achieved its goal. For the first time in history a Communist party acquired a mandate not by force but through the free and, what is more, enthusiastic support of the overwhelming majority of the people. How did it happen? It was a result of a combination of the party's liberalizing program, the freedoms it instituted, its purposeful reawakening of national traditions, the affronts all these gestures had received from the Warsaw Quintet, plus—most importantly—the uncompromising stand Dubcek and his team took when faced with threats. Instead of caving in under the well-calculated, concerted menace of the Soviets and their four loyal allies, Dubcek faced it. He returned the challenge, not in the boorish manner in which it arrived but calmly, with dignity, with fastidious politeness. At that moment Alexander Dubcek became a hero to the people for whom he speaks.

Ever since Munich the Czechoslovaks have been resigned to seeing their leaders yield to threats, shamefully retreating under pressure. The last spontaneous gesture the nation had made was in 1938, when its volunteers and regulars defiantly rushed to defend the frontiers against Hitler. Then came their silent return, their silent rage, and finally just silence. The backbone of the nation had been broken. The resuscitation after the war was partial and short-lived.

Therefore, when the exchange of letters between the Warsaw Quintet and Dubcek's team appeared all over the Republic in special editions, people were at first stunned.

Behrendt—Algemeen Handelsblad (Amsterdam)
Communist Meeting

They could not believe their eyes. And then a great wave of enthusiasm began to swell, as the Czechoslovaks realized that, unbelievably, they had again become citizens of a sovereign state, that they could again trust their leaders and be proud of their country. Those under 40 felt this pride and this trust for the first time in their lives. There followed an avalanche of letters, telegrams, notes, postcards, resolutions, telephone calls from all over the country, expressions of loyalty to the liberal leaders and to Dubcek personally, and of unequivocal support for the democratization program. There were also messages from Czechs on trips abroad. They assured their leaders and their countrymen that they would return at once, if their presence was needed. For the last twenty years Czechoslovaks have been running away from, not back to, their country.

All this explains why, to the amazement of Western correspondents who have once more flocked to Prague, the Czechs and Slovaks are so relaxed and so supremely calm, in spite of all the angry saber rattling and the rumbling of the tanks at their very doorsteps. With the regained dignity and self-respect came outpourings of love. In the streets people beam at one another, they all look as though they wished to fall into one another's arms. They even rather love their "misguided" neighbor. With an indulgent chuckle, they contrast the clumsiness exhibited by the Russian bear with the foxlike cleverness and grace of "their" Dubcek.

But over and above the gentle humor, there is acute awareness that Czechoslovakia stands at a crucial point of its history. Hence the urgent tone of the "Message," addressed by the writers to the Czechoslovak leaders on the eve of their confrontation with the Soviet Politburo. The message has now been signed by literally millions of people throughout the country, in a kind of "plebiscite" largely organized by students. Its aim was to strengthen the leaders by a massive show of support. This further demonstration of total unity created an astonishing mood. It can be almost physically touched, yet it is hard to describe. This is how Athens must have felt on the eve of Salamis. Comparison with a Greek polis is not too far off the mark. There is the same active participation of all citizens in the destiny of their country, the same familiarity of speech, the same intimate relationship between the leaders and the citizens. All these animate the text of the message:

As many times before in the history of mankind, a few men will decide the fate of millions. It is difficult and we want to help you by expressing our support. The history of our country over the past centuries is a history of bondage. Except for two short intervals we have been condemned to create our national existence illegally. We have several times stood on the brink of disaster. . . . The moment has come when . . . we have found the beginnings of hope not only for ourselves, but also for others. . . . We expected the whole Socialist camp to be first to welcome with sympathy this development. Instead, we are being accused of treason. . . . All we are striving for can be expressed in four words: Socialism, alliance, sovereignty, and freedom. . . . Speak on behalf of the people who in these days have ceased to be merely an abstract term and have become a force creating history. . . . Act, explain, but unanimously defend the path on which we have set out and from which we do not intend to depart alive. . . . Keep us in mind. You are writing a fateful page of the history of Czechoslovakia. Write with deliberation but, above all, with courage. We trust you.

HARRY GOLDEN

IN 1964, Republican Sen. Strom Thurmond couldn't restrain himself from leaping from the sidewalk to join Barry Goldwater's parade wending through Greenville, S.C. The folks along the way cheered louder and longer for Barry and Strom than they would have cheered for Gen. Robert E. Lee had he defeated Ulysses S. Grant.

Before the Republican National Convention this month, Senator Thurmond said that the federal government is a monster which must be curbed. Here is what his South Carolina receives each year from the wicked federal government:

Veterans: All cash benefits	$50,148,362.00
Public Service Activities	3,422,346.00
Employment Security Commission . .	5,013,098.00
Public Schools of South Carolina . .	7,445,706.75
Highway Department of S. Carolina .	42,000,000.00
ARA Funds	6,079,158.00
Federal Payments to Farmers	21,500,000.00

As of today, 264,361 people in South Carolina receive Social Security. A total of $14,084,824 is poured into the South Carolina economy monthly.

For the past thirty years, not only South Carolina but the entire South has been a sort of federal preserve like Yellowstone National Park—only with people getting the goodies instead of bear cubs. Barry Goldwater, the Republican, had promised to turn the schools back to the states, and turning the schools back to the states to anyone born below the Mason-Dixon line meant preserving the Southern way of life, suh. Three weeks ago in Winston-

Salem, N.C., Gov. Ronald Reagan of California repeated that he wanted to do the same. A group of earnest Tar Heels turned somersaults.

During the Republican National Convention, Richard Nixon held a secret meeting with Southern delegates at which, it is reported, he proposed a special legislation without their consent, just like John C. Calhoun. Nixon told these awe-struck delegates that he personally did not like open housing, and was only talking about it to get it out of the way—to bury it in a coffin of rhetoric.

Harry Truman let the Southerners stamp out of the 1948 Democratic Party convention rather than withdraw the civil rights plank. What Harry said of the whole region was: "You can have it, I don't want it, it belongs to you." So Strom Thurmond carried some of the Confederate states and the South ceased to be a Democratic Party preserve.

The South will vote Republican or for Wallace because it is conservative, because it is only beginning to industrialize, and because it likes Republicans and Governor Wallace. Its largest cities are crossroads compared to the Northern industrial complexes of Detroit or Cleveland—or Buffalo for that matter. This year Hubert Humphrey is going to say to Richard Nixon and George Wallace, "You can have it, I don't want it, it belongs to you." And by doing so will make himself a better bet to succeed Lyndon B. Johnson.

A Presidential candidate should not have to make a deal with the guys on his side. Rutherford B. Hayes had to make deals with the South or he would never have reached the White House. Dwight D. Eisenhower didn't, although he thought he had to when he waved his hands and shouted over the public address system, in Columbia, S.C.: "I always stand up when they play Dixie." Adlai Stevenson declared to the same audience, "I cannot say one thing up North and another thing down here."

Richard Nixon thinks he can. Making a deal costs a man something. Making deals will probably cost the Republicans another election and the next time around the Democrats will again say the same thing to the South: "You can have it, I don't want it, it belongs to you."

LETTERS (Continued from page 130)

him in the record time of twenty-seven minutes without having seen the murder weapon, or having heard testimony that Newton had been seen wielding it, or having asked any questions? Why does he not mention that the grand jury was all white and that the United States Court of Appeals refused to quash the indictment that was challenged on those grounds?

It is regrettable too that Harris says nothing of the repeated harassment of the Black Panthers, by means of arrests, searches and provocations on the part of the Oakland police, a list of which would be nearly as long as his article and as germane as any of the innuendoes he casts. An examination of such facts might have led Harris to conclude not that "the Black Panthers seem to be a dead-end movement" but that the objective of the Oakland police appears to be to exterminate the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense. It is bad enough to try Mr. Newton in the newspapers. If he can't get a fair trial in The Nation, where can he get it?

Martin Birbach, Associate Professor
San Jose State College

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: If Professor Birbach wants to say there is injustice toward black Americans, of course I agree. In fact, I thought I made it clear that the Black Panthers were driven into their present state of mind by their sense of outrage against society.

I wonder how carefully Professor Birbach read my article. I wrote about the continuing legal challenge against "the right of a grand jury composed almost entirely of upper-middle-class whites to vote indictments on poor blacks." And I cannot see why Professor Birbach appears to find I failed to describe Mr. Seale's fear of police injustice when I wrote: "Seale is almost always on the move, showing up at rallies and then disappearing for the night to places where he hopes the police cannot find him."

I can go on point by point: the case of Mr. Cleaver's parole is being considered now by the District Court of Appeal; the question whether the grand jury had probable cause to vote an indictment can be raised in any criminal case and can only be answered by the trial itself, and the matter of whether the Black Panthers helped provoke the police raids is a matter on which people may differ.

I did not speculate on Huey Newton's guilt or innocence, but I did state briefly what the charges were, what the defense seemed to consist of and the curious fact that many of Newton's supporters regard his guilt or innocence as irrelevant. The place for the trial is not in the pages of The Nation but in the courtroom.

What distresses me is that those who profess to be supporting Huey Newton appear to be doing their best to inflame the community against him. He is on trial for his life, but pickets parade in front of the courthouse with signs like "Chairman Mao Says Free Huey." This may be exciting, but it underlines my point that the Black Panthers are engaging in suicidal tactics.

Michael Harris

reassuring Al Capp

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Eric Hoffer, the very loud and shrill voice of the so-called "silent center," regularly (in his Los Angeles Times column) makes common cause with George Wallace, the very loud and shrill voice of the vociferous extreme Right, in their continuous attack on intellectuals.

Hoffer, in a recent such column, quoted another ally of his as follows: "Al Capp said recently that although he has been for years a critic of American society it has only been since he began poking fun at pacifists that he has felt any fear for his life."

For Mr. Capp's and for Mr. Hoffer's edification—it wasn't a pacifist who murdered Robert F. Kennedy.

It wasn't a pacifist who murdered Martin Luther King, Jr.

It wasn't a pacifist who murdered Che Guevara.

It wasn't a pacifist who murdered Lee Harvey Oswald.

It wasn't a pacifist who murdered John F. Kennedy.

It wasn't a pacifist who murdered Malcolm X.

It wasn't a pacifist who murdered Medgar Evers.

It wasn't a pacifist who murdered Patrice Lumumba.

Pacifists are not behind the campaign to kill any effective anti-gun legislation.

Pacifists did not mastermind the greatest bombing in history—the one that sets new records in death and destruction with each new day and each new aerial sortie.

Jack Hughes

tip from the Irish

Rice, Minn.

DEAR SIR: Have any people anywhere kept their country out of war by resistance to their government's conscription laws? The answer is a resounding yes.

Ireland, alone of the British Dominions, escaped the madness of World War I by setting up the cry, "no blood tax" in answer to England's attempt to enforce the military draft of Irishmen. So fierce was the resistance to having their sons dragged into the holocaust in France that England chose not to try to enforce the draft in Ireland.

Is this the way, and possibly the only way, to stop the brutal, futile, stupid business of war?

Stewart Graves

trees and guns

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: When the Sierra Club campaigned against the proposed despoilment of the Grand Canyon area the Internal Revenue Service removed its tax-exempt status.

On the other hand, the IRS says it's O.K. for the National Rifle Association to lobby against gun controls and still remain tax-exempt. The NRA, for all practical purposes, is a mouthpiece of the gun-manufacturing industry.

All of which is a pretty good index of the mentality and morality of the IRS and/or its bosses higher up in the government. Thumbs down on the preservation of life and the living. Support for the merchants of death.

Ken Pagerin

BOOKS & THE ARTS

New Lease for Liberalism

TOWARDS A NEW PAST: Dissenting Essays in American History. Edited by Barton J. Bernstein. Pantheon Books. 364 pp. $6.95.

THE CORPORATE IDEAL IN THE LIBERAL STATE: 1900-1918. By James Weinstein. Beacon Press. 263 pp. $7.50.

RONALD RADOSH

Mr. Radosh teaches history at Queensborough Community College, City University of New York. He is editor, with Louis Menashe, of Teach-Ins U.S.A.: Reports, Opinions, Documents (Praeger).

Since historians are themselves affected by the time, place and circumstances in which they compose history, it is not surprising that in the 1950s they joined the Great American Celebration. "Believing that the nation had achieved affluence and that political power was widely distributed," Barton J. Bernstein writes, historians "affirmed the triumph of liberalism and often found in the New Deal dramatic proof of the success of non-ideological reform."

But with the birth of the civil rights movement, the new awareness of poverty, and the fruits of imperial intervention spelled out in Vietnam and Latin America, the old assumptions about America began to shatter. In Towards a New Past Bernstein has collected varied examples of how a new and younger group of historians are reassessing our heritage. Contributors were chosen who have a "series of approaches or interpretations," but who in Bernstein's eyes have broken with the general views of consensus historians.

The collection creates a somewhat uneven impression, ranging from the rather traditional essays by Staughton Lynd, Marilyn Blatt Young and James McPherson to the perceptive and radical essays of Michael Lebowitz and Christopher Lasch. (Lasch's essay on the cultural cold war appeared in a special issue of The Nation, September 11, 1967.)

Robert F. Smith particularly breaks new ground in his revisionist essay on the origins of World War II, refuting the theory that an innocent United States responded passively to the aggressive actions of other powers. Rather than being seen as "befuddled and defensive," the United States is treated as an "imperial-minded power with ambitions and goals" similar to those of most nation states.

Smith does not separate diplomatic and ideological issues from economic conflicts. While American leaders did not want war, they were willing to fight for an order in which "the fruits of an imperial position" would be preserved.

The most subtle and enticing suggestions are contained in the essay by Eugene D. Genovese. An avowed Marxist himself, Genovese departs from Marxist predecessors and insists that an accurate understanding of the slave South calls for a break with determinism, a narrow economic interpretation and an "insipid glorification of the lower classes." He berates Marx and Engels for failing to examine the origins, history and ideology of the slaveholding class, and asks American Marxists to acknowledge that "certain elements of the slaveholders' ideology deserve the attention and respect of those who would build a socialist order." Jefferson Davis is treated as a class-conscious, socially responsible leader who fulfilled the duties which his class and society expected of him.

Genovese thus raises the critical problem of how a ruling class maintains its hegemony. He states that a ruling class "must develop a comprehensive world outlook that transcends its immediate and particular interests and that, however partially, identifies itself with the values and aspirations of the people as a whole."

How the American ruling class has gained the loyalty of the populace, and made its own world view presentable as the general will, is the implicit theme in what is the most important book written by a radical historian since publication of William Appleman Williams' Contours of American History. Put alongside Gabriel Kolko's study of the progressive era, James Weinstein's The Corporate Ideal in the Liberal State challenges Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.'s assertion that "liberalism in America has been ordinarily the movement on the part of the other sections of society to restrain the power of the business community."

This belief, Weinstein argues, lies behind the false consciousness that liberalism was and is anti-big-business. Since many reformers did not understand how liberalism functioned, they inadvertently helped the corporations maintain their hegemony by furthering the belief that movements for regulation of the economy and social reform (Pure Food and Drug Act, Federal Trade Commission, Workmen's Compensation acts, Social Security, etc.) were victories won by the people in a fight against the "trusts."

Weinstein carefully reveals that liberalism has been the favored ideology of American business leaders. While reforms developed impetus from the needs of those on the bottom of the social structure, few of them were enacted without the approval and/or guidance of large corporate interests. Weinstein's volume is, in part, a lengthy analysis of the activity of the National Civic Federation. Organized in 1900, the group was led by sophisticated class-conscious corporation leaders (men like Andrew Carnegie and Mark Hanna) in conjunction with "responsible" trade union leaders (Samuel Gompers) and noted professionals. While not entirely successful in its goal of gaining recognition for conservative trade unionism, the National Civic Federation began to change the consciousness of business leaders and to point out the need for a consensus between business and labor, to gain "accommodation to the large corporation system" so that business uncertainty would be ended.

Part of the reason business leaders favored reform was their strong fear of anti-corporation radicalism. When the American Socialist Party developed increased strength after 1911, it alone represented a challenge outside the framework of consensus. To deal with the Socialists, corporation leaders perceived that they had to make a distinction between reforms that were "socialistic and anarchistic in principle," and those which Socialists "would naturally favor," but which were "not necessarily in conflict with the underlying principles of the existing industrial order." Few were the radicals like Robert R. LaMonte, who understood that reforms were the job of progressives; that Socialists had to make only "impossible demands" which embodied what Weinstein calls "a vision of socialism" that raises "the question of control over fundamental decisions."

Given a commitment to use the power of the state to rationalize corporation capitalism, it is not surprising that National Civic Federation members like John Hays Hammond, a mining engineer close to the Guggenheim interests, came out for reforms that envisioned the entire New Deal. Hammond favored industrial peace and called for labor unions that were in the "hands of the best class of labor leaders," in order to prevent formation of unions "of the radical stripe." He also favored a federal public works program, which he termed a prerequisite "to removing just causes of social unrest." Employers had to anticipate labor's demand, and avoid making unreasonable concessions "at the point of the pistol."

Such men did indeed have the sophistication "to move to the left in the face of real, imminent or anticipated threats" from anti-corporation radicals. How they did this is revealed by Weinstein in his discussion of the Commission on Industrial Relations. Sponsored by Presidents Taft and Wilson to investigate the causes of extensive labor violence in 1911, the commission was composed of representatives from capital, labor and the "public." The commission chairman, Frank P. Walsh, bravely condemned and exposed John D. Rockefeller's role in the Colorado coal massacre of 1914. His harsh attack on a leading man of wealth might have made future cooperation between capital and labor more difficult; it might even have made many workers lose faith in the system and turn toward socialism.

But Weinstein points out that though such a revelation might be damaging if left to the Socialists, when it came from an official government agency the effect was exactly the opposite. Attacking Rockefeller for "social irresponsibility" did not challenge the consensus in which the corporations remained dominant. In 1968, the Kerner Commission argues that white racism caused civil disorders, and tells us that America is a racist society. What appeared radical and threatening when voiced by black militants, becomes grounds for hope and faith in the existing system when stated by "responsible" Negroes and government officials.

World War I gave Wilson a chance to show that a liberal administration could respond to business needs without being anti-labor, and to solidify support by allowing reformers and pro-war Socialists to sit on government boards. In reality the era of laissez faire had passed. It had been replaced by a statist corporate capitalism that sought to enhance its legitimacy by merging into its structure potentially dissident groups. Workers, farmers and small businessmen had less real strength, but they had succeeded in gaining "recognition as legitimate social forces," while the reforms that were developed were limited to those which would make corporation capitalism more efficient.

What James Weinstein suggests is therefore of utmost urgency for those who seek to create a new humanist society. Reformers, "no matter how radical they thought themselves to be," found themselves submerged in reform movements "whose underlying purpose is to reduce the inharmonies of the existing system." This occurred because of the "absence of a revolutionary party with a comprehensive critique of the existing society and a comprehensive vision of a new one." The corporate liberals have made (and continue to make) necessary modifications that create a façade of harmony, while propping up the corporate capitalist system. Many radicals accepted the changes, and shared the illusion that they had gained real power in society. By showing how liberalism works to maintain corporate capitalism, James Weinstein helps to shed false consciousness about the system's nature, and provides a tool for the possible creation of a revolutionary Socialist party that may challenge the social order of corporate capitalism.

Beyond Libel

LIBEL AND ACADEMIC FREEDOM:
A Law Suit Against Political Extremists.
By Arnold M. Rose. University of Minnesota Press. 287 pp. $7.95.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

In the sixties, the town-and-gown conflicts which have historically riven college campuses (especially in land grant college communities) have escalated as students and faculties have broadened their civic and campus concerns. But in contrast to the thirties and the cold-war era, the new Kulturkampf launched by the ultra right has, for the most part, resulted in a rout of in situ witch hunters and their legislative allies. One of these garden-variety, anti-subversive attacks on the faculty of the University of Minnesota took place in 1963-64, inspired by an ultra-rightist organization, Christian Research, Inc., headed by one Gerda Koch. The campaign, which ultimately led to a legislative investigation, was fused by two "exposés," pillorying a sociology professor at the university, the late Dr. Arnold Rose (he died in January of this year) as a Communist collaborator and security risk because of his association with Gunnar Myrdal (dubbed a "notorious Swedish Communist") in the writing of An American Dilemma. The attack on Dr. Rose was launched while he was a candidate for the Minnesota state legislature and continued after he was elected.

Dr. Rose responded in January, 1964, with a suit for libel of which this book is a lucid and absorbing account. In support of its case, the defendants introduced "documentary proof" (Miss Koch transported into the courtroom a library of more than 200 government reports, scores of research files and dozens of rightist texts on subversion in the United States) purporting to show the demonic goings-on of the Federal Reserve Bank and the role of the Council on Foreign Relations as the invisible government for which the Communists served as a front, the whole liberally spiced with anti-Semitism. The jury was unimpressed and awarded Dr. Rose $10,000 compensatory damages and an equal amount in punitive damages (to deter a repetition of the offending publications).

More instructive than the defendant's futile attempts to use the courtroom as a propaganda forum is the genealogy of the demonstration that Dr. Rose was subversive. Subsequent to the Supreme Court's desegregation decision in 1954 Southern legislators, both in the Senate and House, launched a co-ordinated attack on the Court. Senator Eastland, its leader and organizer, charging that the Supreme Court's desegregation decision was tainted with subversion because a footnote had made reference to Gunnar Myrdal's seminal study of the Negro problem, labeled a number of Dr. Myrdal's research aides (but not Dr. Rose) as "identified"—a talismanic term of authentication in rightist rhetoric—members of Communist-front organizations. Of Dr. Myrdal himself, the Mississippi Senator said merely that he was a "Socialist who had served the Communist cause."

During the debate in the House when it was the turn of Jimmy Davis of Atlanta to speak his piece, he was hard put to find something new to say. No intellectual grant, he proceeded to charge that Myrdal was a "notorious Swedish Communist."

In the August, 1957, hearings of the Senate Internal Security subcommittee on legislation to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the most spectacular testimony—if one could call it that—was a document submitted by a mysterious Col. Tom Hutton on behalf of an even more mysterious outfit, SPX Associates. ("SPX" refers to an alleged "Soviet principle No. 10"—the principle of paralyzing the countries of the free world into an abandonment of self-protection from Communist designs.) This "geopolitical" tract repeated the Commentary is one of the world's great magazines. But you can have it for nothing.

No strings attached. Just an invitation to accept the current issue of Commentary free of charge.

We're betting that the one issue will be enough to hook you. If it does you'll be joining a small, but elite group of people who regard Commentary as one of the world's great magazines.

Our readers would just about fill Yankee Stadium. But what an extraordinary group it would be. They'd range politically from Dwight Macdonald (who calls Commentary the best magazine for any purpose) to Clare Boothe Luce (who calls it the only literate magazine published in America).

An impressive delegation from Washington would be there too—ranging from occupants of the White House to some of their most severe critics on Capitol Hill.

A brilliant array of intellectuals would be in the crowd and here too the range would be wide—from, for instance, William F. Buckley, Jr. to Paul Goodman.

Our Aim Is Not To Please

Commentary is a magazine of opinion concerned with everything of interest to people of intellect, taste and curiosity. Its aim is to clarify issues, challenge oversimplifications, discourage polarizations, encourage original thinking, and spark honest debate.

Obviously, to earn the high regard of many highly regarded people it had better be challenging, literate, and unafraid of controversy. Commentary is. It must avoid platitudes and pat answers. Commentary does. Its contributors must be among the most lucid and pertinent experts anywhere. They are.

In any issue you might find Michael Harrington, Daniel P. Moynihan, or Bayard Rustin exploring serious problems of the moment.

Or contemporary historians like Theodore Draper, George Lichtheim, and Robert L. Heilbroner going below the surface of urgent questions and setting them in an illuminating long-range perspective.

Or such penetrating literary critics as Edmund Wilson, Lionel Trilling, and Leslie A. Fiedler. Jack Richardson, one of America's foremost younger playwrights, reviews the theater for us. America's most important fiction writers have appeared in our pages: Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud, Philip Roth, James Baldwin among them.

Commentary's excellence has not gone unnoticed by educators. Reprints from it are used as texts on university campuses from coast to coast.

We'll Give You A Good Argument

Commentary is probably the only magazine in the world that has sparked the formation of discussion groups: over one hundred from Manhattan, New York to Manhattan, Kansas and on to San Francisco, too.

Groups interested in current affairs get together each month to discuss the contents of our magazine. Although these groups began spontaneously, we can recognize a good thing when we see it. Now we provide a monthly discussion guide for any group interested in using Commentary magazine's thought-provoking articles to start arguments.

Commentary was initiated two decades ago by the American Jewish Committee to make a significant contribution to serious publishing in America. It is still published by the Committee. But, now, then, it does not serve any parochial interest, nor does it seek to advance anyone's special line. Commentary was ecumenical long before Vatican II, and remains. The New York Times describes it, "an exciting and important forum for coherent ideas about the whole American culture."

You Have Nothing To Lose

Commentary is not a magazine for everyone. It has something special that not everyone appreciates. That's why we are making this unusual "see-for-yourself" offer.

A year's subscription, 12 monthly issues, costs $9. ($12 at the newsstands.) A 7-month subscription costs $5.50. There are no cut rates, no gift rates, no special renewal rates. However, we would like you to see for yourself why Commentary is regarded as essential reading, and we will send you your first copy free.

If the first issue is everything we say it is and you want to continue getting it, do nothing. We'll start your subscription with the second issue you receive. If you decide Commentary is not for you after reading the first issue, tell us. We'll refund your money in full.

You have nothing to lose and a great magazine to gain. And if we ever get our readers together at Yankee Stadium, we'll reserve a seat for you.

Commentary Magazine
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022

NA-2

Gentlemen:

I accept your challenge and your offer. Send me the current issue of Commentary free, and enter my subscription. If I decide that Commentary is not for me, I'll let you know and you'll cancel my subscription and reimburse me in full, plus a quarter for my postage, time, and trouble.

☐ 7 months $5.50 ☐ 3 years $24.00 ☐ Check attached
☐ 12 months $9.00 ☐ 5 years $35.00 ☐ Please bill me
(Outside U.S.A. add $1.50 per year)

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Eastland and Davis charges against Myrdal and concluded that the Supreme Court's decisions "have done more for enemy forces and objectives than might have been accomplished by any other agency or form of paralysis short of actual overthrow of the American Government."

The product of a secret collaboration with the Senate committee staff and characterized by staff consultant Sourwine as "a work of some scholarship," it was launched by the committee as a dazzling piece of documentation—the Dead Sea scrolls of anti-subversion. The committee printed Colonel Hutton's dissertation separately as an appendix to the hearings, thus obviating the necessity for Senate permission to reprint and circulate additional copies. It was subsequently produced for mass distribution by the Government Printing Office as an official document under the committee's frank. The title of the reprint was cautiously altered from the "Supreme Court as an Instrument of Communist Global Conquest" to the "Supreme Court as an Instrument of Global Conquest," but with a superscription that the Communists had tried to suppress it.

The charges against Myrdal now doubly "documented" were made available for the elaboration by local rightist groups into anti-subversive "documented exposés"—a uniquely American political art form by which dossiers of "identified" subversives originating with legislative committees are reticulated and projected over huge areas of political expression. (The Herald of Freedom has just published an exposé of George Ball which establishes his subversion by a chain of proof which includes the fact that his former law partner was at one time a director of a publication the wife of whose editor was once a law partner of an "identified Communist.")

The functioning of the entire ultra movement is geared to this exposé technology. Rightists trade dossiers like postage stamps and many leading ultra groups were launched by purchasing libraries of files, dossiers and reports from older outfits. The bedrock of the entire system is the government publication (how much more "documentary" can you get?): the Government Printing Office is the ultras' principal publishing house. The grimly pedantic way the ultras preen themselves on their devotion to "facts" and "documentation" (Stormer's None Dare Call It Treason boasts 819 footnotes) is reflected in Miss Koch's choice of names for her publication ("Facts for Action") and its sponsoring organization, "Christian Research, Inc." This title which suggests scholarship anointed by evangelical authority is a Waughishly comic mask for a purveyor of potted political exposés.

Dr. Rose's verdict was reversed on appeal and a new trial was ordered on the ground that the instructions to the jury had failed to take proper account of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the New York Times case, which ruled that the Constitution permits a state to afford a remedy in a libel action brought by a public official for criticism of his official conduct only when a false statement is made with the knowledge that it was false, or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not, a landmark decision because it significantly relates free speech to the imperatives of self-government. The Court subsequently applied similarly spacious standards to libel actions brought by "public figures." Since Miss Koch's charges were made while Dr. Rose was a candidate for public office or actually serving, he was plainly covered by the Times ruling.

As far as I know, Dr. Rose's is the first resort to a political libel suit as a means of vindicating academic freedom. Apart from the action's impact on free speech, its soundness and utility are highly debatable. And this would be so, even if Dr. Rose were not a candidate for office, an elected official and a public figure within the meaning of the Times case and its progeny, with full opportunity to reply to the charges, backed by the prestige of his reputation and community standing but also, for most of the period of the attacks, by his legislative immunity, an opportunity which he exploited with great power, skill and effectiveness.

Whether used as a shield or a sword, a libel action can acquire a symbolic importance, with civic consequences far beyond its literal reach. A favorable verdict supported by substantial compensatory and punitive damages may implicate a community judgment on a broad scale while the jury's thumbs-down may condemn not merely the courtroom gladiator but a whole body of principles and invite wholesale abuse of those who share them. The risks can be overwhelming.

For members of vulnerable and exposed minorities, libel is in any event a dubious means of redress. The trial itself is converted into an officially sanctioned instrument of smear as the plaintiff is pilloried by mountains of hearsay testimony and documents admitted into evidence not to establish the truth of the statement but to show how reasonably motivated the defendant was, a distinction few juries can grasp. The plaintiff's entire life is dredged for matters which are ventilated to prejudice the jury but which are ostensibly offered to show that damages were minimal because his reputation was already tarnished. His cross-examination is frequently a saturnalia of obtusation, abusive baiting and endless inflammatory variations on the libel itself.

A libel lawsuit, of course, is not invariably ill advised but when brought for ideological or libertarian reasons may endanger the very principles it seeks to protect. The size of the stakes—the plaintiff must win big if he is to win at all—inevitably forces the plaintiff into a jury-pandering strategy which disowns his unpopular opinions or demonstrates that he is a more effective anti-Communist than the defendant. In restraining his adversary's freedom, he also diminishes his own.

The plaintiff may begin with a neutral assertion of the stigma (disloyalty, conspiracy, sedition) attached to the Communist charge, but he usually ends by endorsing it as well deserved. For example, Dr. Rose, in striving for a large jury verdict (an award of merely nominal damages might leave faculty freedoms under a greater cloud than before), adduced testimony from a colleague that his integrity as a scholar was justifiably compromised by the charge that he was a Communist collaborator and that his opportunities for employment would be deservedly impaired.

The testimony implicitly claimed that scholars in the social sciences among whom Dr. Rose had a formidable reputation (he subsequently became president-elect of the American Sociological Association) would be so impressed by the mere accusation that he was a Communist collaborator as to suspect his integrity: that they would not investigate the biased source of the charge and, finally, that even if they did, they would resolve the issue of truth in favor of his accuser. Such contentions are unworthy of the academic freedom in whose service they were advanced.

Dr. Rose's basic complaint against the defendants is not primarily that they lied about him but that they have removed themselves from the democratic process. And so they have: the ultras' anti-communism has increasingly moved from exposés to crank calls, harassment and anonymous letters (Dr. Rose received the full treatment) to vandalism, shootings and bombings by fevered activists. "Conspiracy" is no mere metaphor but an accurate description of the politics of the ultras. They see their enemies as a conspiracy of real people, each of whom must be individually identified, cornered and destroyed. The exposé is a form of action in the soft, an interim incitement to a deserved injury pending an ultimate accounting in the chilling eschatological politics of deferred reckoning. While the exposé is typically an attack through a publication on an identified individual and thus meets the basic requirement of a libel action that the publication be "of and concerning the plaintiff," the evil of the exposé is not that it is false but that true or false it threatens the public order. The conventional libel action is about as appropriate a therapy for the exposé as an income tax evasion charge is for racketeering.

This is not to urge that sanctions be devised to deal with the ultras' exposé activities, such as the recent wholesale denial by the Internal Revenue Service of tax exemption, on the strained ground that these groups are not truly "educational." Like a latter-day Loki, the ultra defies judgment because his condemned head cannot be severed from his constitutionally protected neck. But the ultras can be contained without impairing their constitutional freedoms simply by denying them the support of the security establishment which collaborates with them and supplies the "documentation" for the myth—central to their very existence—that the country is under a permanent threat of internal subversion.

of thousands and a Victorian proliferation of subplots, and the leisurely, old-fashioned movement of the story will not satisfy fans of Nathalie Sarraute. The title poses the question: what does a good man do in the world? In answering it, this fully realized, teeming, tough-minded novel reveals a structure of fable beneath its Dickensian richness; but its thesis resists paraphrase to a much greater degree than a number of these new stories.

An Hour of Last Things contains thirteen stories and they date from as far back as 1951. The precisely focused and meticulously observed title story examines the reluctant attempts of a recently widowed 38-year-old social worker to discover herself. It is a variation on the old theme of houses. Betty Hollander moves after the death of her husband from their severe Manhattan apartment to a Victorian house on Staten Island only to learn that changing one's life isn't going to be all that easy. "Into the

Private Responsibility

AN HOUR OF LAST THINGS: And Other Stories. By George P. Elliott. Harper & Row. 292 pp. $5.95.

STANLEY POSS

Mr. Poss teaches English at California State College at Fresno.

Asked in 1962 whether he regarded himself as "an essentially Christian writer," George P. Elliott replied: "Ethically, a Christian writer, yes," adding however that he was not primarily inclined toward didacticism though he intended his books to be "morally instructive." Since then his line seems to have hardened somewhat. Certainly one can find in his new collection of stories, An Hour of Last Things, an increasing predilection for fable and "message," compared with his widely praised first collection Among the Dangs. Fortunately, his talent for giving a story its head puts a skin on almost all he says, so that the old bones implied by the formidably eschatological title of this new book are for the most part decently covered.

Elliott, as a leading contender for the title of most important WASP fiction writer of his time, has always inclined to statement and allegory; but his wit and passion, his intelligence and patient artistry (he worked "intermittently" on his second novel David Knudsen for eleven years) lift him clear of the ranks of those message writers who, as someone said of one of our cruder naturalists, produce books in which everything is taken seriously except the writing. He began shakily with Parkliden Village, the story of a young Berkeley sociologist and a math professor's daughter with a passion for Harley-Davidsons. He then turned to poetry with a long idiomatic verse narrative Fever and Chills, whose chief action (adultery and its consequences) was to become an Elliott trademark along with such other recurring preoccupations as photography, abortions, houses (very big on this: in a 1962 interview he remarks that "Our public, social existence is nothing like as important as our private existence"), science and scientism, negative utopias, family romances, Chartres, academia ("the only world I have glimpsed more appalling than downtown Oakland seen at night from behind the wheel of a taxicab has been the English Department of one of the great universities"), perfect loveless sex, fathers, plain-song chant, and Christianity. Among the Dangs incorporates many of these preoccupations as does David Knudsen, the story of the photographer son of a Cal physicist who contracts fallout in the Pacific. Plainly a cautionary tale, it showed for the first time that, exotic appearances of some of the stories to the contrary (lost tribes in the Atlas Mountains or the "Eastern foothills of the Andes"), Berkeley/Oakland was Elliott's Yoknapatawpha; and as in that odd Southern kingdom, many of the characters from the separate tales either know or know of one another.

That remarkable collection of non-fiction pieces, A Piece of Lettuce ("Personal Essays on Books, Beliefs, American Places, and Growing Up in a Strange Country") followed. Its themes cast a wide net in whose folds one finds Orwell, Margaret Mead, Pound, autobiography, Pop art and mass cult and Kirsch and folkways of Southern California (where he grew up); Raymond Chandler and W. B. Yeats ("nonsensical, doubting, indecent, superstitious"); Leavis/Kenner/Fiedler/Winters/Frye versus the unreconstructed Common Reader, and Hyacinth Robinson (Henry James's improbably named anarchist from The Princess Cassamassima) and Tarzan of the Apes, together in the context of a failing California chicken ranch.

The fable element rather disappears in the next book, a bulky novel in which Elliott returns to his chosen place, Berkeley, and his chosen theme, the acceptance of moral responsibility, in the story of the coming apart of an academic family, a professor of law, his wife, and their three daughters. In the World has a cast

"A LITERARY EVENT. Graphic, haunting, skillfully written, meticulous, authoritative . . . faithfully and sensitively conveys Crane's charm, genius and tragedy . . . A VERY FINE BOOK."—Publishers' Weekly

Stephen Crane

A BIOGRAPHY

by
R. W.
Stallman

At all bookstores
$12.50

George
Braziller
New York

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT  MUTUAL REAL ESTATE
INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

► Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

Cone of Cold," the first story, is science fiction set in contemporary Berkeley, and the last story, "In a Hole," is a pure Kafkaesque tale. Together they frame and comment on the other stories. They reciprocate each other thematically as well. The first, a willingness of art and science, tells of a poet's willingness to enter "the cone of cold" past "absolute" zero (the science fiction machine of the physicist brothers at St. Anselm's, the poet's college, is called a "dynocryne") and of the physical and psychological changes that result; while the situation of the man in the cone-shaped hole at the end of the book reminds us that the dynocryne was buried 30 feet, though the unspecified setting is a devastated city in a vaguely nuclear future rather than a recognizable Berkeley. The poet's story suggests a Faustian pact with science. Stuart believes that the cryogenic experiment will enable him to write poems of undreamed-of originality, but finds in fact that he can write only when he breaks the pact and gets back his pre-transformed self. He gets out; the narrator of "In a Hole" doesn't: one needs a long spoon to dine with science. Of the remaining eleven stories, six utilize science fiction devices or take the form of fables, which leads me to think that such modes serve Elliott as her grotesque cartoons serve Flannery O'Connor: "to the hard of hearing you shout, and for the almost blind you draw large and startling figures."

Other stories in An Hour of Last Things include "Rilla," about an Oakland cabbage who wants to steer clear of women but can't and who betrays them both by betting in an idle, locker-room way that he can get Rilla, the dispatcher all the drivers leech for, in bed within three days. "Is He Dead?" is a not wholly convincing account of a decent district attorney faced with investigating the politically explosive death of a demagogic political-religious leader (Welch and the Birchers?).

"Words Words Words" tells of a sailor's discovery that the stylized proposal of marriage he planned to present to the chic Jane who dines on shrimp, lobster and white burgundy, and in whose New York flat logs flicker and chamber music is just audible, is as nothing compared to the fierce reality of a committed love which he learns from the first-grade teacher in Syracuse he thought he'd left behind along with his father's religion. The desolating "Better To Burn" picks up, in diary form, the story of David Knudsen's angrily rebellious sister, a Marxist who forsakes the WASP gentility of her home to take up with labor organizers and Socialists.

Elliott is a paleface. Though certainly not a mandarin writer, neither is he a black humorist. Nor does he present romanticized queers, junkies, or juvies and the violence and inarticulate brutality that often accompany them. His strength is his refusal to be modish, his tenacity in following his line, the hard moral core, the unapologetic message of his fictions. An Hour of Last Things refuses to capitalize on the success of its predecessor, and is not so distinguished a collection. But there's a stubborn integrity in this refusal, an integrity that can be seen also in Elliott's control, his complex clarity. "Jazz somehow evened up sides within her and made the dirty combatants embrace in a struggle so taut that when the music stopped they fell apart exhausted and she dared to look at them for a while or even to play with them" is, for instance, a sentence that couldn't be improved; it comes right, as Yeats said of verse, with a click like a closing box.

Huckleberry Finn Enriched

GEORGE MAYBERRY

Mr. Mayberry, critic and teacher, is a former literary editor of The New Republic.

One of the effects of the education explosion has been a vastly increased market for classroom-oriented editions of our literary classics. The unadorned text or the text with a brief critical introduction is now challenged by editions containing various forms of that favorite word of the educationists—enrichment. Among these, Huck Finn has been particularly subject to editorial adornment.

At present there are more than twenty paperback editions of Mark Twain's classic. For the affluent individual or school system there is The Art of Huckleberry Finn (Chandler, $3.95) which provides as text a facsimile of the first American edition, illustrated by E. W. Kemble; biographical and literary sources; selected criticism, including Lionel Trilling's notable introduction to the Rinehart edition (1948); and "Questions and Topics for Papers." Chandler also publishes a facsimile of the first edition, with simply an introduction and bibliography by Hamlin Hill. This is my favorite among paperback editions and, at $1.10, possibly the "best buy." The Harbrace Sourcebook—with text, sources, criticism, suggestions for papers and for further reading—is priced at $2.25. The Norton Critical Edition ($1.95) offers an annotated text, background and sources, criticism and bibliography (not annotated), but no questions or suggestions for papers. For $1.85, with nothing to enrich it except generous additional selections from Mark Twain and a masterful introduction by Bernard DeVoto, you can have Huckleberry Finn in the Viking Portable Library "Mark Twain." The most recent edition—and one of the best—is the Bobbs-Merrill Library of Literature Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, edited, with an introduction and notes by Leo Marx. Of special value is a Selected Bibliography with concise, meaningful evaluations of each item; the price of admission, however, is $1.50.

The least expensive (90c) Adventures of Huckleberry Finn to supply the reader with an accurate title page and the final line of the original is the Riverside Edition, edited, with an introduction that matches De Voto's, by Henry Nash Smith. In the Rinehart Edition (95c), which also includes the famous introduction by Lionel Trilling, we come to the first of those editions that cannot pass muster with The Society for the Prevention of "The" in the title of Adventures of Huckleberry Finn.

The Riverside and Rinehart editions are "enriched" primarily by their introductions. Mr. Smith adds a valuable "Note on the Text," the "Raft Passage" from "Life on the Mississippi," and "Some Examples of Mark Twain's Revisions." (Mr. Trilling's perceptive bibliographical note of 1948 is now, of course, out of date.) The big four of the mass paperback field (Signet, Dell, Bantam and Pocket) also mistle the book, The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, and give little evidence that they or their editors have otherwise examined the book Mark Twain wrote and largely saw through the press—which was his own publishing house. Signet and Dell (50c each) have not yet entered the area of true "enrichment." Signet is content to go with an "afterword"—a sharply written personal essay by George P. Elliott. Dell includes an excellent analysis by Wallace Stegner which is also a useful

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

WILL YOU HELP SEND AMERICAN DELEGATES TO WRITE A WORLD CONSTITUTION?

A CONVENTION TO DRAFT A WORLD CONSTITUTION BEGINS ON AUGUST 27, 1968 AT INTERLAKEN, SWITZERLAND AND CONTINUES AT WOLFACH, GERMANY ON SEPTEMBER 3. DELEGATES FROM MORE THAN 40 COUNTRIES HAVE ANNOUNCED THEIR INTENTION TO PARTICIPATE IN THIS IMPORTANT EFFORT WHICH IS BEING DEVELOPED BY THE WORLD CONSTITUTION AND PARLIAMENT ASSOCIATION. EACH DELEGATE IS REQUIRED TO HAVE AT LEAST 1,000 SUPPORTERS. THE FOLLOWING AMERICAN DELEGATES ASK FOR YOUR VOTE IN A GROUP BALLOT.

ARTHUR ARMSTRONG, Atascadero, Calif. Educational psychologist. Was Pres. World Affairs Council Calif., Sec'y. Campaign World Constitution.

J. ROBERT BEALL, Phoenix, Arizona. Businessman, poet, long-time supporter of Atlantic Union and principle of world federation.

LOLA BOSWELL, Washington, D.C. Lawyer, admitted U.S. Supreme Court. In preparatory congresses for World Constitution Convention.

SELMA BRACKMAN, Great Neck, N.Y. Photographers' agent. Humanist. Active in Women's Strike for Peace, Jeanette Rankin's Brigade, SANE.

HELEN CALLBECK, San Rafael, Calif. Medical social work supervisor, teacher 7 years in far East, del. World Assn., World Fed., Japan '52, '54.

EDWARD P. GOTTLIEB, New York, N.Y. Public school principal 10 years, author, active in school desegregation, Federation of Teachers.

MARGARET ISELY, Denver, Colorado. Nutritionist, Co-owner health food business, executive member of World Association since inception.

PHILIP ISELY, Denver, Colorado. Businessman, writer, Sec'y Gen. World Constitution and Parliament Assn. Maximalist platform for world government.

DOUGLAS MATTERN, Palo Alto, Calif. Tech. specialist electron physics. Chrmn. World Citizens League. Speaker, writer, peace movement organizer.

GUY WHEELER MEYER, Cornwall-on-Hudson, N.Y. Unitarian-Universalist min. Founder "New World Movement" to replace national loyalties with world loyalty.

LLOYD D. OXLEY, Phoenix, Arizona. Journalist, manufacturers' rep., public relations. Promoted World Constitution Convention abroad.

THANE READ, Tempe, Arizona. Economist, inventor, newspaper pub. and ed., proposes political movement of World Party, Exec. V. P. of the WCPA.

REV. ERIC L. ROBINSON, Portland, Oregon. Director of Greater Portland Council of Church's World Peace Committee.

AKE SANDLER, Los Angeles, Calif. Professor of Government. Fulbright scholar 1960. Author book on international relations, journalist.

BERNARD SINGER, Colonia, N.J. Teacher, veteran peace worker and youth leader. Chrmn. Union County SANE, United World Federalist affil'n.

JOHN M. SULLIVAN, Moscow, Idaho. Univ. prof. Lecturer on civil rights, foreign policy, abolition of war. Pres. Campaign World Constitution.

GLENN P. TURNER, Middleton, Wisc. Retired. LLB. Dr. Juris. Former legislator. Active interest in world law, Esperanto, world inter-language.

THOMAS J. WEAVER, Orem, Utah. Machinist, retired. Officer in steel workers' union 20 years, a director of Utah Co-op Association.

Your vote is vital to show support for the objective of world law built upon a world constitution. You are invited to participate further if you so desire but in any case please vote and send your ballot to the WORLD CONSTITUTION AND PARLIAMENT ASSOCIATION, 8800 W. 14th Avenue, Denver, Colorado 80215.

I vote for the people on this ballot as delegates to the World Convention to draft a World Constitution

(My x in box indicates support for all delegates)

☐ Armstrong, Beall, Boswell, Brackman, Callbeck, Gottlieb, Isely, M., Isely, P., Mattern, Meyer, Oxley, Read, Robinson, Sandler, Singer, Sullivan, Turner, Weaver

NAME STREET
CITY STATE ZIP

In addition: ☐ Please keep me informed of developments at the Convention

☐ I wish to contribute ☐ $1.00 ☐ $5.00 ☐ $10.00 ☐ $_____

In 1963, Pocket Books, under the imprint of the Washington Square Press, launched the Reader's Enrichment Series addressed "to the serious general reader or the student in class." While the editions examined above were designed primarily for college students and teachers, the Reader's Enrichment Series was aimed at the high school level. Bantam Books entered the enrichment business with its Pathfinder Editions in 1965.

The Reader's Enrichment edition of The (!) Adventures of Huckleberry Finn costs 75c. A "Reader's Supplement" of 34 pages provides barely adequate biographical and historical backgrounds, and the section "Features of the Author's Style" never comes to grips with that admittedly difficult subject. (A superficial attempt at character analysis yields: "In Jim, we have a truly lovable character.") The sections on writing skills, vocabulary development and spelling include the fascinating suggestion to study such words as "ingots," "nabob" and "reticule," "because they are popular with good writers and speakers." (These two quotations are not unrepresentative of the manner and tone of the editors.) "Ideas for Discussion and Report" barely touches on matters that have stirred serious readers of the book: the naive vernacular style, the moral ironies, the theme of river and shore, Twain's alienation from society. And the limited editorial vision is apparent in "Suggestions for Further Reading" where books "similar in mood" to Huckleberry Finn are listed: Little Men, Seventeen and Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm. The only suggested reading comparable in power or literary merit is The Red Badge of Courage and the Reader's Enrichment teacher's edition ($2.50), in its section on motivating the reading, suggests: "Discuss with the class the life-in-imagination of children embodied in their frequently used expression 'Let's pretend.'" —and for class activities: "Dramatize a meeting of Tom, Jim and Huck ten or twenty years after the events of the story."

The Bantam Pathfinder edition, The (!) Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, has an incomplete title page and omits the original final sentence; but it contains a good biographical sketch and an essay on the book using games, as does George P. Elliott, as "a key to understanding Huckleberry Finn." At 60c, it is a better buy than the Reader's Enrichment edition. The editor, Ralph Cohen, introduces a scholarly account of the early reception of the book and three modern essays: Lauriat Lane, Jr.'s "Why Huckleberry Finn is a Great World Novel"; which as somebody said some-

BROTHERHOOD

"People are people and as such they are entitled to respect." Humphrey once said, explaining his concept of civil rights. "I learned that from my Daddy and Mommy." Filial sentiment rather than constitutional logic or philosophical egalitarianism—this is one reason the Negro struggle for equality during the last two decades has done a great deal more for Hubert Humphrey than Hubert Humphrey has done for it. This is said in full realization that he has from time to time shown some ingenuity in furthering the cause. Like a good liberal, he sometimes spoke in behalf of the Negro. He was fiery when it improved his career, and he banked his fires when this improved it further. He was a hard-line integrationist when he needed headlines of that sort to get a national status, and he was understanding of the white South when he was intent upon building intra-party bridges to power in the Senate. He, not Dirksen, who is sometimes credited with it, oiled the passage of the civil rights program of 1964 through the Senate. But to be realistic it must be said that this took something less than genius; the time was overdue to the point of spoilage; the death of Kennedy had supplied the shock needed to loosen the dead hand of Dixie on the Senate (at least long enough for this legislation to be pushed through), and Lyndon Johnson, who waded it on his record for the 1964 campaign, was operating at the highest point of influence that he was to be blessed with in his Presidency. Humphrey helped build the success, but he certainly was not the architect of it. And, after all, who of those Senators who had been at the very center of power for twenty years without moving the civil rights iceberg would dare take much credit for something achieved in 1964—a decade after the Brown decision, sixteen years after President Truman and the Democrats had sworn in their platform (accompanied by Humphrey's somewhat self-serving trumpet call) to do something about segregation, three years and a dozen deaths and hundreds of bombings and beatings and jailings after the civil rights movement began its dazzling attack on the Southern establishment. What is Humphrey's role in the civil rights fight, take it in all? Rather slight.

From The Drugstore Liberal: Hubert H. Humphrey in Politics by Robert G. Sherrill and Harry W. Ernst (Grossman). Two sections of this book have appeared in The Nation: "Hubert Humphrey: Speaking in Tongues," Apr. 29 and "Hubert Humphrey: The Illusion of Change," June 17.

where about something else, gives the right answers to irrelevant questions; William Van O'Connor's "Why Huckleberry Finn is Not the Great American Novel" which is always adult and challenging even when it is wrongheaded; and Charles Kaplan's "Holden and Huck: The Odysseys of Youth," linking Twain and Salinger according to Hemingway's dictum. Although Mr. Cohen, like the general editor of the Reader's Enrichment edition, is a professor of education as well as English, he approaches Huckleberry Finn as literature rather than as a resource—to use the jargon of the educationists—for some ill-defined educational experience. One wishes, however, that Cohen could persuade his publisher to provide at least a new title page and the final page of the text as Mark Twain intended, and correct the ugly typographical error which has persisted on the last page of the book through three printings.

Also Cohen—indeed any editor or publisher—might include Ralph Ellison's contribution to "The Negro Writer in America: An Exchange," Partisan Review (Spring, 1958). Commentators have borne witness to Nigger Jim's "humanity, dignity, even nobility" (the particular formulation is Wallace Stegner's) and Cohen too refers to the book as "a deeply moving human document about the love that grows between a boy and a man. Isn't part of the meaning of this love dependent upon the fact that the boy is white and the man is black?" Mr. Ellison concedes "Jim's dignity and human capacity—and Mark Twain's complexity," but argues that "Jim's friendship for Huck comes across as that of a boy for another boy rather than as the friendship of an adult for a junior. . . . There is a violation of our conception of adult maleness." Cohen, like most modern editors, is so pleased with his discovery of Mark Twain's—and Jim's—greatness that he overlooks the fact, which only Wallace Stegner among the editors of cheaper reprints does not, that Jim "in the last chapter is hardly more than the straight-man in a minstrel show."

The most egregious error in the Reader's Enrichment edition of Huckleberry Finn has persisted through four years and five printings. Its teacher's manual has referred to the crucial town of Cairo, Ill., as "the goal of slaves who hoped to make their way down the Mississippi to a free state," though the book makes quite clear that the importance of Cairo was that slaves could go up the Ohio to the really safe free states. Any knowledge of history and geography should have told the editors that all states south of Cairo were slave states. Doesn't an alert, knowledgeable reader occasionally bring such an error to the attention of the publisher; or if he does, is he—as I have been—brushed aside with mumblings about the economics of publishing?

Possibly the original care and rapid rectification of errors are in part responsible for the relatively high cost of the excellent editions cited early in this article. But Riverside Editions is able to produce a viable text, superbly introduced, for less than $1. Teachers and others in a position to influence the purchase of books will have to apply their own "pure food and drug act" to reject the shoddy products now offered by the large-scale, low-price publishers. The economics of publishing cannot be so complex that proper editions of our classics in the public domain should not be made available—if the demand for them is great enough.

THEATRE

ROBERT PASOLLI

During the past few years several of the small theatre companies which make up the American theatrical avant-garde have spent an immoderate amount of time performing in Europe. The Living Theatre made two tours during the early 1960s and still has not returned from the tour it undertook in 1964, which is now known as the European exile. The La MaMa Troupe, which seems to be away from home more than half the time, has done several tours since 1965. This summer both the Bread and Puppets Theatre and the Firehouse Theatre of Minneapolis went off to European festivals, and the Open Theatre has just finished a three-month visit to five European countries. This is more than an idle trend; it clearly demonstrates that innovation and renewal in the theatre has entered an American phase. The theatre of Paris, which the absurdists jolted into the 20th century during the 1950s, has grown temperate and quiet; the theatre of London, which the angry young men stood on its head during the years on either side of 1960, is all but moribund. The pockets of theatre experiment which do exist in Europe—the work of Jerzy

COMFORT

*When in the haste of heartiness
I snatch up a few words,
Smile, and off they fare,
Old friend, beware of my pomposity.
I am so uneasy with another heart's care
I cannot keep a quiet watch
At any side
For fear of the latter moment
When, sideways,
With hopeless, believing eyes,
A face looks up for me
On the last strength of a throat
Needing—what?—pure love like air,
And find I am not there.*

JEAN FARLEY

Grotowski in Poland, Eugenio Barba in Denmark and Peter Brook in London—are of great significance, but they remain isolated phenomena in widely separated locales. On the other hand, the imaginative and visionary new theatre which has emerged from New York's Off-off-Broadway is localized, many faceted and contagious. Although it has by no means rocked our theatre establishment yet, it has clearly agitated the waters. Europeans, whose culture makes them more receptive than we are to artistic developments of significance, have hastened to import the phenomenon, even as it has been forming.

Yet Europeans are not unusually receptive to our experimental work—to judge by the reactions of audiences which I observed while with the Open Theatre earlier this summer. I was often surprised during my travels with the company, had several preconceptions dashed, and, in the end, was led to reconsider our habitual assumption of European hospitality to the avant-garde.

The Open Theatre does highly experimental work. The company was founded in 1963 by Joseph Chaikin and Peter Feldman, two members of the Living Theatre who wanted to breast the problems imposed on the actor by the Theatre of the Absurd and the new "abstractionism" of certain young American playwrights. They knew that method training, which is common to American actors, did not suffice, and they began to meet regularly in an informal workshop with a group of actor and writer friends to find out what would. In the five years of its existence, the group has held onto the objective to make visible in acting and staging those untidy masses of emotional and psychic experience which the absurdists, Pinter, and the new American writers have tapped, to mine aspects of human experience which naturalism, realism and what has been called "the narrative fix" obscure and, additionally, to find dramatic correlatives for the moral concerns and perceptions of the members of the group. As this work requires an opening up to unknown possibilities, through improvisation and other forms of stabbing around in the dark, control is inimical to it, and the Open Theatre has gone off on tangents and lived through several transformations. But Chaikin's drive to break new aesthetic ground has set and reset the purpose of the group.

Last fall, after a year which was largely given over to performing Megan Terry's Viet Rock and Jean-Claude van Itallie's America Hurrah, Chaikin organized his most ambitious workshop to date. For fifteen or so hours a week throughout the fall, winter and spring, he met with twenty-five actors to explore the Book of Genesis. The group started by illustrating certain of the Biblical episodes, but soon entered a process which Chaikin has called "projecting ourselves into images and questions" raised in these episodes. That is, the group improvised on the themes in the Bible stories, loss of innocence, personal alienation and deprivation, victimization, self-repression. Toward the end of the year, Chaikin and van Itallie, the writer attached to the project, took scissors and paste to material which the group had created by improvisation, and revised it radically, sometimes in consultation with the actors, sometimes by fiat. The result, a performance piece called The Serpent, is a group meditation on the human condition

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

8-26-68

221 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $18

☐ Two Years, $36

☐ 6 Months, $8

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

PUBLICATIONS

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of Significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

"SELECTED POEMS" OF GEORGE WYLLIAM (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since East Poem." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 11 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-N.A. Carmel, Indiana 46032.

STARTLING EVIDENCE concerning who had president Kennedy killed. FORGIVE MY GRIEF, Vol. 1—188 pages, Vol. II—192 pages, by Penn Jones, Jr. $5.95 value for $4.95. Mail to Books, 530 New Road, Waco, Texas 76710.

"SUMAC", a tri-quarterly, will appear in September, publishing poetry, fiction, criticism. The first issue includes work by Robert Duncan, Louis Simpson, Kenneth Koch, John Thompson, Denise Levertov and others. Edited by Dan Gerber, Jr. and Jim Harrison. $3.50—one year. Ms. and Subscriptions, Box 25, Fremont, Michigan 49412.

POEMS FROM PLACES by Robert William Harper may be ordered from author at: 491 Plaza Blvd. (N-149), Morrisville, Penna., 19067. $1.25 postpaid.

YOU SHOULD KNOW CANADA BETTER!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Editor: C. W. Gonic

Leading forum of Canadian opinion.
Independent and lively.

Send $4.00 for a trial year's subscription—8 Big Issues

Write:
CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg, Canada

FILMS

HUELGA

A film about the California grapeworkers' strike—its spirit, the Teatro Campesino, the march to Sacramento. Narrated by Cesar Chavez. 16mm. black/white, 15 minutes, rental $20.

Holden Enterprises
5812 Costello Avenue
Van Nuys, California 91401

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

8-26-68

and its sources in myth, as edited by the director and the chief writer of the group.

The piece makes many statements, conveying them in a series of discrete scenes, some Biblical, some contemporary. There is no narrative, and although the scenes relate in various ways to a concept of what the serpent is, this does not have the focus of a theme. The dramatic language is more physical than verbal. Sometimes illustrative, sometimes abstract and frequently symbolic, the physical life of the piece spills off the stage into the auditorium, where the actors attempt rapprochement with the spectators. Van Italie likes to think of the work as a ceremony rather than a play: a ritualized statement of the company's beliefs and concerns, which would conceivably stand for those of the audience as well.

I saw the Open Theatre perform The Serpent in Munich, Vienna, Geneva and Zurich. In each city, the originality of the work quite clearly took the spectators by surprise. Not many of them could have seen anything like this riotous and fervid event in a theatre before. But the responses of the several audiences—what they did when confronted with novelty—varied considerably from place to place. The Viennese, whether by temperament or the mood of the moment, were blatantly indisposed to it. Some seemed angry and disgusted and made clattering departures in the middle of things; others disapproved by receding into stony inertness; in a word, they were annoyed. The actors could not but sense the pettiness in that response, and their work began to seem antagonistic and defiant. Obviously there are traditions to violate in Vienna—not only theatre traditions but notions of proper behavior as well—and where bourgeois attitudes are so palpable, a work like The Serpent will inevitably challenge them.

Geneva's response to the novelty, on the other hand, was spirited and open. That audience was the most cosmopolitan I have ever been part of anywhere: society, businessmen, intellectuals, Bohemians, even some hippies, made up what struck me as a wonderful heterogeneity. The general élan, beyond reminding one that this was French territory, suggested that these spectators anticipated an event of moment. The company was at its most zestful and proffering that night. The inevitable, abrupt departure during a scene which illustrates the begetting of the generations ("Vous acceptez des choses pareilles?"; an ancient lady spoke out as she scrambled past her neighbors, "C'est une honte!"), only accentuated the sense of event in this audience.

In Zurich, at the elegant, historical, prestigious Schauspielhaus, esprit was not in the air. Those who appreciated The Serpent considered it a phenomenon to be admired rather than an experience to be relished. The majority, however, were bothered by the work, especially in the first-night audience, which included the middle-aged members of the old families which run the Schauspielhaus and everything else in Zurich. They are well-bred, educated, hence respectable and amiable, but they were clearly put off. Reserve also characterized the Munich audience, even though the performance took place at the Kammerspiel, a small theatre which is often used for experiment. The youngest of the spectators, the students, were delighted by the daring of the work, but on the whole the audience was respectful and stiff. Munich was the first city the troupe encountered after performing for a month to reportedly volatile audiences in Italy; the reserve unnerved some of the actors.

Of course, the actors unnerved the audience in every city when they descended into the house to rove the aisles, climb on empty seats, approach spectators, etc. The concept that the stage and the seats are separate spaces is extremely hard to violate in any locality. A spectator will look across the auditorium at an actor cavoring in a far aisle rather than attend to the one at his elbow. How precious distance is to theatregoers! When actors leave the stage a dazed look comes over the spectators; their eyes glaze as they attempt to avoid an unprogrammed encounter. This is a paradigm for the theatre experience as a whole. When a theatrical event there does not correspond to the known forms, spectators literally do not know how to react, even though they could deal competently with the same event if it emerged in real life. So (the young excepted), they tend not to react at all.

The new theatre, which attempts to open up the possibilities for a more direct encounter between players and spectators, faces this problem everywhere. But I think it faces it less in America than in Europe. Our greater pragmatism, activism, communality and greediness for experience make us more compliant before novelty and more appreciative before this kind of novelty, which in general terms is the gesture of solidarity. If the European is more inclined to subsidize, patronize and defend the avant-garde, he does so to a large degree as a matter of principle. On balance, the American seems more responsive, even if not responsive enough, to the experience of the avant-garde event itself. Now that the charitable foundations have come around to subvention of the experimental theatre—the National Endowment in a modest way, but to be renewed next year, and the Ford Foundation in a major way—it seems appropriate for our avant-garde to start staying home.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1260

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 Handouts about to leave out the high spots of Italy? (9)
- 6 Large wine casks into which tobacco is put. (5)
- 9 Might be easily breakable, if large. (7)
- 10 Not out of date in an old writing implement. (2, 5)
- 11 and 22 down Vagabonds bring in stones illegally, it seems. (9)
- 12 Soak up, and rearrange on pegs. (6)
- 15 What one shouldn't move on to go over the care-taking organization? (3, 5)
- 16 One who doesn't eat quickly? (6)
- 18 Game that starts quiet, but the quiet at last is disturbed. (6)
- 20 Not one of the better elements of the Afro-English air service, by the sound of it. (8)
- 23 Sultanate where a female is likely to lose her head? (4)
- 24 Business proposal? (6)
- 28 Where one might expect to drop a coin on the floor of the car? (7)
- 29 How one might cheer the cabinet, perhaps. (7)
- 30 Far back in time, in general associated with the South. (5)
- 31 Are shaped differently to lead the attack!

DOWN

- 1, 25 across and 7 down Financial plan to hold off Communist retribution, perhaps. (8, 7)

- 2 Got an education from the most scholarly, obviously. (7)
- 3 The novel way trains meet in a wreck? (4, 6)
- 5 Weapons perhaps associated with an outrageous fortune. (6)
- 6 After-position? (4)
- 7 See 1 down
- 8 and 4 down The one who talks for the family? (That's why they call him "Mister") (7, 2, 3, 5)
- 14 One who gets 50 per cent of the action in the pool? (4-6)
- 15 Concerning the test of will, when unprincipled? (9)
- 17 The point of a pin, not exactly clean.
- 19 and 13 across Thirteen cards in something fairly close to bridge? (11)
- 21 It might provide breathing space for animal life. (3, 4)
- 26 "Or draw his frailties from their abode." (Gray's Elegy) (5)
- 27 Aspired to by set performers? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1259

ACROSS: 1 Song sparrows; 10 Orinoco; 11 Outface; 12 and 15 down Not by a long shot; 13 Potboiler; 14 Husbandman; 16 Very; 18 Lace; 20 Appointive; 23 Defending; 25 Erato; 26 Eremitic; 27 Hitite; 28 Short stories. DOWN: 2 Opiates; 3, Good-year; 4, Propped up; 5 Roost; 6 Option; 7 and 8 Shall we join the ladies; 9 Dearly beloved; 17 Anteater; 19 Coffers; 21 Imagined; 22 Indigo; 24 Inert.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 2430 N. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60640.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors, indigenous designs, free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/55, 125/510 and 1,000/375. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109. (405) 775-3140.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 20 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

IDEALISTIC? HARRASSED? FRUSTRATED? Join others in seeking a better life through intentional communities. Information, registration (nationwide) $2.00. The Questers Project, Box N-23, Los Banos, Calif. 93655.

Was your vote asphyxiated in some smoke-filled room? The decent thing is to show you mourn it. Send one dollar for two badges proclaiming: "I WILL NOT VOTE". They're edged in black. P.O. Box 464, Skokie, Illinois 60076

SITUATIONS WANTED — FEMALE

WANTED

A MEANINGFUL JOB

Gal. 23. Antioch-CCNY
Cum Laude — just returned from abroad.

Box 616, c/o The Nation

ADMINISTRATIVE ASSISTANT, full/part time. Literate, mature, responsible. Experience non-profit organizations. Meaningful work primary consideration. N.Y. Box #615, c/o The Nation.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Do we need your subscription?

Frankly—yes. Without loyal support, we couldn't continue. And it's always a struggle.

But we're not just asking; we're giving. We offer our subscribers information, stimulation, a forum for unpopular opinion.

Join the voices in the wilderness. Subscribe now. Who knows? Someday "we" may outnumber "them."

The good fight

is now in

NATION

—Why not

join now?

BONUS OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you will add four bonus issues to my subscription.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign).

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

MONGOLIA ALBERT AXELBANK

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 2, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME

SEP 3 1968

STAGGERING COLOSSUS

The Surprising Vulnerability of Industrial Societies NORMAN BIRNBAUM

DISCOVERING SPIRO AGNEW

RICHARD O'MARA

Political Science The Battle for Relevance

MARVIN SURKIN

on Crane JAMES F. LIGHT

Malcolm Lowry RICHARD COSTA

5-228 PL-337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

angry dove

Milwaukee, Wisc.

DEAR SIR: I have been a card-carrying Democrat since 1954 (age 18), my positions in the party including Wisconsin delegation chairman to the 1957 Reno Young Democratic National Convention, election as Democratic ward committeeman in 1958, delegate to the 1959 YDCA convention in Toledo, re-election as Democratic Committeeman and losing by five votes for Democratic Assemblyman in 1960. Also in 1960, I served as Sen. Hubert Humphrey's Milwaukee County delegation election chairman (County caucus). Marguerite Webb, my mother, was a 1956 Wisconsin Kefauver delegate to the National Democratic Convention in Chicago. . . .

During the 1956 primaries, Kefauver material was available at our Milwaukee Democratic headquarters on an equal basis with Stevenson's or the administration's "favorite son." Though the administration was cool to fans of Estes they were tolerant. In 1960, both Humphrey and Kennedy material was equally available. In 1964, it was absolute unity behind the "peaceful and liberal" Johnson-Humphrey team. Then enter decay.

Not even tolerance existed toward the McCarthy people; it was open hostility. Hints of Joe McCarthy's reincarnation seemed to plague the Eugene McCarthy people . . . Not in spite of but because of my fourteen years of liberal service to the Democratic Party, I want it publicly known to National Chairman John Bailey and party boss Richard Daley that this is one dove that will not roost with hawks! If Hubert Humphrey is the party's nominee, I shall let my membership terminate and will urge other abused progressive and rank-and-file Democrats to do the same.

John F. Webb

Former Democratic Committeeman

Moravia's Fiction

Flushing, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: By starting out with a prejudice that the Great Wall still symbolizes the psychology as well as the social, economic and political system of China, Alberto Moravia puts his entire article out of focus ("Lobster Land: A Traveler in China," The Nation, Aug. 19). Present-day China's means of production and distribution are Socialist; her educational system, her health services, her approach to Confucianism, the peasantry, industrialization and her rightful place in the world are as different as missiles are from stagecoaches. China, incidentally, trades with more than ninety nations in the world. Does that make her isolated and conservative? Is her call for more and more Vietnams an example of circumscribed views? Mr. Moravia is indeed a writer of fiction.

Leonard Boyer

Kennedy people

Seattle, Wash.

DEAR SIR: Your editorial on the subject of Kennedy supporters vs. McCarthy ("The 'No Chance' Candidate," Aug. 5) displayed an appalling lack of sensitivity. McCarthy and his supporters, however righteous they may seem to you, are not entirely free of blame for anti-McCarthy sentiment. (I speak as a former Kennedy supporter who now supports McCarthy.) The feeling of Kennedy supporters is that Kennedy conducted a fairer and more open-minded campaign than McCarthy and that he was far better informed than McCarthy. Whether or not this attitude is correct, if you are courting our support you should pay more heed to our feelings than to state that this belief does not have "enough substance to call for a rebuttal." . . .

Wm. James Roberts

EDITORIALS

Brutal and Stupid

The Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia is brutal and stupid aggression, executed in open defiance of the UN Charter, and carried out under cover of double-talk so inept and fraudulent that one wonders why Mr. Malik even bothered to mouth it to the Security Council. The aggression was directed not against an unfriendly power or at "counterrevolutionary" elements but against a Communist regime whose unshakable fraternal bonds with the USSR had just been reaffirmed at Bratislava.

The aggression is as stupid as it is brutal. From the outset, the Soviets handled the Czech attempts at liberalization and reform with extraordinary clumsiness. Initially they overreacted, then they tried to extricate themselves from their threats and menacing maneuvers by staging the ludicrous Bratislava "summit," and now they have put themselves in the position of having committed open aggression against another Communist regime.

The hard-liners in the Kremlin decided to move in—there is evidence that the decision was taken abruptly—when they finally realized that Dubcek had the support not merely of an overwhelming majority of the Czech people but of a decisive majority within the party. In brief, no plausible Quislings were available for use in a serious challenge to Dubcek, and he was certain to receive strong support at the party meeting in September. Not knowing what else to do, the hard-liners set the tanks rolling toward Prague. But they have not crushed the Czech people nor have they, except for the short term, eliminated the "threat" of freedom in Eastern Europe. By acting as they did, the Soviets have not checked the contagion: on the contrary, they have assured its rapid diffusion throughout Eastern Europe and within the U.S.S.R. as well. And now they have 14 million sullen, hostile and extremely uncooperative Czechs on their border.

While the Soviet aggression is certain to be self-defeating in the long term, it has dangerous present implications. It probably reflects a shift of power to those within the Politburo who would smother the promising beginnings made toward a détente with the United States. It has given arms spending here an unneeded boost; the prospects for arms control, particularly in the missile field, have been set back, at least for the time being. Momentarily, the Soviet aggression will strengthen the American hard line, though perhaps not as much as it now seems to do. It has created new difficulties for the McCarthy-McGovern-Kennedy forces on the eve of the Democratic convention and it may have improved Nixon's chances.

But Soviet aggression in Europe does not justify American aggression in Vietnam. Washington's moral and political position at the UN would be immeasurably strengthened had we not acted as we have in Vietnam, in Cuba (Bay of Pigs), and in the Dominican Republic.

Moreover, the reaction to the Soviets' latest aggression provides striking confirmation that the "monolith" of Communist power is breaking up. The invasion has been opposed by the Yugoslav and Romanian regimes and by

September 2, 1968

EDITORIALS

162

ARTICLES

166 Riding Shotgun in Watts

Phil Kerby

167 Staggering Colossus

Norman Birnbaum

175 Discovering Spiro Agnew

Richard O'Mara

177 How Mongolia Gets Along

Albert Axelbank

179 Political Science:

The Battle for Relevance

Marvin Surkin

BOOKS & THE ARTS

182 The Great Society Takes a Body Blow

Sean Cronin

183 The Mystery Unsolved

James F. Light

184 From Here to Obscurity

Irving Younger

185 Five Poems

Wendell Berry

Rain

Ruby Riemer

Rainy Day

Robert Morgan

Night Rain

Freda Quenneville

Rainy Season

Still Fields (translated by

Miguel Hernandez

Timothy Baland)

186 Big Science, Big Money

Carl Dreher

188 Mythologized Megalomania

Richard Hauer Costa

189 Theatre

Robert Hatch

190 Silent at Breakfast (poem)

Margaret Shipley

191 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPSEditor
CAREY McWILLIAMSAssociate Editor
PHIL KERBYExecutive Editor
ROBERT HATCHLiterary Editor
HELEN TUCKERMANCopy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN;
Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music,
BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising
Manager, MARY SIMON.Washington, ROBERT G. SHERILL; Paris, ALEXANDER
WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY;
Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.
Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y., and at additional mailing office.Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and
the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 6

the Communist parties of Italy and France; Peking has denounced it as a shameful act. The Soviet aggression emphasizes the need for a reorientation of American policy along lines recommended by McCarthy, McGovern, Kennedy, Mansfield, Fulbright and other critics. When the U.S. Ambassador at the UN can speak with such vehemence in defense of the sovereign rights of a Communist state, it is surely time for us to reconsider the sterile "anti-Communist" positions of the cold-war period. The demand for peace is much too strong to be reversed by an act of aggression which has isolated the Soviet Union and brought down upon it the nearly universal condemnation of world opinion, including the condemnation of Communist parties and Communist regimes.

Why is it, Neal Ascherson asked in the London Observer of July 25, that the Soviets, who show considerable flexibility and adroitness in external relations with other powers, seem incapable of dealing with disputes within the Communist bloc except by invective, menace and force? His answer: "There is no machinery, not even a language in which the inevitable tensions [within the bloc] can be discussed. The Russians behave as though the situation of forty years ago survived"—that is, when they could issue orders to the world Communist movement.

Arnold Toynbee recently pointed out that when an authoritarian power, either a nation or an institution, East or West, asserts its authority nowadays, it is usually a sign that it feels it is in danger of losing control. The quandaries in which these staggering colossi, including the United States and other Western powers, find themselves (see article page 167) is of their own making; they have lost touch with contemporary realities. In deciding to assert themselves, as Toynbee notes, "they have failed to take account of a new factor in human affairs; the wind of freedom that, by the spread of education, is blowing mightily today all over the face of the globe."

We are not living today in the age of iron-steel-and-coal communism, when millions of people could be shoved into mines and factories, but in an age of electronics, when scientists and technicians—and intellectuals of all sorts—constitute the class which makes the post-industrial society work (even though it seems strange to think of them as constituting the "working class"). The hard-liners in the Kremlin should reread the 10,000-word essay by Academician Andrei Sakharov (published in full in The New York Times July 22), in which he pointed out that "intellectual freedom" is "essential for human society" and the "key to a progressive restructuring of the systems of government in the interests of mankind."

This latest example of aggression by one of the surviving "dinosaur" great powers was, then, basically an act of panic, stemming from the inability of Soviet conservatives to think of any other way of reacting to what they saw as an unexpected turn in human affairs. Not knowing what else to do, the hard-liners succumbed to the "falling dominoes" fallacy, much as Rusk and Rostow succumbed to it in Southeast Asia. "Like America," to quote Ascherson again, "the Soviet Union fails to distinguish the strategic challenge from the political. This means that Czechoslovakia" (he was writing, of course, before the invasion) "though loyal to the Warsaw Pact, is treated like an enemy, though it is difficult to see how, in the atomic age. Soviet security is served by bullying a small neighbor who could be a prosperous ally into sullen submission, good for nothing." The "staggering colossi" should take note of what is happening to old-fashioned power-politic concepts in the post-industrial world. These colossi, East and West, are much more vulnerable than they think.

Cowboy Around His Neck

The inescapable lesson of the preparations for the Chicago convention is that Lyndon B. Johnson cannot help being himself. Through Boss Richard Daley, his chosen instrument, Mr. Johnson is doing his damndest to run the convention, and so far his prospects for success seem good. Another efficient trouble-shooter, Charles Murphy, has been called in to lead the fight on the Vietnam plank, the one closest to the Presidential solar plexus. Mr. Johnson himself lent a hand here by his surprise stopoff in Detroit to receive the applause of the Veterans of Foreign Wars for his determination to save the people of South Vietnam from any tyranny but our own.

The visit had to be a surprise for security reasons, but Mr. Johnson presumably timed it so as to sandbag those who are trying to talk sense about Vietnam and save the Democratic Party. This in a very broad sense includes Vice President Humphrey, who has the additional incentive of trying to save his own political neck. This natural impulse on Humphrey's part was not furthered by the visits of the President and Richard Nixon to the assembled veterans. As Johnson breezed in, Dick breezed out, and they chatted by radio telephone. Jolly Dick bantered that he had "warmed up" the old soldiers for LBJ, and the latter, entering into the spirit of the exchange, expressed his thanks. The Associated Press reported that the Nixon and Johnson views on Vietnam were very similar. This raises a question: if Nixon's views are close to Johnson's, how far are Humphrey's views from Nixon's?

It is worth noting that the VFW boys, normally the most predatory of hawks, did not receive Mr. Johnson tumultuously—even when he sought to arouse them by departing from his text to accuse the North Vietnamese of creating a "blood bath" (in which, it may be pointed out, their losses in killed are about ten times ours). What must have been Humphrey's thoughts when he read the remarks of his superior? His tumbling act was difficult enough before Detroit—trying to remain outwardly loyal while also trying to comply with the desires of the millions of voters who abhor both the war and its prime escalator—but at Detroit the President made it well-nigh impossible. His performance there raises the suspicion that in moments of wrath and frustration Johnson says to himself that if he can't run again because of the damned reaction to the war, no Democrat will succeed him.

It is little wonder, then, that political seers like Jesse Unruh now look askance at Humphrey. They may sympathize with his plight but politics is politics, and when defeat looms it is every man for himself. One of Unruh's assistants was quoted recently as saying, "Humphrey's got the cowboy [Johnson] around his neck and the guy's killing him." He is also killing the party's chances, helping Nixon, and putting Democratic nominees for office, high and low, on a tough spot. Such disarray has not been seen since conventions began.

If this is Mr. Johnson's intention—or, more likely, a by-product of his current distemper—he must be willing to take the risk of aiding McCarthy while ruining Humphrey. The possibility may be slim, but with Humphrey falling behind Nixon in the polls and McCarthy holding his own, there is always the chance that a sizable number of delegates will say to hell with the war, abandon the unfortunate candidate who cannot dissociate himself from it, and take a chance on McCarthy, who can afford to be forthright with no cowboy around his neck.

The Absent-Minded Press

The press has an irritating way of flushing out an important story and then dropping it or not relating it to what has gone before. In reporting a deposition hearing in Washington, The New York Times recently informed its readers that Walter Sheridan, former Justice Department employee (he headed the so-called "Hoffa Squad"), had obtained $3,000 in cash from Stephen E. Smith, who handles finances for the Kennedy family. This he intended to pass along to Robert Vick, a key witness in the case against Hoffa. The money was placed in an envelope which Sheridan gave to Vick without discussing its contents. Later Sheridan and Vick met in the offices of an attorney in Washington for the purpose of having a promissory note drawn which would evidence a "loan" of $3,000 to Vick—who, according to Sheridan, had suffered financially because he had testified as a witness against Hoffa. But the attorney advised that the transaction "might look improper," and Sheridan returned the $3,000 to Mr. Smith in New York. Sheridan had previously arranged for the Department of Justice to pay $675 to bring the Vick family to Washington for a visit. At an earlier date, the Department had paid Vick $1,340.80 to cover expenses for four visits to Washington, and had arranged for him to remain on the payroll of the Nashville Police Department (without working) for a period of five months after he had testified.

These disclosures need to be related to certain facts which were brought out at the Hoffa trial. On Sheridan's authorization, the Department of Justice had paid some $1,500 from its "confidential fund" to the wife of Edward Grady Partin, another key government witness, although its representatives had denied making payments to Partin for anything other than regular witness fees and expenses. The payments to Vick carry the same suggestion of impropriety as the payments to Mrs. Partin. Unless they are experts, witnesses are not paid to testify (though they are of course entitled to per diem statutory witness fees, mileage and actual expenses); nor are they compensated for inconvenience or loss of income.

This solicitude for key witnesses should be related to still another recent development. Not long ago the Department of Justice asked the federal courts to dismiss a number of serious criminal prosecutions pending against Partin, who had been "planted" as an informer in Hoffa's defense headquarters. The motion was denied.

Will these cases now be brought to trial? The Department's failure to prosecute Partin with the same vigor with which it prosecuted Hoffa will give rise to an inference that it had an understanding with Partin that the cases against him would be dropped if he agreed to be an informer. Developments such as these lend substantial confirmation to the misgivings which The Nation has consistently voiced about the methods used to secure Hoffa's conviction (see "The Hoffa Trial" by Fred J. Cook, The Nation, April 27, 1964).

Worrying About Wallace

George Wallace is no peanut-size demagogue and there is good reason for politicians to be worried about him—and not only the full-time politicians but politicians of the labor movement and labor leaders in general. Business Week (August 17) comments on the appeal that Wallace has for the rank and file of labor, as well as for unorganized workers. In a recent poll of a New Jersey plant local of the relatively progressive United Auto Workers on Presidential preferences, Wallace won in a landslide with 430 votes, Nixon coming in second with 92. In Willow Springs, Ill., a 2,900-member UAW local voted 315 for Wallace, 33 for Nixon, with some scattered votes. The officials may be whistling in the dark when they point out that less than 15 per cent of the membership took part and that the result might not reflect "true sentiment." AFL-CIO rank-and-file sentiment for Wallace has been a matter of national concern for some time.

Why does organized labor (with some honorable exceptions) find itself in this position?

(1) For twenty-five years—a full generation—social idealism has been almost totally absent from the American labor movement. Organized labor has been a junior partner in the cold war and has got fat in the process.

(2) Hardly anything even resembling an educational program has been carried on by organized labor since the inception of the cold war, so that there has been nothing to counteract the moral deterioration which labor has suffered along with other segments of society.

(3) Contested elections for union office have been rare, largely because expert redbaiting has clobbered the opposition before it could get under way. Many incumbent officers have come to look on their jobs as a vested interest.

(4) The so-called "new breed" in the trade union movement does not remember the Great Depression, much less the epic labor struggles of the 19th century, and has very little sense of what a union movement should be.

But that is only part of the story. It is difficult to feel sympathetic toward the Wallace following, and emotionally gratifying to refer to them as boobs and jerks, as some commentators are in the habit of doing. But it is better sociology to see some of the issues as the Wallace supporters see them. Caught in an inflationary situation, they feel they are being "squeezed," as in fact they are. Most of these low-status workers are going to stay about where they are economically, and they are well aware of it. In the mass media, in Congress and in many corporations they see a great fuss being made about the blacks, but no one is making a fuss about them. They feel excluded from the two-party system, and to a large extent they have been.

Their insecurities are heightened by fear of losing status. After all, the only status they have is the fact that Negroes are below them on the ladder—Negroes and welfare recipients. They may feel fairly confident that they can keep off welfare (so long as they stay healthy), but they want also to stay above the Negroes. George Wallace conveys to them (in the code language which he and they understand) that as far as he has anything to say, they will do so.

What underlies this form of racism is the fear of failure—the cardinal sin in American society. Failure may take many forms, some real and some phantasmal. When they listen to Wallace, these workers feel their worth. When he attacks "smart folks who have been looking down their noses at you in Washington," they love it. For the moment, they feel as good as anybody.

Keep an Eye on Georgia

A primary election of extraordinary importance is scheduled for September 11 in Georgia, the state where Lester Maddox reigns as governor and yearns to turn the Democratic Party back to the good old days of the Confederacy. Maynard Jackson, a 30-year-old Atlanta lawyer, is challenging the incumbent, Herman E. Talmadge, for his seat in the U.S. Senate. That would be extraordinary enough for Talmadge, thought as unbeatable in Georgia. But, to make things more interesting, Jackson is a Negro.

Although it is highly unlikely that Jackson can beat Talmadge, the point is that if he can make a good showing against the Senator, his campaign will have long-term and salutary effects on Georgia politics. After Maddox's performance, the sensible people of the state will do all they can to keep demagogues out of office. Talmadge comes honestly by a somewhat higher grade of demagoguery than that of Maddox. The fact that Jackson has no trace of the demagogue in him may prove attractive to some whites. More important, however, is the Negro vote. It is already a factor in Georgia, and Jackson could make the state truly biracial in politics.

Georgia has some 350,000 registered Negro voters and about 1.45 million white voters. Jackson is running against Talmadge in the Democratic primary, and some of the whites will vote in the Republican primary, the first Georgia has had in recent times. Another group of whites will vote for anybody opposing Talmadge, who has his share of enemies; these are poor voters for the most part, and Jackson may appeal to their populist sentiment. They call Talmadge "king of the hams," a reference to a widely sold Talmadge brand. Assuming that Jackson gets 300,000 Negro votes and 200,000 white votes, not only Georgia but the whole country would take notice.

Jackson is not running as a Negro but as a Georgian. He is in fact, a fifth-generation native of the state. He is opposed to Maddox but takes no position as between Humphrey and McCarthy—which would only alienate potential supporters and not help McCarthy. However, his position on national affairs is fairly close to that of McCarthy: he calls for a halt in the bombing of North Vietnam and intensified diplomatic efforts.

He did not get into the race until June, when emotion played a part in his decision: His daughter was born on the day Martin Luther King was assassinated. He was watching TV when the news of Robert Kennedy's assassination was broadcast. Then he decided something had to be done, and that he could do as much as anybody.

In the short time he has been active, he has built up a good organization. Talmadge says that it would take $1 million to run a strong campaign against him. Jackson doesn't have a million, or anything like it, but lots of $5 and $10 contributions are coming in and a very interesting situation is developing. Even the mass media may discover it before September 11; if not, they may have to feature it on September 12. Robert G. Sherrill will discuss Jackson's campaign, and those of two other Southern Negroes, in the Nation of September 9.

'Playing God'

Some weeks back we asked former Gov. Edmund G. Brown for a statement on capital punishment. We knew that during his years in Sacramento the death penalty was a source of grievous torment to "Pat" Brown, a notably fair-minded and kindly man who has always opposed capital punishment. So we thought it important to discover what he thinks about the death penalty today, now that he is no longer governor and does not have to worry about the politics of it. Here is his response:

The governor of the largest state in the Union has a tough job, but the toughest part of it by far is "playing God"—deciding whether a man should live or die.

I had fifty-nine men and one woman condemned to the gas chamber come before me during the eight years I was governor of California. There was not a single one for whom a case for clemency could not be made. There was not a single one whose crime was not atrocious and premeditated.

What do you do in order to uphold the law and your sworn oath to faithfully carry out all the laws of this state? Do you yield to the misguided but sincere people who are appalled by the crime of the criminal and feel that only death is the answer? Do you endanger all of the other things that you are trying to do as governor by losing the support of the majority of the people who believe in the death penalty, or do you extend mercy by using the clemency power that the Constitution gives only to the governor?

I tried to resolve this dilemma by personally scrutinizing every case after the defendant had exhausted every remedy that he may have had in the courts. I personally conducted a hearing in the governor's office.

I commuted only eighteen of the sixty cases. As I look back on these cases, I wish that I had commuted every single one. Capital punishment is not doing a single solitary bit of good and should be repealed and life in prison should be substituted.

Riding Shotgun in Watts

PHIL KERBY

Los Angeles

A Los Angeles newspaper reported: "In the pre-dawn hours, 103rd Street had the look of occupied territory with police officers patrolling—four inside each car with a black-helmeted officer riding shotgun on the front fender."

Not only did 103rd Street, which runs through the black ghetto of Watts in south central Los Angeles, take on the appearance of occupied territory, it was occupied territory. A few hours before, around midnight of August 11, a two-hour gun battle between police and scattered groups of ghetto blacks had left three black men dead, six policemen and thirty-five others wounded. A helicopter, circling low overhead in the darkness, swept the ghetto rooftops with a searchlight to locate potential snipers.

The violence erupted at the close of the week-long third annual Watts Summer Festival, which had been organized to create a sense of community identity and pride after the August, 1965, uprising. The arrest of a woman suspected of drunkenness at the park where the festival was held apparently ignited the outburst on August 11, just as the arrest of a youth on a drunken driving charge had started the 1965 holocaust. The festival crowd began throwing rocks and bottles at the police and the exchange of gunfire followed. Who started firing first—members of the crowd or the police—is under dispute. In response to radio calls for help, hundreds of additional officers converged on the scene.

If the arrest of the woman had not taken place, any other minor incident could have set off the violence. The black community had been seething since the previous Monday when three youthful blacks, members of the militant Black Panther Party, were killed on the edge of the ghetto in a gun fight in which two policemen were seriously wounded. Police said the blacks opened fire, and Black Panther leaders said the police shot first.

The two gun battles within a week's time were the latest in a recent rash of violent incidents in the Los Angeles ghetto. In sorting out the conflicting reports, one fact became evident. The police are now regularly confronting armed blacks in the ghetto area. On the fifth day of the Watts Festival, police in a squad car reported that they were fired upon while cruising near an interracial housing project. They arrested eight men, reporting that one was armed with an automatic pistol. All were booked on suspicion of assault with intent to commit murder.

And a second fact is emerging in Los Angeles: an alliance is growing between the Mexican-American community and the blacks. At a Los Angeles City Council hearing, one Mexican-American witness said, "Our barrios and ghettos are already concentration camps, heavily guarded by your so-called good police force. We charge that it is not the community that is responsible for the violence or the social disorder, but rather it is the policy of the City Council and the practices and policy of the police department which are responsible."

The Mexican-Americans and the blacks pressed these demands upon the council:

"Stop legal killing by police."

"Stop wholesale arrests" of minority citizens.

"Stop intimidation, illegal detention and illegal search" of blacks and Mexican-Americans.

"Reduce the concentration of police in black and brown communities."

One youthful Mexican-American told the Council: "Make no mistake about it; there is a war between our communities and the police, and it can be fought at the negotiating table, or in public hearings, or, if you choose, in the streets." And a black witness said: "We're tired of police harassment, we're tired of police brutality, we're tired of the murders of our black and brown brothers, we're tired of being arrested on every trumped-up charge."

Chief of Police Tom Reddin, now considered by many in the minority communities to be a soft-spoken version of his predecessor, the late iron-handed William H. Parker, replied: "We were not the ones who opened fire."

After the week of violence in Los Angeles and amid the welter of contradictory claims, it was impossible immediately to determine the cause. But such a determination, if it could have been made, would be largely irrelevant. The relevant facts, long known and characteristic of every ghetto in America are these: The unemployment rate in Watts is 13.1 per cent, compared to the community-wide rate of 4.3 per cent. The sub-employment rate in Watts, including those who work but have a substandard income, is 30 per cent. Thirty-five to 45 per cent of black children drop out before they finish high school; hundreds of Negro families have no father living in the homes; community services, from garbage collection to transportation to medical care, are often nonexistent, and when available are far below standards elsewhere.

Into this center of misery, the city sends the police, much as an old colonial power used the troops to pacify the natives. The police, frequently hostile and always afraid, must cope with a situation approaching guerrilla warfare and caused by conditions created and tolerated by the larger society. The police in the field, mostly young men in their 20s, are also victims of this domestic invasion—just as American soldiers killed in Vietnam are victims of their country's aggression abroad.

STAGGERING COLOSSUS

NORMAN BIRNBAUM

Mr. Birnbaum, founding editor of the New Left Review (London), will become professor of sociology at Amherst College in September. Mr. Birnbaum is the author of Theory of Industrial Society, soon to be published by Trinity College Press. This essay is written in honor of the late C. Wright Mills.

I

Industrial society—East and West—is in crisis, and the intensity, the pervasiveness, the continuing acceleration of the crisis have taken all of us (including that society's bitterest critics) by surprise. Only yesterday we were being assured that our Western societies were immune to severe disruption. The satisfied liberals argued that the societies were so pluralistic as to be monolithically stable, that they rested on so much consent that dissent was gratuitous. The disappointed Socialists held that pluralism was a sham, that a simulacrum of consent had been engineered, and that one day the truth would out—but not now, nor in the foreseeable future. The conservative critics of mass society supposed that most men had forgotten their higher nature in the pursuit of consumer goods, and yearned for a lost ideal of purpose, station and community. The radical critics insisted that human potential had been extirpated by bureaucratic power, that opposition itself had become an existential gesture rather than a meaningful political act.

About the State Socialist societies in Eastern Europe, there were even fewer differences. The monopoly of power exercised by the state parties might be improved in appearance by certain concessions to popular opinion, but no fundamental institutional changes could be expected—the more so, as the workers (quite like their Western counterparts) were content to accept technocratic direction as long as their living standards improved. East and West, only the intellectuals were left, nostalgically lamenting the more or less total disappearance of an image of man that was Promethean in its pretensions—and in its remoteness. The idea of men seizing their own destinies, refusing domination, remaking their societies, was possibly fit matter for university seminars on myth, but not a serious element in political discussion.

We were all of us wrong, to a greater or lesser degree, and the immediate point is to see clearly now. What we did was misjudge the stability—and probable length—of a phase of integration and consolidation in the politics of advanced societies. Even those of us who have been working in the Marxist tradition overestimated the staying power of modern systems of domination—or, put in another way, we had insufficient faith in the human capacity to refuse humiliation, deprivation and servitude, even when these have been inflicted in refined and veiled forms. Some of us, to be sure, were quicker to seize the movement of events than others: Mills, Harrington and Lynd in this country, the old Marxist Henri Lefebvre and the new ones André Gorz and Serge Mallet in France, Eric Hobsbawm, Ralph Miliband and Perry Anderson in England, Wolfgang Abendroth and Burkard Lutz in Germany, Ernst Mandel in Belgium, the group around Lelio Basso in Italy. I myself never managed to see straight, and this for a simple reason: never attached to the working-class movement, I moved between countries but almost always among intellectuals with approximately the same complaints. That others could share feelings of revulsion, disgust and despair at the way we had to live struck us as exceedingly unlikely, as if the only possible mark of humanity (despite our own immediate experience to the contrary in universities, on magazines and in publishing houses) were a doctorate.

What were the signs we misread? In the first place we underestimated the significance of the Third World's struggle against the older and newer forms of imperialism, or rather, its multiple meanings and consequences. On one level, the success of the Algerians and the Cubans in liberating themselves (in very different ways and against very different opponents) caused the imperialist powers to change their strategies. The French and the British (with the West Germans in tow) abandoned military occupation for economic penetration and manipulation. These forms of neo-colonialism were far from deceiving the radical elites in the Third World (none of whom believe, for instance, that the Katanga secession was not instigated from without). The new strategies increased the cost of imperialism, but did not bring many of the political gains attached to withdrawal from it.

The United States, by contrast, after the Cuban trauma went over to ever more naked military intervention in the Third World—culminating in the Vietnamese horror. The Third World did not resist in isolation: its populations found solidarity in the West, not among the working class but in cultural elites, particularly their younger members. Moreover, the spectacle of a China resurgent and experimenting with new political forms, made of the Sino-Soviet split and the "cultural revolution" factors of attraction not only for the Third World but for Western youth.

The liberal Western societies have been demonstrating, quite unintentionally, the limits of liberalism in its alliance with imperialism. The Socialist lands of the East have been demonstrating, equally without intention, the limits of socialism in alliance with a single-party dictatorship and a bureaucratic state apparatus. The erosion of monolithic Communist state power is generally attributed to the series of popular upheavals which began in Germany in 1953, continued in Poland and Hungary, and have had consequences for opinion in the Soviet Union itself. It is sometimes forgotten that the personal frenzies shown by Stalin at the very end of his life (specifically, the "Doctor's plot" with its anti-Semitic undertones) were connected with uncertainties about policy which had already begun to divide the Soviet leadership. Among these difficulties one has persisted: as production increased, the supervision of a technological economy shifted from a small political directorate to a far larger grouping of skilled executives. These could hardly be terrorized on the one hand and entrusted with decisions on the other—not at any rate, in the long run. The bureaucrats themselves, in and out of the ruling parties, became restive under total political direction. When confronted with popular antipathy (for perfectly obvious reasons of economic deprivation and, outside the Soviet Union, of injured national pride), bureaucrats and technical intelligentsia preferred solidarity with their nation to loyalty to the dominant party elite. The resultant fissures in the Communist state system eroded still further the legitimacy of the party elites. Alternating repression and concessions, the ruling Communist parties have not mastered a process of political decomposition whose end is not yet in sight.

The revolt of the American under class, symbolized this summer by the construction and closing of Resurrection City in Washington, is equally a process whose beginning we may now understand but about whose end we can only speculate. Originated to overcome legal and conventional racial barriers in the South, it touched the good (or bad) conscience of America as long as it seemed confined to the issue of legal racial separation. As it widened into a demand for total economic integration in the American economy, for factual as well as legal equality, as it spread into the North and as the full dimensions of the cities' problems became clear (including the possible cost of solving them), the revolt met very great psychological and institutional resistance. The United States faces its most serious crisis since the Civil War precisely because its much celebrated consensus has been broken. What is astonishing in retrospect is the rapidity and totality with which the break occurred. For the moment, we may say that sad days are ahead for those with the effrontery to speak of a joyous politics—the more so should circumstances, unhappy for the rest of us, propel them into power.

The relative quiescence of the working-class movement in Western societies has for so long preoccupied social critics that they have failed either to identify sure evidence of turbulence or to make some elementary distinctions. A working-class movement unable or unwilling to engage in total revolution is not necessarily one resigned to complacent collaboration with those in command of large-scale property. Last spring's general strike in France took many by surprise, yet it was preceded by occasional eruptions of mass discontent, by peasant protest verging on jacqueries, by regional movements against economic and cultural asphyxiation, by events like the combined strike of mine workers and engineers in eastern France in 1963, by changes in the structure and temper of trade union leadership.

In West Germany, the acceptance by the Social Democrats of coalition with the Christian Democrats has by no means precluded angry working-class protest at unemployment in the Ruhr district and a gradual increase in the influence of more radical unions like the Metallurgical Workers. The Labour government in Britain has only with difficulty contained the unions more than restive at the government's wages and social investment policies. Belgium has had—quite apart from the linguistic or national quarrel—a continuing series of violent outbreaks of working-class protest. The recent shift of Italian working-class voters further to the left followed extreme union discontent with the economic and social policies of the Center-Left coalition. In the United States, the Auto Workers' break with the AFL-CIO perhaps indicates a renewed union militancy in the immediate future. The political integration of working-class parties in the political system, then, by no means signifies the total integration of the working class in the property system.

What has been dissolving, East and West, is the precarious integration that was attained by industrial societies about 1960. Any depiction of this is bound to resemble a caricature of the writings of integration's apologists. These seemed so plausible, however, because so nearly true—for a time. In the first place, whatever the cyclical and regressive phenomena in the West or the inefficiencies of the State Socialist version of planning in the East, industrial production and living standards were rising. The direction of society seemed to be in the hands of an increasingly technical elite who sought no legitimation apart from their successes in raising living standards. Meanwhile, a considerable enlargement in technical employment was associated with a boom in education: social mobility, and satisfaction of all the aspirations attaching to it, seemed within the reach of a good many—if only vicariously, through their children.

If the imperfections of the Western democratic system were many and if popular participation in the governance of society, economy and state was of necessity extremely restricted, periodic elections did assure a minimum of control of the rulers by the ruled—who in any case believed themselves to be partners in some common enterprise. At the same time, liberalization in the State Socialist countries was bringing nearer the happy if as yet still hypothetical condition of a rapprochement of the two great contending systems. Indeed, insofar as these societies improved their standards of living and technological capacities, or modernized themselves they would have to become more like our own societies. Were we not at the very culminating point of human history, and did not "modernization" entail the use of the computer, the automobile and the washing machine (with the indispensable aid of television, of course) to make everywhere like everywhere else, every one like every other—and most of all, like America and Americans?

The initial critique of this highly bureaucratic vision of the good society was developed by the New Left. This movement was not an American invention. It began in the late fifties in Europe with the dual discrediting of Stalinist communism and reformist social democracy. The British journal New Left Review was founded in 1959, but was a fusion of two journals begun in 1956. The original aim of the European New Left was to reinvigorate the working-class parties. Communist and Social Democrat, by rethinking a socialism which had to be adapted to affluence, to changed global power relations, and to the lessons of the traumatic late forties and the fifties. It may seem surprising now, but the American New Left had a theory—given to it by the late C. Wright Mills—well before it developed a political practice. Mills's analysis of America was transposed to Europe by a certain number of Europeans—those who thought the American model not particularly worthy of emulation. In any case, our own American impression of the New Left as insistently atheoretic is extremely superficial. In Europe, the New Left has always regarded a theoretic reconstruction of socialism as one of its primary tasks, indeed as practically a preliminary to a political program. At the moment, Herbert Marcuse, a German who has lived in America for more than thirty years, is the most influential of New Left thinkers on both continents. One of the bases of his appeal is a clue to the sources of New Left energies everywhere: he is one of those rare old men who can speak to the young. As we shall see, the New Left to a considerable extent has been transmuted into a youth movement. This accounts, here and in Europe, for its frequently instinctual repudiation of old political forms, movements and practices. It also accounts for a split between the working class and intellectual elements in the New Left—which in turn explains the chaotic nature of the campaign against the present system of domination in industrial society. Before examining the campaign itself, I want to diagram briefly the vulnerabilities, the inner contradictions, of that system.

II

East and West, the system rests on doctrines of popular representation and consent and on facts which induce compliance in the absence of representation and consent. In the State Socialist societies, elaborate—indeed, obsessive—charades of electoral legitimization have abounded for years. These, along with educative campaigns in mass organizations, in places of work, in neighborhoods, have had the function of enlarging popular comprehension of state policy, of increasing the sense of participation. But the obvious narrowness of the limits of choice, highly inadequate access to information other than that dispensed by those with opinions to implant—the sense of participating in a ritual rather than in a process of decision—have apparently contributed to a pervasive resentment in these societies, a sense of being played with.

It is surprising, on the face of it, that the free party organization of the Western societies has not had antithetical effects. Part of the explanation may lie in the bureaucratic nature of many of the parties, in their domination by cliques and groups of interests and notables. Even the mass working-class parties of Western Europe, the Communists in France and Italy, the Social Democrats in Germany, the Labour Party in Britain, have usually seemed like textbook examples of party oligopoly brought to life. Pressured by government, by propertied and ideological interest groups outside it, frequently defied or baffled by the state technicians responsible for the daily exercise of power (or rather, not responsible for it, since relatively uncontrolled), parliaments propose but do not dispose, protest but do not initiate, complain but do not command. In the circumstances, a deep popular skepticism about democratic process has taken root even in societies with democratic traditions.

It is a common view among social thinkers that industrial societies, East and West, are evolving toward some form of technocratic elitism. Important decisions, it is held, are in the hands of controllers (not owners) of large-scale property. Technical experts have replaced political amateurs in sphere after sphere of the state, and in the economy itself engineers, programmers and lawyers have replaced mere entrepreneurs. The technicians, it is argued, can dominate the politicians where they do not actually replace them, since they monopolize competence and experience.

There is no doubt that the technicians as a group have enlarged their power in the industrial systems of both East and West in the past decades. Equally, there is no doubt that their power has limits, set by their masters in each system: here, by the owners of large-scale private property; there, by the rulers of the state, the controllers of state property. Finally, there is a dimension of the entire system which escapes control, a way in which the apparatus imposes its own constraints upon those who think they command it, but actually serve it. This last mode of functioning gives industrial societies their dreadful impersonality. It is in response to this bleak remoteness that the politics of personality occurs, an emphasis which is a central mode of obscuring the real forces at work in society and a considerable contribution to the domestication of subject populations. Since in the long run personalization explains nothing, that domestication can and frequently does become sullen and resentful.

At the same time, the technocrats are at the apex of the most rapidly expanding group in the industrial labor force: the technical intelligentsia, composed of minor administrators, technicians, semi-professionals, intermediate state functionaries, teachers, mass communicators, and others like them. Without these, the routine work of the large public and private bureaucracies would be impossible.

The technical intelligentsia has an ambiguous relationship to the centers of power in society. Close enough to power to participate in the pickings, remote enough to be subordinated to it, the technical intelligentsia has as yet to develop a full consciousness of its own indispensability to the industrial system. Its unstable political disposition testifies to this ambiguity, which is rooted in the occupational contradiction experienced by most persons in the category. As individuals, their career chances depend upon the favors of their superiors; as members of the group, their interests and those of their superiors frequently conflict.

The vulnerabilities of a system of this kind are at this historical moment somewhat closer to the surface of events. In the first place, the system's chief claim to legitimacy is its sheer weight and factuality: it must be right, because it is there and it works. Insofar as it does not work, legitimacy can erode rapidly. Guerrillalike challenges to the system may well provoke violently repressive reactions on the part of large numbers whose psychological security depends upon believing what they are told. They may also produce chain reactions of discontent, by showing that the system can be disrupted with ease. Before the guerrillas can be recruited, however, a number of other processes have to intensify.

It has seemed recently that they have begun to do so. Disillusionment with parliamentary government is widespread in Western Europe, and faith in the legislative process cannot be said to be very high in this country. Indeed, the probity of government itself is widely in question. A growing general conviction that politics is a racket may constitute a beginning point for critical reflection on the distinction between a true politics and a politics that is merely paid for. The evidence from the Communist nations suggests that official corruption in all of its forms, from outright theft to the peddling of influence and the more shadowy area of nepotism, is a continual irritant to populations constantly called upon to excel themselves in conformity to a new morality. These events apart, the unrepresentative effect of current systems of political representation has been increasingly felt by modern populations. Politics has indeed become professionalized, but it is a profession whose practitioners are curiously unable to satisfy their nominal clients.

The remoteness and opaqueness of many of the processes essential to the governing of modern societies has been a constant theme of social interpretation. Much has been written of "alienation," of "depersonalization," of the loss of a sense of true community. These analyses were and are invariably joined to an insistence that bureaucracy is here to stay, and carry a covert assumption: that modern populations would show more wisdom in collaborating with a rule of this sort than in combating it.

What has happened recently shows that resistance to bureaucratization may take quite varied forms. For one thing, the technicians may be called to account. For another, opaqueness and remoteness may be refused: the demand for openness, that decisions regarding important social questions be not only publicly questioned but made publicly, is the beginning of an attack on bureaucratization whose end is difficult to foresee.

III

The industrial societies, then, have been structurally vulnerable for rather a long period. How can we explain the relatively sudden realization of their potential fragility? At first thought it may seem that the revolt of the Third World against imperialism could have had only indirect effects on the internal stability of the advanced societies; but upon reflection, these may have been more direct than we realized. Within the past dozen years, imperialist wars have bitterly divided Britain, France and our own country. In Britain, the Suez episode of 1956 engendered neither civil disobedience nor governmental counter-repression; nevertheless, large numbers, among the educated in particular, did doubt the legitimacy of the Eden government because of its attack on Egypt. Staid organs of liberal opinion demanded its instant eviction from office in terms devoid of British restraint. The episode was brief but it also marked the beginning of the political disaffection of middle-class youth, subsequently expressed in the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and the campaign against apartheid in Africa. In France the Algerian War brought the fall of the Fourth Republic, the continuing conspiracy against the Fifth Republic by some of its original founders (including a part of the army), and support for the Algerian revolution from large numbers of intellectuals. The erosion of legitimacy in our country on account of the continuation of the Vietnamese War hardly requires demonstration. It is useful to recall that it confirmed many of the American intellectual elite in their worst apprehensions about their country.

The Soviet Union, too, has had its imperial disasters. The Yugoslav heresy, the German rising, Polish revisionism, the Hungarian Revolution, Romanian independence, and now the Czech reforms constitute a chain of challenges to the Soviet Union which have had cumulative effects on the Soviet population—particularly on the intellectual and political elite. The economic and social gains of the Soviet population are impressive, but it remains a question whether, in the present crisis of legitimacy, some Russians may not see the Chinese model as offering hopes of a renaissance of revolutionary ardor and efficacy, a new route to the old goals of the revolution.

It is striking that, East and West, the vulnerability of power is greatest where it is in visible discord with its own professed ideals. Criticism, dissent, resistance and revolution legitimate themselves by measuring the existing institutions against acknowledged social values. The anti-institutional campaigns launched in this way, however, seem to produce their own values in a process intended by no one but which has enlarged (sometimes vertiginously) our historical experience. Consider the emergence of the movement for Black Power in the United States, and its cultural component, the demand for a recognition of the integrity, distinctiveness and excellence of Afro-American culture. The civil rights movement began with an ideology in part of Christian brotherhood, in part of American natural rights. The demand for integration took at face value the claims of the American political community. The idea of Black Power is in part a recognition that, for other ethnic groups, integration in that community has been a matter of integration as a group, not by the acceptance of its members as individual Americans. It has, however, departed from the normal discourse of American politics and sought justification not only in the interests of the American black population but in defining these through the lens of a new conception of Afro-American culture. The conception is not entirely new; it is a particular version of doctrines of negritude developed by African intellectuals (chiefly in Paris) as a result of their encounter with European culture. The shift of opinions and tactics in the American Negro movement also reflects a conflict of generations. We have now to inquire into this conflict, the most profound expression to date of the general crisis.

IV

It seems only yesterday that David Riesman was describing the "found generation" in the American colleges: matter of fact, devoid of ideological enthusiasm or even political interest, concerned with personal relations and, above all, with individual careers, eager to move from campus to corporation and suburb. The German sociologist Helmut Schelsky found not dissimilar phenomena in his own country, and wrote a treatise on the "skeptical generation." The New Wave of French films included a depiction of Parisian youth, Les Tricheurs, which showed them with the same preoccupations: a privatized style of life. The respected Polish sociologist Jan Szepanski studied the children of workers and peasants in universities, and came to the conclusion that they were more interested in advancing themselves in society than in the advance of Socialist society.

Conflicts of generation and youth movements, many with important student components, are not new. The outstanding novelties of the present situation, however, are three: the rapidity with which it has developed and is developing; its international and indeed intercontinental character; its rough ideological texture and cultural innovation. This last is attached, alas, to an often indiscriminate rejection by the young of everything they could inherit (a tendency especially pronounced in the most ahistoric of historical societies, our own).

When the New Left in this country and in Germany was still limited to small numbers of especially critical students, a mass movement of cultural innovation had begun among working-class and lower-middle-class youth elsewhere in Europe. The emergence of groups of Pop artists, of self-entertainment among the young, altered the pattern of commercial exploitation of the popular arts. For once, these were made by the people (or some of them) rather than for them; absolute domination of this cultural market by the sellers changed into a frantic pursuit of the new tastes of new buyers. This movement spread to different class levels; the Beatles in England; the young chansonniers like Antoine in France; the folk singers like Bob Dylan and Joan Baez in America, had this in common: they spoke not alone of immediate and private concerns, but gave these general accents. They dealt with parents, with bosses, with the atomic bomb, with politicians. The increasing political awareness of the Beatles (some of whose early work was cretinous) is perhaps symptomatic of a larger tendency. For once, mass culture had as its content neither total escape from routine nor an ignoble capitulation to it but a modicum of criticism of it. In brief, the student revolt was anticipated in somewhat less intellectual groups.

A list of recent student revolts reads like an international directory of institutions of higher education. In these uprisings, political and educational revolt were and are difficult to distinguish. Indeed, it is a question whether the distinction between political and educational revolt is really tenable. Consider, to begin with, the recent crisis of higher education. Originally designed for a relatively small elite to be educated as future professionals, scholars, teachers and higher civil servants, the universities everywhere have had thrust upon them a multiplicity of functions: pure and applied research in the most varied fields, from physics to public health; the supply of expertise, as well as experts, to government and economy; the training of the new technical intelligentsia. All of this has had to be mastered by overworked (and often uninterested) teaching staffs, working within academic structures and programs designed for age classes sometimes one-third the size of the present entering classes and, in any case, formerly recruited to the universities almost entirely from culturally homogeneous bourgeois families.

Over-administered, over-organized, over-specialized, the large American universities are monuments to the simple credulity of academic Pooh Bahs who have believed that the repeated addition of divisions and functions would in the end add up to a new educational whole. What has emerged instead is a formless and inchoate training ground for a number of occupations, high and middle. Some Europeans admire the image of a university system perfectly adapted to the future requirements of manpower supply, and this is indeed an ideal congenial to many educational planners in this and other countries. (The German province of Baden-Württemberg has recently developed a plan for higher education which reads like the California Master Plan, translated into Swabian.) The difficulties with this conception are two. First, manpower training for this or the next decade will educate a generation quite unable to understand the decade after next. Second, the most articulate of the young want not training but an education, an opportunity to understand the implications for personal choice of the present requirements of culture. The modern American university denies, explicitly, that education in this sense is possible; its European sisters suppose that it is—as long as culture can be stopped at about 1918, or (in more contemporary cases) 1939.

An outraged sense of relevance, an unfulfilled demand for moral significance, are at the bottom of the educational revolt—even if the students' conceptions of the changed university are often proof in themselves that the education they have received until now is entirely defective. To these sources of university protest must be added, of course, the familiar catalogue of academic pathologies: the absurd belief that in a period of the decomposition of parental authority, the universities can assume functions long since abandoned in despair by the real parents; the obsolescence of pedagogic technique on both continents; the generalized arbitrariness of university government. Finally, the association of the universities with the ruling elites, East and West, has made them accomplices of domination, and this willing collaboration seems to the young a form of political choice as transparent as it is abhorrent.

It is clear that I have been discussing the avant-garde in the universities—but one of the characteristics of periods of rapid cultural transition is that the avant-garde suddenly finds itself with large publics. Tens of thousands of students everywhere (millions in this country) go suddenly ahead with routine, but the avant-garde has within a decade succeeded in rendering the notion of academic routine suspect. It has done so by a relatively simple technique, and with the indispensable assistance of the constituted powers: a minimum of disturbance has been relied upon, with unerring insight, to produce a maximum of repression. Once used, the repressive apparatus may or may not be clothed again in the garb of civility, but the demonstration will nevertheless have been successful. Pedagogic rhetoric, public service ideology, technological busy work: behind these from now on can be seen the policeman's club.

The student avant-garde is especially attracted to political activity in new forms. Maoism's ostensible refusal of compromise with the bourgeois enemy is no doubt a cause of its popularity among the European students, but they are profoundly drawn by the notion that routine itself is reactionary, that only the permanent and all-pervasive revolution can prevent a lapse into the rigidity they see as the ineluctable result of organization. The same traits mark the American SDS and account for its ineffectuality as a national organization but its potency on specific campuses. (Even the German SDS, contrary to national political character, has been touched by this tendency.) The international political character of the libertarianism of the student protest movement suggests one of its meanings: it is an expression of the students' rejection of the bureaucratic careers for which their education has been preparing them. It is at this point that the students revolt against society and the student revolt against the universities have become one.

Initially, this analysis would seem not to apply to the students in the Communist societies, or to apply only very generally. It is no doubt true that some of their protest stems from the conviction that their societies are insufficiently open to the technical or even technocratic direction so indignantly repudiated by their Western counterparts. But even in the West, it should be recalled, some student protest has this component: many student revolutionaries are studying disciplines like sociology whose practical application at present is narrowly circumscribed and entirely contained by the existing institutions of command and control. The students want jobs, but they want meaningful ones. If the Western students regard the State Socialist societies as nothing but another variant of bureaucratic domination, the Eastern ones do envy their Western contemporaries their relative freedom of organization and expression. As different as the particular circumstances of State Socialist society may be, some of the fundamental causes of the Western student revolt operate in the Communist nations as well: anger and contempt at the moral pettiness of the fathers, expressed by a new generation of sons; dismay at the flagrant contradiction between the liberating perspectives of Communist ideology and the constricting grayness of Communist routine.

Protest at an increasingly inhuman and mechanical world; a new cultural Ludditism, in which the workers seek to destroy the new means of production, the universities; the crystallization of a new political avant-garde among the bearers of a new global consciousness; an anticipatory strike by the most indispensable element in the future labor force, the technical intelligentsia of tomorrow—these are the possible interpretations of the student revolt. All are true to some degree, but in the particular interplay of national, academic and political traditions and generational discontent which marks each separate student revolt, one or another of these themes may become salient. For the moment, we may say that the offspring of industrial society's elite and its technical intelligentsia have denied the legitimacy as well as the efficacy of the educational process to which they have been subjected. They have moved from dissent and disobedience to organized revolt. In so doing, they have not hesitated to extend their campaign to the central political institutions of their societies.

V

To what extent is the student movement likely to be followed by others? That the American under class should violently reject the legitimacy of a political community which has visited upon it humiliation and poverty is not surprising; it now seems surprising only that it waited so long. The initial demands and gains of the civil rights movement both raised the expectations of the under class and taught it something about the vulnerabilities of the society. As half-measures, belated concessions, delay and repression met its further demands and demonstrations, the society's vulnerability increased. In the gradual destruction of that self-congratulation which for so long served America as a substitute for a theory and practice of community, groups other than the Negroes began to make their demands heard, if not felt. Mexicans, Indians, the poor in the Appalachians, Puerto Ricans, the aged, the white poor generally, became restive and often militant. The impossible seems to be happening: a coalition of the global under class in the Third World with the most exploited and neglected groups in the world's most powerful imperialist power.

But the disruptive and negative force of these American groups seems greater than their positive political capacity to remake American society; for this they need allies. So far, their allies have come from middle-class youth, and from a limited segment of that youth. Whether other groups in the great intermediate reaches of the American social structure can be mobilized to change the society seems doubtful, but the issue is by no means as foreclosed as it was a decade ago. The astonishing resonance of the housewives' purchasing strike, some time ago, suggests an untapped reservoir of discontent. Most middle-class males, in the meantime, are relatively quiescent. Most, however, work for large public or private bureaucracies, and it is significant that this is not alone the fastest growing segment of the labor force but the sector in which unionization is advancing most rapidly. The example of the schoolteachers to date is the most conspicuous, and if the spectacle of IBM's technicians occupying IBM's factories and research facilities as yet appears remote, it is not entirely unthinkable.

It is at this point that the theory of student revolt as an anticipatory strike by a critical segment of the future labor force offers hope for the future. In the Communist societies, the technical intelligentsia is restive and angry at dogmatic controls on the utilization of their technical competence. The equivalent of these controls, in the Western societies, is the primacy of market considerations over the rational possibilities of technology. It remains, of course, for those who do the work in the technologically intensive industries to recognize the connections between their sub-ordination on the job and their deprivations as citizens.

The implantation of what is, in effect, the Socialist tradition into the technical intelligentsia (and into the elite) seems unlikely when it remains partly dormant in the working class. Yet European socialism in its prosperous periods depended upon the most skilled and best paid groups in the working class, and American union militancy has manifested a somewhat similar pattern. As the composition of the labor force changes, the technical intelligentsia may be thought of as its vanguard (if a remarkably well-paid vanguard). However, the available evidence to date for a structural change in the opinion and political comportment of the technical intelligentsia is highly fragmentary.

The participation of the working class in the general movement of dissent varies from society to society. In America, the organized working class has confined itself to the usual sorts of union campaign. In Germany, the unions were hostile to the student demonstrations which followed the attempted assassination of Rudi Dutschke. In France, however, the students' battle with the police won the sympathy of the workers—and the leaders of the unions and of the parties of the Left had to struggle to obtain command of a movement whose spontaneity obviously both surprised and discomfited them. The practically explicit collaboration between the regime and the Communist party in maintaining the Fifth Republic served to strengthen the conviction of many French students that the old Left is not a force for change. To what extent this conviction will spread to the younger workers it is not yet possible to say. The continuing militancy of the rank and file in the traditional centers of French unionism (automobiles, for instance) has been joined by the extremely radical position of the Left Catholic unions, strong in the technologically advanced industries. In entirely different circumstances, the Polish party has mobilized a certain amount of working-class opposition to dissident students, who are portrayed as anti-national and as seeking special advantages. Appeals of this sort in the factories by the Novotny faction failed in Czechoslovakia.

Perhaps the most remarkable aspect of events in the past months has been neither the student revolt nor working-class protest, but the seizure in France and Czechoslovakia of bureaucratic institutions by their highly dedicated personnel. I have said that evidence for change in the fundamental political attitudes of the intelligentsia remains fragmentary; here is some which suggests that the battle for self-determination and participation in the work place has been joined by part of the advanced labor force in nations which exemplify neo-capitalism on the one hand and neo-communism on the other.

For the rest, if the currents I have described are increasingly visible on the surface of events, the response of those threatened by the present decomposition of power may well retard, distort or block the libertarian goals. It is easy enough to identify those whose interests are threatened: the imperial and party elites entrenched in the state apparatus, East and West; the rulers of large-scale property and the great bureaucratic patrons; the millions whose large prejudices and small security are menaced by any radical prospect of change in an order which has brought them a modicum, however modest or even derisory, of reward.

It should not be thought that the efforts of those in command of the present system are entirely devoted to repressing those who seek to replace them. Rather, the more prescient and supple of our rulers have attempted less to stem the tide than to canalize it. The recent espousal of the doctrines of "participatory democracy" by so unlikely a convert to New Left thought as Charles de Gaulle attests not alone his instinct for new historical forces but the supreme artistry of the epoch's most gifted technician of power when faced with the prospect of losing his own. If America has 40 million poor, their conversion into 40 million new customers is in fact an urgent priority. In the Communist societies, the recent disturbances in Belgrade University suggest that what but two decades ago was innovation has by now become rigidity. [See "Tito Digs the Students" by Carey McWilliams, The Nation, July 22.]

If, however, sufficient numbers in important sectors of society feel psychologically threatened by the new dimension of politics, a repressive consolidation of existing institutions may attract considerable mass support. The Gaullist counter-demonstrations in the French cities, the electoral rhetoric and success of the Republican right wing in this country, the rise of the National Democratic Party in Western Germany, the emergence of a very ugly domestic racism in Britain, are phenomena each of which fits into distinctive national political traditions. The disorder attendant upon change, the absence of communication between dissident groups and those frozen in their positions by fear as well as by rational self-interest, the inability of large groups in the advanced societies to comprehend the inner structure of events or their own ultimate interest, are effective components in a movement of recoil which may yet brake or stop the attack on the present distribution of power. These elements of reaction are entirely visible in the Communist societies as well, where national chauvinism, the envy of the negatively privileged, and a despairing effort to avoid further convulsions are factors in popular adherence to campaigns against cosmopolitan intellectuals who manifest abstract and universal ideas of freedom.

Whether reason will find new historical forms is still unclear. What is clear is that the existing powers can no longer claim to incorporate reason. Indeed, we may interpret the political experiments of those opposed to ossification in industrial society as a new form of the pursuit of reason. The changes induced in our lives by the productivity of industry, by science and its applications, by the extension (real and potential) of higher culture, by the emergence of a global society, can neither be contained nor mastered by our political and social traditions. The present outbreak of generational conflict may represent the beginning of a new form of permanent revolution in industrial society: the avant-garde, erratically and crudely, may have grasped the implications of our historical moment. It is the tragedy of revolutions that they establish new legitimacies and, usually, new tyrannies. Almost paralyzed, morally, by the recent efforts at a total integration of industrial society we now have to learn to live with a permanent process of disruption. In it, however, we may see our only chance to match our social practice to our human potential.

Discovering Spiro Agnew

RICHARD O'MARA

Mr. O'Mara is an editorial writer on the Baltimore Evening Sun.

Baltimore

When the Governor of Maryland confronted reporters at the Hilton Plaza Hotel at Miami Beach, shortly after being tapped by Richard Nixon, he remarked rather baldly that "Spiro Agnew is not a household name." Coming from anyone else an admission this obvious might be suspected of irony, but stating the obvious is Mr. Agnew's style. The Governor, 49, is stolid, with few curves or subtleties. He is a deep man, not in the intellectual sense but as a brooder. His favorite diversion is watching the Baltimore Colts on television.

The Baltimore reaction to Mr. Nixon's surprising choice was one of mirth. Baltimore is a Democratic town and even the least sagacious political strategist looked upon Agnew as a liability that would very probably cost Nixon the election.

This is not to say that the Governor is not popular or respected in Maryland. He is, though less so than when he took office, and the allegiance has shifted perceptibly to the right. This has occurred as Agnew has become better known to the public. Most Marylanders are by now aware of his limitations. He is a skilled administrator and organizer, but less than artful in the devices of politics. He keeps his own counsel, approaches the affairs of his state with seriousness, even gravity. He is strong minded and has been known to go against the advice of his closest aides. A case in point was his attack on moderate Negro leaders who had gathered at his request after the April rioting in Baltimore.

Governor Agnew scolded them for not denouncing the militants of their race, and for being unable to restrain their people after the militants had led them astray. More than one observer got the impression the Governor was blaming his visitors for the riot. The Negro leaders walked out while Agnew was still going on, and later condemned him as impulsive. The racist tag emerged shortly thereafter, as the shock of the Governor's attack soured into resentment. It has clung to him ever since.

But Governor Agnew is not impulsive. It was learned later that he had been formulating that speech weeks before the murder of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. His aides had advised him to drop it, but he decided to speak his piece, even though the fires that had come to Baltimore put an even sharper edge on his words.

Spiro Theodore Agnew (his friends call him Ted) really began his political career in 1962, when he won election as executive of Baltimore County (before that he had served on the County Appeals Board and with a few local civic groups). The county is 75 per cent Democratic, a sprawling haven for white refugees from the Negroes of Baltimore, and a leafy retreat for right-thinking, middle-class liberals. Thus Agnew's reputation as a man who could draw a bipartisan vote was established in that election. He won because he managed to project himself as a reformer who could put an end to the barbershop politics of the Democratic machine which had controlled the county for so long. There was also at the time a split among the professional Democrats of the county, and that further boosted Agnew to the executive's office.

Agnew's county administration was unspectacular, as is everything else he does. He had hoped to ban pay-off pinball machines from the county, but Democratic opposition in the council blocked him. He also failed to rally enough support for the construction of several badly needed incinerators in the county, which like other areas in the great Northeastern megalopolis suffers from a disposal problem.

On the positive side, Agnew left his mark on Baltimore County by professionalizing the local civil service. He wiped out a lot of the more unsavory political sinecures and brought a more businesslike, if less flamboyant, style to the running of the county. He got a county-wide public accommodations law passed in 1963, and to his everlasting credit, he attempted along with then Republican Mayor Theodore McKeldin of Baltimore to move cautiously toward the still-distant dream of real cooperation between Baltimore City and Baltimore County. On this he was fiercely resisted by those suburbanites (the majority) who believe the city is a place for work, whose museums, stadium and theatres are there to be enjoyed, but whose aching problems are to be avoided at all cost.

Agnew won the governorship of Maryland in 1966 under conditions very much like those that gained him the county executive's office. He profited from a wide split in the Democratic ranks, this time on the state level.

George P. Mahoney had won the Democratic primary, beating out Carleton Sickles, a competent and liberal candidate from Prince Georges County. Mr. Mahoney is an office-seeking phenomenon in Maryland politics. At present he is running for the United States Senate, for the fourth time. He also ran four times for governor. He has yet to hold political office, elective or appointive. Mahoney is a tall, thin, lacquered-looking, gray-haired man, with a slight lisp, and a wet-fish handshake. He is a wealthy contractor and a blatant racist. He tuned his whole campaign in 1966 to the slogan: "Your Home is Your Castle—Protect It." He is Maryland's George Wallace, but without fire and brimstone.

Alongside Mahoney, Spiro Agnew sparkled with wisdom and virtue—a fair-dealing, well-spoken man who supported civil rights and looked favorably on metropolitan government. He was elected mainly by Negroes and liberals, but even some conservatives were unable to stomach Mr. Mahoney.

As Governor, Agnew supported the progressive document produced by the Maryland Constitutional Convention, and with the rest of the liberal community, lamented profoundly its rejection by the electorate last May. His financial policy was the first thing to distress the people who had supported him for governor, or at least most of them. The budget he introduced into the General Assembly at the start of last year was tight—a "Republican budget," one observer called it—and painful because it called for sharp cuts in health and education funds.

The seeds of disillusionment sown at the time of the budget sprouted during a fracas at Bowie State College, a Negro liberal arts college midway between Baltimore and Washington. In early April, the students took over the college and demanded a meeting with the Governor. Their complaints, most people felt who listened to them, were legitimate, even if their tactics were dubious. Bowie had been allowed to run down; the buildings were in terrible shape, and the faculty not much better. But Agnew thought he saw a threat to his authority, and he responded by closing Bowie. Later he ordered a group of Negro students arrested when they came to Annapolis to meet with him. What upset most people was that he ordered the students hauled away at a moment when he was just across the street from the Statehouse. He could easily have walked over and talked with the young people, especially since he professed to sympathize with their complaints.

After that, to the sorrow of most Negroes and liberals, and to the joy of most conservatives and reactionaries, Governor Agnew's political coloration seemed to change. The attack on the Negro moderates soon followed, then he dismissed the gun-control measures in Congress as the product of "fuzzy thinking." His argument against tighter gun controls contained an exotic note. Banning all guns (which no one had suggested), the Governor said, would not put an end to killing. He spoke of how some people are skilled at knife throwing, or constructing bombs, and then lectured briefly on those "people, as I mentioned, an African tribe, that shoot little darts through a blowgun very accurately."

Governor Agnew's criticism of the Kerner Commission's report on civil disorders was, in the minds of many, his final commitment to the Right. Since then he has reiterated his belief that looters should be shot down by the police.

The selection of Agnew as Nixon's running mate surprised and amused a large number of Democrats. Probably just as many Republicans were at least surprised. There are two major complaints against his candidacy: that he was picked only because he was acceptable to the South; and that he is unknown. But one can imagine that these may not look like objections to Nixon. His strategy this time is fairly clearly aimed at winning the South away from Mr. Wallace. And the running mate's relative obscurity may be viewed in the Nixon camp as more of an advantage than a drawback.

Most of the other men considered for the second spot on the ticket—for example, Senators Hatfield and Percy, Mayor Lindsay—were well-known Northern liberals, anathema to the South. Despite his recent veer to the right, Agnew's image is still not clearly defined, and with a little public relations work can be molded to suit the occasion and audience. For Northern consumption, his liberal background could be stressed; the later acts and attitudes could be mentioned in the South. Because Annapolis is not far from Baltimore, Agnew has already been described as an expert on urban affairs.

Whether this strategy will succeed is, of course, uncertain. Agnew will be under national scrutiny from now on, and everything he has done, and will do, will be seized upon for exploitation by the Democrats. Already a group of Negroes in Maryland have organized to defeat the Nixon-Agnew ticket by trying to tell their version of the Agnew story outside of Maryland. Their tale will not be unbiased.

It is probably unjust to characterize Spiro Agnew as a racist. He is honestly disturbed by the "breakdown of law and order," and when he uses that expression he means it literally, not as a code phrase designed to stir up anti-Negro feeling.

Actually his hard line in the governor's mansion should not have been a surprise. As county executive he never had to deal with problems of great magnitude. It was not a new Ted Agnew who railed against looters, against moderate Negroes, against gun controls. He had just never before been in a position that required him to discuss such problems.

If Agnew is not a racist but merely a conservative Republican, he is also decidedly no expert on cities. As executive of Baltimore County he presided over what could be described as a toy government when it is compared to running the city itself. The county dispenses few services and concerns itself mainly with paving a few roads and providing a minimum in sewerage and disposal facilities. Although he approves of metropolitan government, in theory, Spiro Agnew approached the governorship with a suburban mentality. He would bring the same outlook to the Vice Presidency.

HOW MONGOLIA GETS ALONG

ALBERT AXELBANK

Mr. Axelbank, a resident of Japan since 1959, has written for the AP, UPI and The New York Times. He reports regularly for newspapers and periodicals in North America, Europe and Asia.

In the cool, nicely sculptured Mongol capital of Ulan Bator, I was told: "If you want to see a Chinese face, go to the Chinese Embassy." It was true. On the streets you can see plenty of Russians, and if you look closely you will see Soviet soldiers moving about in closed trucks. Some of them are missile men. You will also see Czechs, Poles, East Germans, Hungarians, Bulgarians and Romanians—mostly technicians contributing "Socialist comradeship assistance." But no Chinese. About 20,000 Chinese coolies who worked in Mongolia at the start of this decade have vanished. Peking withdrew them when Sino-Mongol relations began to freeze. But the Chinese left a legacy of fine architectural achievements. They put up the modern Hotel Ulan Bator and several stylish twelve-story skyscrapers. They also laid the railroad track running between Peking and Ulan Bator. The Chinese are very good builders.

Reliable reports say the Soviets recently placed mobile missile sites in the eastern or Buir Nor ("Black Lake") region of Mongolia, a largely desolate, uninhabited terrain where thousands died in mid-1939 when Japanese military forces in Manchukuo tested Russo-Mongolian strength. The Japanese were decisively beaten. Some analysts believe the missiles are aimed at China. But since home-based Soviet rockets can presumably reach every nook and corner of China, it seems more probable that these missiles are directed against American military installations in Asia, specifically in Okinawa and Japan.

Christian Science Monitor

There are a good many relevant facts to support this supposition: (1) The USSR has, for some years, been nervous about the U.S. nuclear stockpile on Okinawa, as well as about the frequent U.S.-Japanese naval exercises in the Sea of Japan, the B-52 strategic bombers flying into Okinawa, the U.S. nuclear subs entering Japanese ports and the American military build-up in South Korea—amid reports, mostly circulated in Japan and the United States, of the possibility of a “second Korean War.” (2) The rockets reportedly placed in Mongolia, code-named “Scamp” and “Scrooge,” have effective ranges that encompass Okinawa and Japan. The “Black Lake” region is 1,450 miles from Okinawa and 1,300 miles from Tokyo. (3) The Soviet missile presence in Mongolia was detected after the intensive American escalation of the war in Vietnam. (4) A Russo-Mongol military pact signed in early 1966—note the date!—allows the Russians to station Soviet troops in Mongolia.

Russian economic aid to the Mongolian People's Republic has been generous. The new military pact with the Soviet Union will tend to strengthen Russo-Mongol friendship, which is already described as “unbreakable.” Not long ago, Mongolia's Premier, Yumzhagin Tsedenbal, revealed how his country looks at Russia and China. During an interview with a Japanese journalist, he said: “Mongolian relations with the Soviet Union are based on equality, mutual respect and mutual support.” He also said that aid from the Kremlin is “one force” helping Mongolia construct socialism. But as to Sino-Mongol ties, Tsedenbal injected some “conditions,” which included “. . . equality, mutual respect for political independence of the other, and noninterference in the internal affairs of the other while developing joint enterprises in all fields.”

Mongolia is big, bigger than France, England and West

Germany combined. But its population is small, smaller than that of the borough of Brooklyn. It lacks skilled labor. So it needs plenty of outside aid. Recently Tsedenbal, who is also First Secretary of the Central Committee of the People's Revolutionary (Communist) Party, explained why Mongolia accepts outside assistance. He spoke in one of those excessively explicit parables that seem integral to Communist political style: “If one has the power to carry only 70 kilograms but wishes to carry 120 kilograms, then one carries his maximum 70 kilograms and asks others to help carry the remaining 50. By doing that, it becomes possible to carry more in the same amount of time. Thus, it is possible to save time.” He made a dig at China, saying that if China would pursue its development with aid from “brother Socialist nations,” that country could get on with its development more rapidly.

Soviet aid to Ulan Bator since 1947 has reached more than 2 billion rubles in loans and grants, not including military equipment. By comparison, grants and loans from Peking have amounted to less than half a billion rubles, according to available statistics. The biggest portion of Russian economic aid to Mongolia was a 615-million ruble loan for the 1961-65 period. China had previously announced a 200-million ruble loan, so it appeared that the Russians were bent on outbidding the Chinese.

The progress of Mongolia in the past few years is striking. New industries, new roads, new apartment houses have been built. New schools and hospitals and theatres have been opened. A Frenchman visiting Mongolia fifty years ago remarked that: “At its present pace, Mongolia will need 1,500 years to catch up with the rest of civilization.” In America, Japan and Western Europe, the best known Mongolists assert that recent progress in Mongolia has been extraordinary.

I was driven to Darkhan, the second largest industrial city. It is a remarkable “boom town,” and I'm told I was perhaps the first non-Communist journalist to visit there. Darkhan has the best paved roads in Mongolia; a section of four-lane highway circles through it. New industries are popping up here and there. Six years ago less than 2,000 persons lived in Darkhan, and it was not even spotted on most government maps. Today it has more than 30,000 people and figures prominently in the fourth Five Year Economic and Cultural Development Plan for 1966-70.

A civic official who joined us on our tour of Darkhan said that the valley outside the city, where most of the industry is located, was once called the “Valley of God.” He went on: “But in reality there was no god. All was empty and desolate.” (In winter, the mercury drops to 50 below in the valley.) With a grin, he added that now there is a “god” in the valley—he called it the “god of people in action.”

In this valley I saw a cement works, a thermal power station, a building materials factory, a meat processing plant—all brand new. Russians, Bulgarians, East Germans and Romanians are helping build these new industries.

Before leaving the country, I squeezed in a visit to a textile mill in Ulan Bator. Its equipment is British, bearing such names as "Prince Smith and Stells Ltd." and "Thomas Holt Ltd." But all of the engineers are Mongols, including several women technicians. Various slogans were painted on the walls such as "Use every minute to make progress," and "No pains—no gains." I thought them good slogans for a developing country.

This mill produces mostly material for clothes. Each month it manufactures 80,000 yards and exports about 40 per cent of it to other Socialist nations. I saw 30,000 yards of wool covers which were to be sent to Hanoi as a gift. The average wage is 500 tugrik a month (about $100). Of course, as in most Socialist states, rents are low. The mill is closed on Sundays.

The Mongols are giving more and more attention to improving their culture. In recent years, a National Theatre for opera and ballet, a symphony orchestra, a folk instruments orchestra and youth chorus groups have been established. Classical works from abroad are often shown. Shakespeare's Othello is popular, but so are works by Molière, Goldoni, Lope de Vega, Gogol and Chekhov. At the National Theatre I watched a beautifully staged performance of the Mongol opera, Among Three Moun- tains of Sorrow. The audience included many Mongol soldiers and their wives or girl friends. The music, in the pentatonic scale, was played by an all-female orchestra.

Diplomatically, Mongolia is of course close to the Soviet Union, but the Kremlin doesn't run Mongolia's foreign policy and it is silly as well as offensive to call the country a "Soviet puppet." How many countries today are truly "independent"? Peking insists on scolding the Mongols both for siding with the Russians and for being "Titoist." As if to show independence of China, the Mongols recently entertained Tito, who had arrived nonstop from a state visit to Japan. But it is to be noted that Peking still maintains a full-fledged embassy in Ulan Bator.

France and Britain recognize Mongolia; America, Japan and Canada do not. Mongolia wants diplomatic relations with these countries and is refreshingly flexible enough to admit their nationals as visitors. Why Washington should persist in nonrecognition is a puzzle. Mongolia is a UN member and, curiously, America has no quarantine against U.S. citizens visiting there. Meanwhile, Mongolia gets along with such relations as it has and, according to most visitors from Japan and the West, gets along very well indeed.

POLITICAL SCIENCE

THE BATTLE FOR INTEGRITY

MARVIN SURKIN

Mr. Surkin, on leave from Moravian College, is currently teaching political science at Manhattan Community College. He is a member of the executive committee of the Caucus for a New Political Science.

The expansion of cold-war-oriented research in the social sciences (and elsewhere) has produced a new alliance between the government and academia. Whether for military, business or managerial purposes, social sciences are being used as instruments for system maintenance at home and counterrevolution abroad. What Christopher Lasch calls "The Cultural Cold War" (The Nation, September 11, 1967) describes this highly controversial new alliance. Lasch emphasizes that, although academic freedom may have triumphed in America, intellectual independence or critical thinking has not necessarily followed. Rather, it is by now a commonplace that a large segment of the "knowledge industry" has become a trusted ally of the military-industrial complex and shares in a variety of ways the interests of American world power. Thus, it should no longer surprise anyone that the CIA and the Department of Defense have developed a serious and ever-tightening bond with the intellectual and academic community.

An example of this trend was made public in 1967 when it was disclosed that two top officials of the American Political Science Association (APSA) had CIA ties. (They still have them.) The Nation [editorial, "The Professor & the CIA," February 27, 1967] reported that Dr. Evron Kirkpatrick, executive director, and Mr. Max Kampelman, treasurer, have served as president and vice president of Operations and Policy Research (OPR), a CIA recipient organization, since its formation in 1955. OPR is a non-profit research organization set up to help the USIA distribute literature in the United States and abroad and to advise on the selection of books to be sponsored by the USIA. In addition to support from the USIA, OPR has received subsidies from such CIA conduits as the Sidney and Esther Rabb Charitable Foundation and the Pappas Charitable Trust of Boston. OPR can best be described as a "cold-war-oriented strategy organization." In short, top officials of a prestigious academic association with a membership of 16,000 political scientists have been simultaneously holding positions with an important CIA affiliate organization.

After the disclosures of Kirkpatrick and Kampelman's CIA connections, the APSA appointed an ad hoc committee to determine whether the independence and integrity of the Association had been compromised. This group reported that "the APSA has received no funds directly from any intelligence agency of the government, nor has it carried on any activities for any intelligence agency of the government." It acknowledged, however, that the APSA did receive funds indirectly from the CIA. The report stated: "The Association has received no funds indirectly from any intelligence agency of government, with one possible exception. The Asia Foundation stated on March 21, 1967, that it has been the recipient of money from foundations named as conduits for CIA funds. The APSA has received grants from the Asia Found-dation . . . " Nevertheless, the committee decided to support Kirkpatrick and Kampelman, acknowledging "on behalf of the membership of the organization, the great services which both Kirkpatrick and Kampelman have rendered to the APSA . . . and our full confidence in the value of their future services."

The committee's position indicated that as long as OPR was separate from the APSA, organizationally and in physical location, it was entirely permissible for Kirkpatrick and Kampelman to hold their influential posts in the APSA and work for OPR in their spare time.

A special committee of the APSA appointed to study professional standards and responsibilities took basically the same stand. In an interim report circulated to the membership and published in Political Science (Winter, 1968), this committee raised a variety of questions pertinent to the ethical conduct of political scientists. However, the report did not go beyond general statements on the nature of this complex problem, with several recommendations and the promise of a further, more comprehensive statement. It recommended that officers and employees of the APSA be free to participate in activities outside of the association "provided that such activities do not interfere with their duties and responsibilities to the Association." It also advised that sponsored research should include public statements of the sources of financial support. These recommendations, in effect, gave official sanction to Kirkpatrick and Kampelman and to other political scientists with similar involvements, with the one major proviso that greater public accounting be practiced. No attention was given to the nature or purpose of research, but only to who was paying the bills. The final report is due to be presented at the next convention of the Association this September in Washington and there have been some assurances from the committee that it will contain far more substance than did the first report.

By the time the Association's annual business meeting, held during the convention last September in Chicago, had voted down a motion to prohibit Kirkpatrick and Kampelman from holding both their OPR and APSA positions, the mood was ripe for some challenge within the APSA. It had been a typically dull convention, with no formal presentation of major issues such as the Vietnamese War or—after a summer of riots in the cities—the urban crisis. A spark was enough to bring a new, radical spirit into existence.

A meeting was called by two Harvard graduate students who wished to discuss their grievances. By the time the convention ended several more meetings had been held and a Caucus for a New Political Science (CNPS) was established with more than 200 members. The group was composed mostly of young liberals—graduate students and faculty—who had begun to feel estranged by the unwillingness of the APSA to take stands on issues of critical importance to the country and the world. After all, were they not political scientists? Also in attendance was a sprinkling of young radicals who were still breathing the tumultuous air of the National Conference for New Politics (NCNP), which had held its convention in Chicago only the week before.

What emerged was a general sentiment for reform directed at two related situations: the association's over-professionalized make-up and general academic irrelevance; and its consistent failure to study, discuss or take stands on important social and political problems. Imbued with a "radically critical spirit," the Caucus resolved to "promote a concern . . . for our great social crises and a new and broader opportunity for us all to fulfill, as scholars, our obligations to society and to science," and "to stimulate research in areas of political science that are of critical importance and that have been thus far ignored." The Caucus has organized its own program to be held concurrently with the APSA annual convention this year. Called "American Democracy in Crisis," it will consist of eight panels and a plenary session. These will present and discuss the alternatives in the 1968 elections, the draft,

Vietnam and the patterns of American foreign policy, and new modes of radical political thought and action. The topic for the plenary session is "America's Political Resources for World Leadership." The Caucus is already assured of some measure of success by the cooperation it has received from the APSA, the support of many of the association's members, and the highly impressive array of scholars and activists who will participate.

The forces underlying the emergence of the CNPS can be related to the history of American political science and to what many political scientists would regard as a logical development leading to the present status of the discipline. In its early years, political science was largely concerned with making democracy work by teaching "good citizenship." Its task was seen as a descriptive study of existing institutions with a view to promoting their effective functioning. The chore given political scientists and other educators was to make sure that future citizens were supplied with the necessary "facts" to fulfill their responsibilities to the system. Thus democracy—constitutionalism, pluralism, "free enterprise"—was taken for granted and other systems were duly criticized.

This approach to political education—propaganda in many cases—was widely accepted in the period before World War II and became intensified in the McCarthy period. It reached its culmination with the “end of ideology” literature of Daniel Bell, Seymour Martin Lipset, and others in the late fifties. For these ideologists of Establishment liberalism, the American system was not without shortcomings, but they held that democracy in America had basically been achieved and that the system was “operative.” In Lipset’s words, “democracy is not only or even primarily a means through which different groups can attain their ends or seek the good society; it is the good society itself in operation.” According to this view, the main problem for American democracy was to make the going concern more functional; the system itself, or its social structures and political institutions, went largely unquestioned. These writers generally preferred to replace social criticism with social conformism; thus they called for a moratorium on political ideas, which they thought had been exhausted in the fifties and turned into rhetoric—ideology. Instead, they hoped to encourage Americans to get on with the work of perfecting the good society, and they expected to do so by attempting to shield that society from radical or utopian ideas, or structural social criticism.

A further step in the development of an apolitical approach, committed to a neutral “science” rather than to social criticism, emerged after the war with the behavioral shift in the social sciences. Behavioral political scientists have concentrated on the mechanics of politics, the politics of who gets what, when and how. But in their effort to make social science value-free, they have had to neutralize the larger issues of political and social goals. They have been more concerned with describing how the system works than explaining its structural weaknesses. They have been saddled with mathematical models, computers and game theory, but have thus far failed to explain poverty in America, international conflict or the spread of violence in the world. They have devised theories of political development for the new nations, while many of these nations tend to get poorer. They have developed theories of conflict resolution, but the seeds of revolution in many parts of the world continue to sprout. (The excessive scientism of political science moved one political scientist in a recent letter to The American Political Science Review, the journal of the APSA, to comment that he had found in a particular issue of the journal only one article “that does not read as though written with the aid of a computer; or in some cases, actually written by a computer itself.” He suggested that the APSA have two journals, one devoted to political science and the other to be called American Computer Fonder’s Review.)

Perhaps the most candid statement of the new role of social scientists as law-and-order experts and guardians of the status quo was made by a political scientist who described the function of social scientists as the trainers of the new mandarins of the 20th century in the same way that the humanities trained the mandarins of the past. In his view, “the only hope for humane government in the future is through the extensive use of the social sciences by government.” In order to carry out this function of the social sciences, “the CIA, as its name implies, should be the central social research organization to enable the Federal government to understand the societies and cultures of the world.” In short, not only should the social sciences serve the interests of the state but this role should be increased and centralized. If such a development were fully realized, the movement from political education to propaganda and from propaganda to manipulation and control would be all but complete. The understanding of societies and cultures would then mean their manipulation and control; and humane government would then mean total government.

This new bond between the social sciences and the military and intelligence agencies of government is made evident in a recent, “confidential” document entitled “Report of the Panel on Defense Social and Behavioral Sciences,” which grew out of a meeting of the Defense Science Board of the National Academy of Sciences. The meeting brought together numerous social scientists, most of whom have university affiliations, to discuss the new demands of defense. According to I. L. Horowitz (Trans-Action, May, 1968), the main purpose of the meeting was to determine which social science research could be of most use to the Department of Defense.

Though there are many signs that this ominous trend is accelerating, some recent attempts have also been made to “reform” the social sciences or to offer alternative approaches to research, education and social responsibility. The CNPS ranks as a new effort to prod political scientists in that direction. But perhaps the most enlightening proposal was that recently put forward by the Center for Research on Conflict Resolution at the University of Michigan. It acknowledges that, having studied social and international conflict for eleven years with the most sophisticated tools of social inquiry, the Center has not succeeded in explaining the causes of violence and conflict. With great candor the proposal calls for a re-examination of existing social theory and prescribed methods of inquiry in order to promote radical thinking in the social sciences; that is, to promote a social science that moves beyond the self-imposed limits of existing theories and research.

It is precisely because of the general lack of such critical thinking that political science and related disciplines have been able to do highly professional research on an endless range of specialized topics without coming to grips with the most important problems of the day. It might be useful, as some political scientists have suggested, to adopt a code of ethics that would establish standards for research, with regard not only to its financing and sponsorship but also to its uses and purposes. But, above all, political scientists (and other social scientists) need to reconsider the meaning of objectivity in social science and their own social responsibility, and ask the extent to which government research, especially on the campus, serves those ends. What is evident from developments like the CNPS is that a significant segment of the academic community has become increasingly uneasy about the present state of affairs in their discipline, in their professional associations, and even in their own research. They have begun to look for new ways to be academically, as well as socially and politically, relevant.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Great Society Takes a Body Blow

WHAT SO PROUDLY WE HAILED.
By Fred J. Cook. Prentice-Hall. 282 pp.
$5.95.

SEAN CRONIN

Mr. Cronin is a journalist who has lived in Ireland and the United States, and has written for publications in both countries.

Given different circumstances Fred Cook might have produced the most valuable political book of the year, packed as it is with information, comment and fine analysis. But much can happen between gestation and publication, and he was unlucky. Cook, who wrote his book before the end of 1967, can't be criticized for erring in the matter of Lyndon Johnson's future—but his references to George Romney, Hubert Humphrey and Robert Kennedy unfortunately seem rather dated.

The issues propounded in What So Proudly We Hailed haven't changed. Vietnam, the war on poverty and Lyndon Johnson's Great Society remain. Likewise the urban crisis with its education, jobs, health and housing problems. How representative and democratic representative democracy really is requires some examination. The generation and credibility gaps grow wider. Cook notes:

The evidence is massive and undeniable that American society is being wracked by extremes—the extremes of affluence and special privilege and jet-set living on the one hand, of abysmal poverty and neglect and hopelessness on the other. In any society the tensions created by such extremes are explosive. In our own they are doubly so because, to economic inequality and injustice, there is added the vitriol of race prejudice and race hatred. We sit then on a powder keg, as the events of the summer of 1967 showed.

Take poverty. According to Cook some 35 million to 40 million Americans are classified as poor. They are concentrated in the South and in the big cities. Two-thirds of them are white. In affluent America one out of five children comes from a poor home; nearly 90 per cent do not finish high school and very few go to college. Ghetto tenements are infested by rats as big as cats; thousands of children are bitten every year. Food is expensive in the slums. The death rate is often twice that of suburbia.

"We have cleared areas of slums in the name of urban renewal, with little sense of what would become of those whose homes we leveled," said the late Sen. Robert Kennedy. "... We have provided health services in huge, unpleasant municipal hospitals—through emergency rooms and out-patient clinics where people wait for hours to see a doctor they have never seen before and are likely never to see again."

(It may be of interest to recall that Sen. Jacob Javits and Gov. Nelson Rockefeller rebuked Kennedy for his remarks. Javits was "disturbed" when Mitchell I. Ginsberg, Mayor Lindsay's Commissioner of Welfare, backed Kennedy's statement, telling Sen. Joseph Clark's subcommittee on poverty, employment and manpower that the national welfare system was "bankrupt." Kennedy had called it "degrading," saying it aided only a fourth of the poor and "forces men to leave their families so that public assistance can be obtained.")

Cook points out that to most influential Americans urban poverty is a closed book. He quotes Gerald Phillippe, chairman of General Electric, who with other industrial leaders went on a walking tour, led by Mayor Lindsay, of the Brownsville and East New York sections of Brooklyn last September: "Unbelievable! I have seen things like this in South America." The chairman of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, Gilbert W. Fitzhugh, added: "It makes you heartsick." But what has been done since to change the situation in which the inhabitants of Brownsville and East New York find themselves? Cook explains that old patterns of life are being altered dramatically, creating unprecedented problems of housing, education, jobs. But who understands the change?

Certainly not the lawmakers. Real power in Congress is wielded by committee chairmen in their late 60s, of Southern rural background, legislating for a young nation, median age 28. To such men change is anathema. They are totally divorced from the sordid realities of urban life. Senator's Clark's attack on the Senate establishment in 1963 is quoted by Cook:

Though the Senate has been shaken by wars, deaths, the electorate, and other calamities, those in it dedicated to the preservation of the status quo in economic and property rights and to the past in human rights—that bipartisan conservative coalition which I have called the "Senate Establishment"—have still not given way to the new generation. . . . I believe that the Senate has become archaic, outmoded, obsolete as a meaningful democratic institution. If the Senate is to perform its constitutional role in the twentieth century, it must be changed to meet the needs of the twentieth century and made capable of responding to the problems of the twentieth century.

Tax laws abound in loopholes which the rich utilize for their further enrichment. President John F. Kennedy, shocked to discover that "some $40 billion in taxes annually dodged the Federal tax collector," failed in his bid to revoke the special privileges of the oil billionaires who do so well out of the 27.5 per cent depletion allowance. Last year, maximum investment tax credit provisions were raised for such industries as oil and gas, airlines and railroads—at a time when the President was seeking the 10 per cent income tax surcharge just enacted. Robert Kennedy often cited the case of the multimillionaire who had earned more than $1 million a year for the past fourteen years, yet paid no taxes. Notes Cook: "... we have created in this democracy a specially privileged, oligarchic class that is rapidly acquiring the power to twist the entire nation by the tail." To quote Kennedy again:

In 1965, 35 people in this country who earned over $500,000 paid no tax at all. In a recent year one man whose net worth is $1.5 billion, paid only $685 in taxes. Another whose income was more than $20 million paid no taxes at all.

A separate question is where the taxes go. One billion dollars for the development of a supersonic jet transport; $3 billion to land a man on the moon; $30 billion for the war in Vietnam—out of total defense spending of $70.3 billion. Human needs must wait. "Something is obviously wrong with our system of national priorities," said Sen. Clifford P. Case. No wonder "people get cynical" and lose faith in society, said Whitney M. Young, Jr., the moderate civil rights leader.

The distrust has grown with the Vietnamese War, which Fred Cook says is being waged by "Presidential fiat." It lies at the root of Johnson's "credibility gap." Cook thinks the seeds of the disaster are to be found in the Truman Doctrine of March, 1947, involving the United States in far-flung global commitments, based on a simplistic view of world politics.

During 1967, says Cook, the climate of the nation changed. Today, military claims of victory have been discredited. America is ready "to follow new paths" and is awaiting "new leadership." The twenty-year-old dialogue of the cold war is "outmoded and irrelevant." The young are rebelling against the old order.

What now? Out of the discontent something must emerge to change the course of events. "Power politics have become irrelevant," writes Cook. "It cannot be played with success in the nuclear age, where the final item of force cannot be applied without blowing up the world." Men are trying to remake civilizations, as Walter Lippmann has noted, and it is not a good time for politicians.

Among the worthy politicians Cook picks John Lindsay of New York (Sen.

Eugene McCarthy had not gone into orbit at the time he wrote the book) because he has a clear understanding of foreign and domestic issues. "... he was probably the first major politician in the country to draw the line by saying that we could not meet the needs of our cities if we persisted in fighting a $30-billion-a-year war in Vietnam." He has charm and wit. He has kept the largest city in the country "cool" through a couple of hot summers. He would be "the ideal Presidential candidate for his party in 1968, but almost certainly his party will not have him."

Fred Cook, as readers of The Nation would expect, has written a lively, provocative but, above all, a relevant book. His insight is sharp, his comment always to the point. He is a great one to prick bubble reputations and to explode myths. The Great Society has taken a body blow in this one.

clarify Crane's life and work by drawing upon Freudian psychology. Berryman saw a recurrent pattern in Crane's life (the "rescue" of others, and the punishment of the "rescuer"), and that pattern he equated with Crane's obsessive desire to "rescue" the beloved, his mother, from the father whom he unconsciously had rejected.

Since 1950 there have been some perceptive critico-biographical studies of Crane (most notably Mr. Edwin Cady's volume, in which he insists that Crane "has been mutilated on the iron frame of many a Procrustean 'list' when, as I see him, he remained an uncrystallized experimenter, a youthful pluralist.") The book, however, that many Crane scholars have been anticipating has been the definitive Crane biography, R. W. Stallman's study is undoubtedly intended to serve that purpose. It is long: it includes a gallery of fascinating photographs; and it comes from a scholar whose life has been devoted to the study of Crane. What is more, the lofty tone of the biography suggests the self-consciously definitive biographer at work. Constantly, Stallman is pointing out that various sources—most especially Berryman—"erred" or drew "ill-founded" conclusions: in one typical correction Stallman quarrels lengthily with Lillian Gilkes, the author of Cora Crane, and after his lecture has ended states ex cathedra: "And that settles that."

In presenting the life of Crane, Stallman gives the facts and chronology as clearly as possible, and in this lies the basic virtue of the biography. In thorough, even excessive, detail the report is given of Crane's Bohemian youth; his connections with such women as Dora Clark (whom he attempted to defend from apparent police persecution) and Cora Stewart (the proprietor of an exclusive "house of joy" who eventually became Crane's common-law wife); his well-nigh unbelievable bravery (a death wish?) as a reporter in Cuba; his financial folly in England as a pseudo-aristocrat of Brede Manor; his ceaseless hack work in an effort to remain solvent; and the agony of his last days after tuberculosis had riddled his lungs. Unfortunately, however, Stallman's prose is inordinately heavy, and he tends to quote lengthily from his sources, page after page, without illuminating them.

But what is an even more important defect, however, is the fact that Stallman seems to have no real attitude toward the ultimate nature of Crane the man, and even the vision Stallman and Gilkes reported in their edition of the Crane Letters, that Crane was an "irresponsible heel," is better than no vision at all. Because of this lack of psychological penetration, the mystery of Ste-

The Mystery Unsolved

STEPHEN CRANE. By R. W. Stallman. George Braziller. 664 pp. $12.50.

JAMES F. LIGHT

Mr. Light is Bernhard Professor of English at the University of Bridgeport and is the author of books on Nathanael West and John William De Forest.

The first truly "modern" American writer, Stephen Crane in his brief life foreshadowed much of the direction of 20th-century literature. In Maggie: A Girl of the Streets he used the techniques of naturalism, the philosophy of determinism, and his own contempt for cowardice and "respectability" to demonstrate, as he said, that "environment is a tremendous thing in the world and frequently shapes lives regardless. If one proves that theory, one makes room in heaven for all sorts of souls, notably an occasional street girl, who are not confidently expected to be there by many excellent people."

In his masterpiece, The Red Badge of Courage, he used the modes of impressionism in an attempt to capture psychological truths, and in so doing he altered the objective "reality" of nature in order to make it reflect the inward state of the mind. In the poems of The Black Riders he not only abandoned conventional modes of rhyme and meter but also foreshadowed the imagist movement—as, for instance, in that haunting poem of an absurd and purposeless universe, God created and God forgotten, in which "the ship of the world" floats "forever rudderless" upon the seas:

Going ridiculous voyages,

Making quaint progress.

Turning as with serious purpose

Before stupid winds.

And there were many in the sky

Who laughed at this thing.

Despite the modernity of his art (or perhaps because of it), despite the contemporary frame of his masterpiece, and despite the Bohemian unconventionality of his life, Crane attracted the attention of only two biographers in the first half of the 20th century. The first study was a graceful, perceptive and anecdotal attempt, relatively unconcerned with precise chronology, at a biographical work of art. Written by Thomas Beer, it was published in 1923, and in it Beer attempted to ennoble Crane by emphasizing Crane's kindness to others and by attacking the gossip and canards—most especially that Crane was a drunk and a drug addict—that surrounded him during his life.

In his attempt at purification, Beer, by his own admission, removed from Crane's letters some of his harsher judgments upon his contemporaries, and apparently Beer destroyed all of the letters which he quoted in his biography. Beer's amiable admission that "This book is probably filled with errors" has been proved to be truthful by later Crane scholars.

The second volume, a critico-biographical study, was published by the noted poet, John Berryman, in 1950. In it Berryman added some new facts, attempted to clarify what he called "the damnable early chronology," and strove to phen Crane remains unsolved and largely unchallenged.

In addition to the life, Stallman attempts some analyses of the work of Crane. The most controversial of these will probably continue to be his reading of The Red Badge of Courage, an analysis that in part reproduces the argument of his article "Notes Toward an Analysis of The Red Badge of Courage" (first printed in 1951). The reading is a symbolic one, in which the novel becomes the story of Henry Fleming's salvation through change, through spiritual growth; and the most controversial aspect of the analysis is Stallman's insistence, at the death scene of Jim Conklin, that the line "the red sun was pasted in the sky like a wafer" is ironically suggestive of "the sacrificial death celebrated in Communion and the Mass." Despite such simplistic critics as Philip Rahv (for whom "Mr. Stallman's farfetched religious exegesis is mere Zeitgeist palaver"), Stallman is probably more right than wrong in his analysis, but one does wish he were a little more aware that The Red Badge is, at least in part, a novel about social responsibility, and a little less prone to manipulate the text of the novel in making his points.

A simple illustration of the analytic misrepresentation that I object to is Stallman's report of how Jim Conklin announces at the beginning of The Red Badge, the rumor that the army is soon to break camp and march to war. Though Stallman no longer seems to insist, as his earlier "Notes" did, that the initials of Jim Conklin must imply Jesus Christ, his present analysis contends that the rumor that Jim brings "is the gospel truth but Henry is one of the doubting apostles." In writing such a sentence, Mr. Stallman is, of course, using words poetically—most especially "gospel" and "apostles"—to make an analytical point, for the words are not in the text and the "truth" that Jim brings might as justifiably be proclaimed "satanic" as "gospel." As a matter of fact, if Jim Conklin is now to be seen as a "devotee of a mad religion," as Stallman's analysis now seems to imply, and if, at Jim's death,

"Henry Fleming curses the God of War who offers redemption through bloodshed," then the "gospel" truth which Conklin brings seems actually more "satanic" than "gospel." Perhaps, therefore, it might be wiser to avoid such connotative words in analysis and to see the message of Conklin as what it is: one of the innumerable rumors that abound in any war camp. This is, of course, not to say that the message could not be interpreted symbolically but only to insist that if it is to be so read, then the symbolism should be consistent and it should be justifiable from the language and images of Crane himself, and not from the poetic improvements of the critic.

Finally, Stallman gives a check list of writings by Stephen Crane, but lists only four works under "Writings on Stephen Crane." He justifies his omission by noting that a complete bibliography would make another book, and he directs the Crane scholar to his forthcoming bibliography on Stephen Crane. It is good to know that a definitive bibliography is on the way, but it does seem that a selective bibliography might have been provided. In that way such major Crane scholars as James T. Cox and Eric Solomon might have been included in Stallman's universe.

From Here to Obscenity

THE END OF OBSCENITY. By Charles Rembar. Random House. 528 pp. $8.95.

IRVING YOUNGER

Mr. Younger is professor of law at New York University School of Law.

Sooner or later it becomes clear to nearly every person of copious education that there is no evidence to prove him anything but commonplace. His learning provides standards—Mozart, Keats, Newton, Lincoln, Vermeer, Brandeis—he finds it unbearable to apply to himself. The result, if he is young and unsettled, is apt to be rebellion. If he is comfortable in the world, the result will be authorship.

Imagine a clever and successful lawyer one dark day asking himself: "What have I accomplished? What do I amount to? Am I like everyone else?" His response is to pick something in his life that no one else has done and produce a book telling how he did it.

Charles Rembar's book is about his performance as lawyer for the publisher in a series of cases involving novels—Lady Chatterley's Lover, Tropic of Cancer and Fanny Hill. Each lawsuit presented the question whether the book was legally obscene and the broader issue: what rule determines legal obscenity? Mr. Rembar adroitly won decisions that the books were not obscene. In addition, his arguments played a part in changing the rule on obscenity. In United States v. Roth, decided two years before Rembar entered the field with Lady Chatterley, the Supreme Court had set forth this rule:

But implicit in the history of the First Amendment is the rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance. . . . Obscene material is material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest. . . . [The test is] whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest.

Then came Rembar's cases: Lady Chatterley in 1959, Tropic of Cancer in 1964, and finally, in 1966, Fanny Hill (properly denominated A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts), in which the Supreme Court announced this rule:

A book cannot be proscribed unless it is found to be utterly without redeeming social value. This is so even though the book is found to possess the requisite prurient appeal and to be patently offensive . . . the social value of the book can neither be weighed against nor canceled by its prurient appeal or patent offensiveness.

Rembar tells his story brightly and in enormous detail, leavening the narrative plentifully with quotations from briefs and court records. He organizes the material on Aristotle's sensible plan of a beginning, a middle and an end.

But where is the book's distinction? Apart from the good it does the author, why should it be on the market? Why should anyone read it?

Not for lubricity. There's none in it. Not for general knowledge. The cultivated person, concerned to keep up with obscenity and the law on obscenity, will discover that Rembar tells him rather more about less than he wishes to know. Not for professional information. The specialist is already familiar with most of the story and will not care about the rest, which consists of minutiae interesting to no one but Rembar.

Yet the topic is fertile. Read the rule laid down in Roth again. It speaks

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

RAIN

*It is a day of the earth's renewing without any man's doing or help.
Though I have fields I do not go out to work in them,
Though I have crops standing in rows I do not go out to look at them or gather what has ripened or hoe the weeds from the balks.
Though I have animals I stay dry in the house while they graze in the wet.
Though I have buildings they stand closed under their roofs.
Though I have fences they go without me.
My life stands in place, covered, like a hay rick or a mushroom.*

WENDELL BERRY

RAINY SEASON

*There is a hush that gathers around
the leaky window frames;
stately air: birds
all under a leaf or a wing,
snails under stones;
squirrels and foxes asleep;
mosquitoes and bees
flown back to sources of sound;
the trees soaked brown.

Only woodsmoke stirred from a nearby fire
moves and rises and waits.
Not clouds,—as clouds
in summer puff along horizons in a rolling train—but one spreading drift of mist brings in the rain.

All day, all night, all week,
evenly steved,
the sky descends, enormously patient; not a crevice and leaf are missed, but seep with quietness.

Rain all night drips over the roofs and windows, making the sounds of the season of lovers together
when fields have been planted,
the forests are silent,
and the rain keeps falling like a native chant.*

FREDA QUENNEVILLE

RAINY DAY

*So many objects cluttered in one room. In one heart
the drum beats heavily.
The body's walls
shut out the light.
My attic voices cry
how they long
to be bells.

Somewhere in the house children pretend they are climbing Sierra Madre.
The laughter closes in.
One more door to their treasure,
while I sit helpless
in the small corner of discovery.*

RUBY RIEMER

NIGHT RAIN

*Fearing something's left outside, guilty that we're in,
we listen to the marching on the roof.
Turning like a herd of deer the river rises in fields of sleep.
The rain stings campfires, uncovers arrowheads, and powerlines hum when wind strokes water from the trees at dawn.*

ROBERT MORGAN

STILL FIELDS

(translation by Timothy Baland)

*Still fields. A feeling of rain.
The earth wild and primitive as it was once before.
Sometimes the joyful sky gets tired of it all above a thirsty shepherd.

When the rain calls, the dead turn uneasily.
The earth becomes a hole, stirred up, fragrant.
Trees that are ready for death give off their last deep fragrances.

In the rain the voice of the clocks takes on the immense age, the agony of the last hour.
They make us aware of the visible wounds, and those others that bleed internally.

Everything grows deep, concentrated, personal.
Things beneath the rain-sign, as if already deep in the ground, all seem to want
the final peace.

The rain is like mysterious drops of blood that you can see through.
I feel the dampness of the ground go through me,
it would like to keep me in the dark forever,
in the rain forever.

The sky is losing blood slowly out of wounds.
The green deepens the shadows under leaves.
The passion of the water makes the trunks and the bodies lean more and more into darkness.*

MIGUEL HERNANDEZ

majesty. It means nothing. Read the Fanny Hill rule again. It seems to mean something. Perhaps that the First Amendment permits regulation only of "hard-core" pornography, which Justice Stewart cannot define "but I know it when I see it" (Jacobellis v. Ohio). Then how explain the Ginzburg case, decided the same day as Fanny Hill, wherein the Supreme Court affirmed a five-year jail sentence for the publisher of stuff no one has argued to be obscene under Roth or Fanny Hill? Is it possible that the decision as to obscenity turns on the palatability of the publisher?

Let's go further. Lawyers habitually conceive nothing as unfit food for law. Can it be that there are subjects the law should leave alone? The law sharpens ideas by drawing distinctions among them. Is the subject of obscenity suitable for this kind of refinement? If not, when judges treat it as if it were they can't help making a mess. Isn't Justice Black a good housekeeper as well as a good political philosopher when he argues that the First Amendment forbids the law to dirty its hands with obscenity?

Of these possibilities Rembar gives us not a word. Having concentrated so hard for so many years on what judges say about obscenity, he has come to take the legal system and his own role in it at face value. No doubt this enables him to do his day's work well. It does not mark him out from the rest of prosaic mankind, and it does not make him a writer.

Big Science, Big Money

THE POLITICS OF PURE SCIENCE.

By Daniel S. Greenberg. The New American Library. 303pp. $7.95.

CARL DREHER

Greenberg is news editor of Science, the weekly magazine of the American Association for the Advancement of Science; as everyone who has read his essays in the News and Comment Department knows, he is a lively writer. In this book he has confined himself to basic research, mainly in the "hard" sciences (physics, chemistry and engineering—but he ignores mathematics) and with particular emphasis on major projects, such as the World War II development of the atomic bomb, the grandiose Mohole failure, and high-energy accelerators ("atom smashers"). For all these, as for less ambitious research, money is needed and the fight for money is quite as bitter, if less vociferous, as for youth programs and slum clearance in the cities. Greenberg traces the allocation of funds from science's starvation status in the twenties, when Herbert Hoover was unable to raise $20 million from industry to assist basic research in the universities, to the present era of federal largess, when a single great accelerator may entail a capital investment of $250 million (not counting auxiliary equipment) to which must be added an annual operating cost of a fourth or third of the first cost. Nor is this the end of the line. In Scientific Research (March 18) S. J. Lindenbaum proposes a far-out accelerator which might cost as much as $20 billion, spread over a ten-year period, an enormous sum—but only two-thirds of the annual money cost of the Vietnamese War.

After describing the violent demise of the relatively modestly priced Fixed Field Alternating Gradient Synchrotron (FFAG) in the early days of the Johnson Administration, Greenberg concludes with a sharply worded lecture directed at the politicking science community, admonishing it to "calm down, and, if necessary, perhaps to impose its wondrously effective discipline on those who proclaim a state of crisis in basic research." The effects to date have not been striking. The FFAG episode, however, is one of the most interesting in the book, and revealing in respect to the techniques used by Lyndon B. Johnson in dealing with embattled scientists, and the cat's-paw role to which he chose to assign his science/technology adviser, Dr. Jerome B. Wiesner.

Since 1953, FFAG had been promoted by a consortium of fifteen Midwestern universities whose physical researchers were desirous of obtaining accelerators and associated equipment on the scale of those in operation, or planned, at Stanford and Brookhaven, which played somewhat the same role in their thinking as Wall Street and the gold standard did in the Populist revolts of the 19th century. MURA (Midwestern Universities Research Association) had been sustained precariously by grants from the National Science Foundation and the Atomic Energy Commission.

However, as plans for FFAG progressed, a critical point was reached where MURA had to get multimillion-dollar appropriations or lose its staff of physicists, design engineers and other help, numbering over 100. Beset by technical difficulties, a conflict with a rival accelerator project at the University of Chicago's Argonne National Laboratory, conflicting recommendations by high-level panels, and procrastination by President John F. Kennedy, MURA resorted to political action with the support of sixteen Midwestern Senators, led by Hubert H. Humphrey and William Proxmire. Under this pressure, President Kennedy might have given way, but death relieved him of this problem. Lyndon B. Johnson, intent on projecting an image of frugality as the federal budget approached the $100 billion mark, began turning out the lights in the White House.

Wiesner had confined himself to advising Kennedy on the scientific aspects of the controversy. He had intended to return to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at the end of 1963 but Johnson persuaded him to stay on. He was needed, for, as Greenberg puts it, scarcely had Kennedy been laid to rest than the MURA partisans, now in a condition bordering on frenzy, put the screws on the unprepared successor. After submitting to briefings, Johnson instructed Wiesner to bring a small delegation of MURA representatives to the White House for discussions. The date set was Thursday, December 19. Wiesner was also instructed to prepare a memorandum stating, not the pros and cons of the MURA proposal as in the past but the cons only. Wiesner protested that his position was one of conditional support for MURA, but Johnson insisted. Wiesner wrote the one-sided memorandum, but appended a note restating his qualified support for MURA's FFAG.

An unaccountable mix-up followed. The interview with the three MURA representatives—Elvis J. Stahr, Jr., president of Indiana University, and two physicists—was put off for a day, but on Friday the President was also scheduled to meet a delegation of Midwestern legislators who wished to succor MURA. So when Wiesner, accompanied by Glenn Seaborg, chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, arrived in the anteroom of the President's office, he found not only Stahr and his associates but Senators Humphrey and Proxmire, Rep. Robert Kastenmeier of Wisconsin and Rep. Melvin Price of Illinois. Leaving both groups in the anteroom, Wiesner went into Johnson's office and delivered the memorandum, with the qualifying note attached. A staff aide informed Johnson that the MURA group was to be followed by the Congressional delegation. Johnson said: "What the hell did you invite those Congressmen up here for?" Wiesner replied that he had not invited them and had known nothing about the second appointment. Johnson replied: "Well, goddamn it, somebody invited them." He added that he had planned to spend no more than twenty minutes with the MURA delegation.

After some further colloquy, Johnson directed that the two delegations be admitted together. The conference began with Johnson describing himself as "the only man in government who wants to save money and here are all these people who want to spend money." He pointed to the AEC chairman and, with complete irrelevance, said: "There's Glenn Seaborg. He wants to run a nuclear bomb WPA out in the state of Washington to get (Sen. Henry) 'Scoop' Jackson re-elected. . . . Seaborg wants to buy votes. Nobody ever had to buy projects in Texas to elect me. . . ." He said he was willing to support "anything that science needs" but that the American people wanted economy and he was not persuaded that the MURA accelerator was needed.

Stahr protested that it was needed and that all MURA was asking in the fiscal 1965 budget was $3.5 million for advanced design and architectural studies. Humphrey exclaimed, "Why, my God, the Midwest has been getting short-changed." Wiesner denied this and while he was debating with Humphrey, Johnson interrupted with: "The twenty minutes are up. I've got a memo here that I'd like to read and you can tell me what you think of it." He read Wiesner's memo—without the qualifying note—"a prosecutor's case against MURA." Greenberg calls it—and in the confusion that followed left the room. The two delegations were ushered out. MURA was dead, and Wiesner was the scapegoat of Midwestern science for years thereafter.

The Presidential decision may have been right, but the circumstances leave a residue of unanswered questions. Was the scheduling of the two delegations arranged between them, with the aim of reinforcement of the scientists by the politicians? Was the mix-up the result of an inadvertence on the part of the President's appointments secretary? Or was it a Presidential maneuver to set Wiesner and the MURA sponsors by the ears and enable Mr. Johnson to kill an expensive project in which he saw no national or personal advantage? In any case, the manner of the extinction was pure Johnson.

Yet he, as well as MURA, was finally the loser. In a post-mortem letter to Humphrey he indicated that the primary factor in the decision was: "Given the scope of the investment we have made and will be making at Argonne, I found it impossible to justify starting another national laboratory close by. . . ." But the much costlier accelerator now in the works is to be located at Weston, Ill., 25 miles from Argonne.

This incident gives an idea of the politics of pure science at its worst. Greenberg, however, takes in a much larger scope and deals throughout with a difficulty that is not the fault of either scientists or politicians. The only way the scientists can carry on basic research is by following unpredictable leads, modifying the hypotheses with which they started, and changing the entire course of an experiment when necessary. For financing, however, they are dependent on another breed—the politicians. The necessities of science collide with the necessities of politics, in which expected costs and expected results are defined beforehand and appropriations are scaled accordingly.

The conflict is an old story. Vannevar Bush, the great scientist-engineer who directed the Office of Scientific Research and Development in the forties and had as much to do with winning the war as Franklin D. Roosevelt or Winston Churchill, foresaw what would happen after the war and tried to safeguard the independence of science in the face of massive dependence on governmental support. During his term as Kennedy's science adviser, Wiesner remarked that one of his functions was to "protect the anarchy of science." As appropriations for both pure and applied science, and development, mounted to the current total of about $16 billion annually (the greater part always "mission-oriented" for direct military applications) and the cost of the Vietnamese War rose to nearly double that figure, the conflict between that part of the scientific community engaged in basic research and the Congressional overseers of science and technology became more acute. Nor will it end with the war, since the admirals and generals are already pre-empting for future advanced weaponry whatever funds will be freed.

The scientists fear, not without reason, that the $6 billion cut in federal spending for fiscal 1969 will impel disproportionate slashes in basic research. The controllable part of the budget amounts to less than $40 billion out of the $186 billion total. The rest, comprising such items as service on the national debt, Social Security, veterans' pensions and allowances, etc., is untouchable or, as in the case of the $80 billion Department of Defense appropriation, is assured of gentle treatment. In contrast, nonmilitary research and development, which totals at a rough estimate $2.5 billion a year, including $1.5 billion for pure research in university laboratories, is the soft underbelly of the budget.

Earlier (the book was published in 1967). Greenberg viewed the then existing prospects for reduced spending with equanimity. He exposes abuses which have accompanied the rise to affluence of some portions of the scientific community—needless conference riding, including junkets to Europe; needless purchases of expensive equipment; multiple publication for the purpose of garnering personal publicity, etc. "Science was only a calling," he writes, "today it is still a calling for many, but for many others, it is simply a living, and an especially comfortable one, for not only is it relatively affluent, but its traditions of freedom and independence provide a façade behind which government subsidized liberties may be taken in the name of creativity." Then, in one of his best sentences, he says: "Having few peers in the misuse of public funds for personal purposes, congressmen are sensitively tuned to the misuse of such funds by others." He suggests some plausible remedies, such as making the National Science Foundation the principal channel of governmental funds for academic research and scientific training (though not barring support by other bodies) investigating the possibility of putting grants on a multi-year basis, and a reconsideration of priorities. He asks: "In a world plagued by misery, is it decent for fine minds and great wealth to be dedicated to the interior of the atom and the mysteries of the planets?"

While some reductions may be innocuous or even salutary, my own hope is that the drastic cuts that are now in prospect can be avoided. Public support for basic science is negligible: a legislator can vote for cuts without raising a storm among his constituents. Yet long-term

Just Published

How 88,648 Heavy Smokers Stopped Smoking

NEW YORK — The Anti-Tobacco Center of America has just published a booklet which explains how 88,648 heavy smokers (of whom many are physicians) have stopped smoking without straining their will power. This booklet is available free of charge to smokers. All you need to do, to obtain it, is to send your name and address to The Anti-Tobacco Center of America, Dept. A-31-A 276 Park Avenue South, New York City, 10010. This offer is open while the supply of these booklets lasts.

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT

MUTUAL REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

► Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

damage can be done by indiscriminate curtailments. Some of the arguments of the current report of the High Energy Physics Advisory Panel of the AEC may be specious, but it is perfectly true that in this field long lead times are required for planning. Between the initial concept for a large accelerator to its completion a decade or more may elapse; even scheduling a specific experiment may involve a lead time of two years. Maltreatment of one branch is all too likely to spread havoc elsewhere: if particle physics is ruthlessly cut back, social science, which has only recently received anything approaching deserved recognition, will be next on the chopping block, followed by the National Institutes of Health which, with a budget of nearly $1.2 billion, may not be as invulnerable as in the past.

bjorn-Lowry muses half-drunkly, "yet it seemed to him that if one person had survived such a thing to breathe purer air and love the light that there was hope for the human race. For one man's agony belongs to all men and to God."

Mythologized Megalomania

DARK AS THE GRAVE WHEREIN MY FRIEND IS LAID. By Malcolm Lowry. Edited by Douglas Day and Margerie Lowry. The New American Library. 255 pp. $5.95.

RICHARD HAUER COSTA

Mr. Costa teaches at Utica College of Syracuse University. He is the author of a critical biography, H. G. Wells (Twayne), and is presently at work on a book on Malcolm Lowry.

Midway through this posthumous novel by Malcolm Lowry, an unpublished alcoholic novelist named Sigbjorn Wilderness arrives with Primrose, his second wife, in Cuernavaca, Mexico, where they spend the night in the same bedroom tower that almost ten years before had witnessed the crack-up of his first marriage—material that Wilderness had worked into a much rejected novel about Mexico entitled The Valley of the Shadow of Death. While his wife sleeps nearby, Sigbjorn is seized by a hangover which evolves into a torturing metamorphosis. He imagines himself inhabiting—unaccountably and simultaneously—several spheres. While thinking they are merely the sounds of last night's revelry, he hears a clarinet soar into the strains of his first wife's favorite song followed by the "infernal din" of a ragtime version of the Mexican Raspa ("debombiditty boombiditty bombiditty bomba de bomb!"), compounded by howls from the always present Lowryan pariah dogs.

Although Sigbjorn has convinced Primrose that their trip to Mexico is an exorcism to overcome a massive writing block, he mournfully recognizes anew that every hangover brings nothing but the memory of a hangover, a dread cycle, and that he has sunk to becoming his own "character." But this is coupled with the delicious awareness that he is undergoing a unique experience; that the daemons who are the conductors of human agony ("conductor" in its other, its scientific, sense—someone who serves as a channel for heat, sound, electricity—is peculiarly appropriate to Lowry) are orchestrating pandemonium and that he must not miss a note of it.

The scene—the book—dissolves into a series of flash-backs which move unsurely along the same redemptive trajectory as the unforgettable final scene of Under the Volcano. In that book, the Consul is borne ("born" is closer to the heart of the scene) dying to the summit of a gigantic barranca and flung by Mexican Fascists into its crater; but his soul survives, ascending to the top of the volcano Popo which, like Hemingway's Kilimanjaro, had always beckoned the mortally doomed artist.

Sigbjorn—Lowry—sees his torment as supernatural and visions his Angst as that of some hideously elected sojourner in a hell from which he cannot emerge alive but whose circles he will, Virgil-like, chart.

It wasn't good art but it was the truth. Anybody more bloody well damned than himself, he considered, it would be next to impossible to find on this planet. What had God been up to in creating such a man and what was his purpose in keeping him alive, if alive he could be said to be? Was He so kindly that He would do it for his wife? Yet what strange power was it in him, strange, and it could not be but evil—Yet, was he not good, were they not good, had they not sacrificed their own house, their work, to the forest, for others' good—he had forgotten this, this was something else again—was this a power that was wasted on writing and that God had determined must in some sense serve chaos.

The passage is a perfect evocation of Lowry's view of art, inseparable from his view of experience, which was ultimately messianic. Like Lowry's most direct literary influence, his old friend and mentor Conrad Aiken, and like Herman Hesse, a writer Lowry deeply admired ("I am Steppenwolf!" he once announced to his wife, Margerie), Lowry converted the surfaces of life into mythologized megalomania, both as a refuge from thought and as evidence of destiny. "His agonies must be far from unique," Sig-

All his life Lowry sought to convert "one man's agony" into gain: to turn, with Yeats, one's greatest weakness into one's greatest strength. For Lowry, the pain of Malebolge and hell-fire would be redeemed by what he could report back. And yet, as Douglas Day notes in his brilliant and necessary preface, Lowry, by offering himself as a kind of human Geiger counter—by allowing himself to be written—could become more than Dantean, for he, Sigbjorn-Consul-Lowry, was returning to re-experience hell.

Unfortunately, as Lowry found to his great sorrow during the ten years remaining to him after the long-delayed publication of Volcano, the infernal machine that ground out his daemonic life carried no guarantee of grinding out, in its self-destroying course, major fiction. Too many of the ever-growing company of critics who discover Volcano with each reissue stress the autobiographical aspects, and too few recognize that a decade and four complete revisions were required for the promising but unpublished short story of 1937 to evolve into the "contemporary classic" first published in 1947. And Dark as the Grave is so resolutely autobiographical of the circumstances of the earlier book that a careful reading of Under the Volcano is absolutely vital to a grasp of what is happening in the later book.

What made Volcano so memorable was Lowry's ability to dissolve the boundary line between the objective and subjective worlds of the Consul. In making the Consul's tragedy succeed on both planes, it was necessary for Lowry to post another consciousness on the outer boundaries of Geoffrey Firmin's, a consciousness more clear-seeing than the Consul's, one which records internal and external movements as they develop, more or less in the manner of a movie camera. Lowry then shows them back to the reader-viewer in slow motion. A series of objective correlatives—a child's funeral, a dead dog seen in a ravine, a dying Indian sighted but unaided by the roadside, the ruins of the palace of those "empurpled exiles" Maximilian and Carlotta, a riderless horse bearing the number seven—these serve as clues both to reality and dream. Even the Consul's alcoholism is treated by Lowry as a kind of tragic game with overtones of high comedy.

Douglas Day quite rightly points out that Lowry was a "crammer-inner" seeking "to bore further down into his psyche than any reader could follow." Add to this Lowry's Proustian conception of his work as one massive interrelated pattern on whose parts he worked continuously and simultaneously. The combination of crammer-inner and never-ender was fatal to Lowry, the craftsman. It assured him high aspiration and low fulfillment. Only a long life (Lowry died at 47) and the 1,000 words a day for a lifetime of a controlled artist like Thomas Mann could create a corpus of completed works normally associated with the major novelists.

Professor Day's admirable preface pushes a little too hard perhaps the notion that Lowry was not really a novelist, except by accident. Lowry was the first to acknowledge his defects as "irremediable . . . the author's equipment, such as it is, is subjective rather than objective, a better equipment, in short, for a certain kind of poet than a novelist." But Lowry was not falsely humble about his gifts. In what in published form is a 32-page letter of response in 1946 to a Jonathan Cape reader's rejection of Volcano, Lowry declares that "there are a thousand writers who can draw adequate characters . . . for one who can tell you anything new about hell fire."

While acknowledging that Lowry would be the last to consent to having Dark as the Grave published in this form, one must also express gratitude to Mrs. Lowry and to Douglas Day. In reading these germinal stirrings of a novel in embryo, one glimpses, all the more, the hell-fire, not only of the physical life Lowry led but that of the life of his art. And one is all the more indebted for the precious—if limited—legacy.

and Juliet) was at once the oddest and most explicit Midsummer Night's Dream of my experience. John Hirsch, the associate director, has dressed and staged the play to indicate that its subject is lust—with Athenian youths and maidens disporting in attitudes that in no way suggest Dresden china, and with Oberon, Titania and their courts pawing one another in the undiscriminating pre-genital sexuality of the underground cinema. Puck has the rasping voice and knowing eye of a costermonger's child; sprites and elves, self-absorbed, sway to modified rock and you can almost smell the pot in fairydom.

In this atmosphere, the "mechanicals," played more or less according to tradition, seem even more innocent than usual, and everyone laughs boisterously at their antics, relieved to be quit for a moment from the amorous damp of the main actions. It can all be justified readily enough: we've known for some time that Shakespeare's Greek idyll cloaks some dubious business. For one thing there is that changeling boy over whom Oberon and Titania squabble, and for another the uneasy permutations of obsessed infatuation. But Shakespeare rarely took single views of human behavior and there are hazards in showing exactly what he meant. Thus if one introduces Theseus as a senile admiral out of Gilbert and Sullivan (I don't understand

THEATRE / Robert Hatch

Look at the license plates. Now completing its sixteenth season, the Stratford Festival in Ontario draws from what has become probably the world's most extensive theatrical watershed: the paid attendance was more than a quarter-million in 1967, and will be bigger this year. Stratford treats its customers well: the small city smiles with discreet prosperity, the swans on Lake Victoria are endearingly insistent about picnic scraps, the huge theatrical company has become a phenomenon of integrated skill, trained to the top of its form, utterly at ease with one another and with its two stages, maneuvering the repertory with the dexterous snap of a cup defender racing crew. One friend tells another, from Missouri to Manitoba, and Stratford is a great deal more than a success—it is an institution.

And a going institution. There is no hint of smugness, no arrogance about the place. This company knows how good it is, but knows as well what vigilance and character are required to remain that way. One of the joys, perhaps the great joy, of the festival is the depth of its excellence. No one on its stages is there to fill space; everyone down to the page carrying a candelabrum is acting with every nerve of his body and according to the demands of the production. The commercial theatre can almost never elicit or afford such dedication, and I had almost forgotten the richness and intensity of life that can pour from a stage when every fragment of its complexity is switched on.

Yet there is a blandness at the center of the enterprise. Stratford can confidently guarantee not to disappoint any reasonable man's expectations; I am less sure that it can surpass them. At least, what I saw there this year confirmed the ideas I had brought with me more than it expanded them. (I am told that in past seasons there have been occasions of astonishment, and in fairness it must be said that astonishment is a theatrical experience that the most superb of troupes cannot create at will.) It occurs to me that the festival may have trouble relating to its public. Though its following is enormous, it has almost no audience at all. An audience goes to the theatre as part of its life; people go to Stratford as part of their vacation. They are relaxed, nomadic, overwhelmingly benevolent; they are also almost exclusively middle-aged and more than moderately well heeled. They recognize that it is meritorious to attend plays endorsed by the wisdom of time; applauding the excellence they find at Stratford, they applaud also their excellence for being there. It is a friendly house, but a self-protected one.

Bending perhaps to that mood, the festival is less a rite than a course of instruction. I have rarely seen productions so lucid, so informative as to the playwright's intentions, so solicitous of the spectator's comprehension. The effect, when the works offered are somewhat demanding, is to make the audience feel pleasantly bright. But wholehearted lucidity does not always work to the advantage of the piece; a degree of bafflement, a sense of reaching but not quite grasping, is also characteristic of the theatre.

Thus the only Shakespeare I saw (the repertory this year also includes Romeo

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

9-2-68

THE NATION
233 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $14

☐ Two Years, $28

☐ 6 Months, $8

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

why the Athenians are made to appear in Victorian garden-party rig, unless it is done as a tribute to Tyrone Guthrie, founding genius of Stratford, who likes to stage Shakespeare in fancy dress), it may serve to advance the intuition that the playwright saw lechery as man's most persisting itch. But a doddering Theseus can scarcely deliver his Act V lines in support of the comic thespians, and the actor must abandon the device out of respect for the words.

Similarly, the somewhat rancid concept of Oberon may accord to a degree with Shakespeare's suspicion of love's witchcraft (after all, its most conspicuous victim here is an ass named Bottom),

SILENT AT BREAKFAST

*I could outline your nose and mouth
In the wet sand: I have a stick.
But salt foam would wet your lips,
Bubble to your eyes and leave you gone,
Or trace your real bone portrait
With fingers of the blind, for I am blind,
But flesh and morning always soft away the shape,
Blur your name, who you are, what you mean,
This laser beam I prod into the cloud for you
Smokes in the tube, too fierce for human air,
But marks my poor experiment for miles around.
O traitor tide, touch, too-bright light
To lose you among the grapefruit rinds
Unnamed, unknown, desolate!*

MARGARET SHIPLEY

PERSONALS

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature, write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled Pro editor-writer aids authors in revising Mss. for publication. Box 612, c/o The Nation.

Was your vote asphyxiated in some smoke-filled room?
The decent thing is to show
you mourn it.

Send one dollar for two badges
proclaiming: "I WILL NOT VOTE".
They're edged in black.

P.O. Box 464, Skokie, Illinois 60076

IDEALISTIC? HARRASSED? FRUSTRATED? Join others in seeking a better life through intentional communities. Information, registration (nationwide) $2.00. The Questers Project, Box N-23, Los Banos, Calif. 93635.

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free, colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10011.

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors, indigenous designs, free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire, write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1786 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

232 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-5600

but what of the Oberon who so tenderly blesses the house in which the lovers sleep? Shakespeare was not a very simple man, and it is imprudent to resolve his enigmas for him. I will say, though, that a steamy Midsummer Night's Dream is a relief of sorts from the lavender-water masques of countless Christmas holidays.

Tartuffe, staged by Jean Gascon, the new artistic head of Stratford, comes across fast, funny, sharp and relentless. It is so marvelously acted by all hands that William Hutt's Tartuffe does not seem the virtuoso performance that it undoubtedly is. But again the play lacks shadows; it is flat good and flat evil. Tartuffe is a joyless villain, a Protestant sort of sinner, and I have seen actors far less gifted than Hutt who got a Catholic lyricism into the role. Tartuffe can be thought to hug himself in an ecstasy of hypocrisy that is not without religious overtones, Orgon is certainly his dupe, but whose dupe is he? The question does not arise at Stratford; it is all subversive slapstick and domestic irony. I don't much like the Richard Wilbur translation. Its rhymes clang with an insistent accuracy that is particularly jarring when your ears have been made sensitive by Shakespeare's subtle chiming.

The company's Seagull, again directed by Mr. Gascon, gave me the most pleasure during my stay at Stratford. You could almost justify the formation of permanent companies on the single ground that only such groups can perform Chekhov. Players who don't know and trust one another will never surrender themselves to Chekhov's dangerous intimacy. This cast did so, and the performance glowed. Again, though, it appeals more to the mind than to the heart, ambiguity being what Chekhov found in life and what makes his plays so demanding of one's conscience. In this production, weakness is made manifest, stupidity asserts itself, Arkadina is a bitch (Chekhov never lets you call his people names) and Konstantin is a little too much the British schoolboy in love. I have never seen the idea of the play interpreted more succinctly—maturity is a disease that poisons the young—but there have been times when I felt the play itself more deeply.

That leaves The Three Musketeers—and I am content to leave it. It is this season's circus turn, and I guess a festival needs one such dependable crowd rouser. They do it with wonderful leaps, thrusts and brandished bottles and it is a tribute to the physical training of the company. I'm sure everyone moves better in the other plays for having been through the exercise of Dumas' sword opera, but it contains too little substance for its quota of noise.

Waiting for Godot opened after I left Stratford. I regret missing it, for I should have liked to see what moves they make to clarify Beckett's misanthropic word magic. The exegeses have been at work on this conundrum for some time, which is possibly why the festival chose it as this year's contemporary presentation. There is by now plenty of background for interpretation.

I don't want to be misunderstood: any of the productions I saw at Stratford (well, perhaps not the Dumas) would embellish a season in New York or London or Paris. The festival is hallmark theatre: it is a standard against which other companies may measure themselves, if they have the nerve. If it were not so good, one would not be so sensitive to its possible flaws. What I sense—this tendency to instruct rather than to transport—may also have been detected by Mr. Gascon and his colleagues long before I hit town. If it worries them a little, that is good. The one thing that might diminish Stratford would be a failure to worry.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1261

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 and 22 down Being, to hamlet? He decided it wasn't! (1,4,5,4,5)
- 9 A painter makes it through bad times, as you can see. (7)
- 10 Conditional clause. (7)
- 11 What supplies strength is back with the latest! (6)
- 12 Briefly, a way a poor reader is about to get stopped. (8)
- 14 The condition of weather in general suggests what Hillary wanted to do concerning Everest. (7)
- 15 The species that makes paste of the French spirit? (5)
- 17 Much-better-than-average bird. (5)
- 19 Holds people in the country, such as resident members of the staff. (7)
- 21 See 21 down.
- 23 An oxide of the lightest of metals. (6)
- 25 Get off at diner changes? (7)
- 26 Looks with favor, obviously. (7)
- 27 and 8 How 1968 might be translated from a brief notice. (2, 3, 4, 2, 3, 4)

DOWN

- 1 Proving I care, in a way, about the hazy appearance of stopping the war for peace talks. (9)
- 2 Of radiation, chemically active. (7)
- 3 One-time. (9)
- 4 Polish river, or German. (4)

- 5 It's more than boils that makes her as upset! (10)
- 6 The other ones, so the letters indicate. (5)
- 7 A way to prominence for such as Lindberg (7)
- 8 See 27 across
- 13 Lancing may at least help to discover it! (10)
- 15 The bolder ring doorbells to find it—at least acting bold, if old. (7-2)
- 16 One might expect to find Mrs. Green a good diver! (9)
- 18 How to make a singlet behave like Lowell's life. (7)
- 20 Light movement of Italian sport. (7)
- 21 and 21 across What Fisher and MacFadden were both noted for. (4-8)
- 22 See 1 across
- 24 Space provided when the pole is removed from the amphitheater? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1260

ACROSS: 1 Dolomites; 6 Pipes; 9 Fragile; 10 In style; 11 and 22 Runagates; 15 Ked Cross; 16 Faster; 18 Piquet; 20 Riffraff; 23 Oman; 24 Agenda; 28 Automat; 29 Console; 30 Early; 31 Spearhead. DOWN: 1, 25 and 21 across What Fisher and MacFadden were both noted for. (4-8)
2 See 1 across
3 One-time
4 Space provided when the pole is removed from the amphitheater? (4)

PUBLICATIONS

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of Significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLEMING (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Marco, 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

STARTLING evidence concerning who had president Kennedy killed. FORGIVE MY GRIEF. Vol. 1—188 pages. Vol. II—192 pages. by Penn Jones, Jr. $5.95 value for $4.95. Mail to Books, 530 New Road, Waco, Texas 76710.

"SUMAC"

A tri-quarterly, will appear in September, publishing poetry, fiction, criticism. The first issue includes work by Robert Duncan, Louis Simpson, Kenneth Koch, John Thompson, Denise Levertov and others. Edited by Dan Gerber Jr. and Jim Harrison. $3.50—one year.

Ms. and Subscriptions.
Box 29, Fremont, Mich. 49412.

FREE PAPERBACK LISTS. Write, inquire how thousands save! PAPERBACKS, HARDBOUNDS, RECORDS. Fast service. New York Book, 48 West 43rd Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

CENSORSHIP TODAY—the international news magazine of the battle for free speech. Includes the most up-to-date listing of current banned books, plays, films, etc. Informative articles by authorities illuminate background details. One year subscription only $10. CENSORSHIP TODAY, 1480 Vine St., Suite 700-D, Hollywood, Calif. 90028.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.18
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.18
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $4.00
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) $4.00

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

9-2-68

Tweedledum vs. Tweedledee

Tension mounts as the Presidential adversaries take their places on the battlefield. Different colors are worn so that the bewildered spectators can distinguish the candidates.

What will it be? Four years of Tweedledum or four of Tweedledee? (Or is there still a chance for a meaningful contender to enter the fight?)

Don't guess! Read Louis H. Bean's HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS. Compiled each election year, this book analyzes American voting patterns during the past ten Presidential elections. It can help you interpret the primaries, the polls and even Election Day returns.

Available from the Scarecrow Press, Metuchen, N.J., HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS will be a free gift to each new subscriber to The NATION.

Keep up with the election happenings. Read The Nation.

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free, HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign).

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 9-2

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 9, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

SEP 10 1968

BITTER LEGACY OF LBJ

CAREY McWILLIAMS

CZECHOSLOVAKIA IN AUGUST

PATRICK D. HAZARD

BENJAMIN B. PAGE

Pentagon Crisis: The Colleges Are Pulling Out

GABRIEL KOLKO

Chomsky's Linguistic Revolution

ROBERT SKLAR

0-698 PL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

leaflet conspirators

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Last May at Fort Ord, Calif., Privates Daniel Amick and Ken Stoltz were sentenced by general court-martial to four years' hard labor apiece. Their crime: distributing an anti-war leaflet on the base and, moreover, conspiring to do so.

Attorney Francis Heisler has filed notice to appeal the decision with the Court of Military Appeals, but Maj. Gen. Thomas A. Kenan, Commanding General of Fort Ord, has refused release the two political prisoners on their own recognizance pending that action. Heisler will therefore appear soon in the Federal District Court of San Francisco on a writ of habeas corpus. . . .

In the name of military justice, the two young men—who had never before been charged with an offense—are refused even that most narrow liberty, the right to await due process outside prison walls. At this writing they are confined in the Fort Ord stockade.

Funds are badly needed for the two appeals. . . . The sum of $1,500 would help not only two dedicated young men but also the fight to open political space in the army, where room to organize is so desperately needed.

Checks may be sent to the Stoltz-Amick Defense Fund, Drawer 3996, Carmel, Calif. 93921.

Todd Gutlin

a name for it

Long Island City, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I must take vehement exception to your astonishing statement that Richard Nixon is not corrupt [editorial, Aug. 19].

Nixon confessed to the nation on television that he took the $18,000 from California oil and real estate operators. He took the money and delivered the goods. We used to call that bribery; I still call it by its rightful name.

There is also Howard Hughes's loan of $205,000 to Nixon's brother on a $4,000 lot, a loan apparently never repaid. What could be more corrupt? $206,000, perhaps?

Emmett Swissheim

diabolism

Springfield, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Is it inconceivable that Johnson and Rusk may be motivated by something even deeper than the North-South complex unearthed by "the lady in Atlanta" ["Damyankes," editorial, The Nation, Aug. 26]?

The search for some explanation of their diabolism may indeed go back to their being Southerners, but has it occurred to anyone besides myself that it isn't merely a Mason-Dixon Line complex that motivates them? Behind their patriotic rhetoric may possibly lurk a hidden desire to destroy the Union for what it did to their region 100 years ago. The "lady in Atlanta" has started me thinking; blame her for the results!

Lee E. Holt

worth the blood?

University City, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Stanley Meisler implies [editorial, The Nation, Aug. 26] that a Nigerian federal victory over secessionist Biafra would not be worth the cost in lives. Perhaps he forgets that Lincoln is revered for keeping the states united, thereby avoiding the continuing mortal conflicts of European countries. . . . When one notes that Biafra, like secessionist Katanga of the Congo, is the region of its nation best endowed with mineral wealth, the case for quashing the Biafran secession becomes compelling.

Arthur N. Solomon

EDITORIALS

McCarthy's Victory

Eugene McCarthy will not be President of the United States—at least not in the next four years—but that was never his primary objective. What he wanted was to bring the issue of Vietnam before the country in an inescapable form, and the only way he could do that was by defying Lyndon B. Johnson and running for the Presidency himself. He succeeded not only in mobilizing resistance to the war and in forcing Mr. Johnson to withdraw, but he changed the face of American politics to a degree that has astonished old-line and new politicians alike.

Before McCarthy set out on his crusade, most of the voters were only vaguely aware of the extent to which great issues were decided, or simply ignored, by the political bosses, nor did they greatly care. It was the way things were. Courageous action by one man, with only a small following at the outset, snowballed into a massive movement. It was not powerful enough to boost McCarthy into the Presidency, but it showed the power of adherence to principle where principle had been a minor consideration, and even a positive handicap. American politics will never be the same again; no, not even if Richard Nixon is elected. Four years of Nixon would seem like a long time, but, like all triumphs and all misfortunes, it would pass.

The contrast between the temperaments of Hubert Humphrey and Eugene McCarthy was brought out sharply at their appearance before the California delegation on August 27, together with George McGovern, who on that occasion came away with the laurels. Humphrey proclaimed himself a "peace candidate" and sought to minimize the difference between his position and that of McCarthy and McGovern as being mainly one of "rhetoric." If this is rhetoric, there is no such thing as substance. Humphrey identifies himself with Lyndon Johnson in regard to the war, and calls it peace. McCarthy and, belatedly, McGovern, with due respect for the office of the President, made it clear that they disagreed with the incumbent on the war and much else. The California delegation knew that Humphrey was talking out of both sides of his mouth and they were no more than polite.

Had it not been for McCarthy and his defiance of the political mores, the good things that happened at the Democratic convention would not have happened at all, or would have been less conspicuous. In contrast to the Republican convention, the Democrats staged a series of meaningful debates, the origins of which could be traced back to positions McCarthy had taken during his campaign. The abolition of the unit rule was one, the contests for the seating of dissident delegations were instructive even when the insurgents lost, and the Vietnamese debate cleared the air on that issue even though the Johnson-Humphrey plank prevailed. (See "The Bitter Legacy of LBJ," page 198.)

McCarthy's primary weakness, from the standpoint of practical politics, is that his approach to issues is sharp, unequivocal and concise, but delivered in a low key. If he were an actor, it could not be said that he throws his lines away, but he is even farther from tearing a passion to tatters. He is not outwardly passionate at all, though to do what he did requires great depth of feeling and adamant resolution. Some of the California delegates must have been taken aback when he began his speech with eight foreclosing words: "I do not intend to restate my case," and went on from there. But that showed more respect for his audience than if he had harangued them.

Americans who want more than anything else to be proud of their country may be ashamed of much that it has done in recent years but it did, after all, produce Eugene McCarthy, and millions have been inspired by him. And we have not heard the last of him, nor of the kind of politics for which he stands.

Agreement In Name Only

The obvious things about the Czechoslovak-Soviet confrontation have all been said. The Russian invasion was outrageous and a blow not only to international comity but to whatever is left of communism as an international cause. But this is only the first act in a continuing drama. Militarily, the hard-liners in Moscow have had their way, but they have not succeeded in what must have been their primary objective—a more amenable regime in Prague.

The Svoboda-Dubcek government may not remain completely unscathed, but even if one or another minister is displaced, and even if the liberalization trend is somewhat distorted, Moscow's basic problem remains. If the Moscow hard-line faction believes that a democratic version of communism is menacing to the regimes presently in power in the Soviet Union, Poland, Hungary and Bulgaria, then it must continue efforts to thwart what a majority of Czechs and Slovaks obviously prefer to the Novotny brand. So far as the military pressure on them will permit, Svoboda, Dubcek and their colleagues for their part must continue to hold on to what they have gained. The struggle will continue on the diplomatic level, with the threat of military force always in the background. If the Moscow hawks have learned anything, however, they will hesitate to rely again on direct force. They may withdraw most of their armor and resort to economic pressures.

An attempt has been made by the émigré groups in the United States, and by some of the indigenous press, to equate the invasion of Czechoslovakia with the assault on Hungary in 1956, but the differences are outstanding. Though Stalin was already dead, effective de-Stalinization had not yet taken hold, and the Soviet action was as unrestrained as if Stalin himself had been in charge. The government of Hungary was overthrown, the revolt was crushed, Imre Nagy and Pal Maleter were later executed, and large numbers of Hungarians fled the country. Even so, the Soviet action was not wholly unintelligent: the installation of Janos Kadar, a moderate who had at one time undergone torture at the hands of extremists, had a long-term pacifying effect. While he has gone along with the Russian moves, Kadar may be more sympathetic with the Czechoslovaks than he is in a position to admit.

Another factor that calls for evaluation is the Russian

IN THIS ISSUE

September 9, 1968

EDITORIALS

194

ARTICLES

198 The Bitter Legacy of LBJ

Carey McWilliams

Czechoslovakia in August

201 Schweik & the Russian Bear

Patrick D. Hazard

203 The Voices of Prague

Benjamin B. Page

205 Truck Grease on Capitol Hill

Charles Rabb

207 Pentagon Crisis:

The Colleges Are Pulling Out

Gabriel Kolko

209 Talent Without Money:
Dixie's Negro Candidates

Robert G. Sherrill

211 Geneva in Eclipse:
Medicine As a Weapon

L. J. Rather

BOOKS & THE ARTS

213 Chomsky's Revolution in Linguistics

Robert Sklar

217 In the Old Tradition

Alan Lechuk

218 The Stages of Wasp Man

Edwin J. Kenney, Jr.

220 A Passionate Memoir

Robert Hatch

221 Book Marks

Sara Blackburn

221 Theatre

Julius Novick

223 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Vol. 207

No. 7

(and Polish) fear of Germany. Hitler called Czechoslovakia a dagger aimed at the heart of Germany. This was simply preparation for his seizure of the Sudetenland, but the dagger can be turned to the East. The Russian fear of Germany redivivus is genuine, just as was the French fear of Germany after World War I—as it turned out, with good reason. Russian anxiety is aggravated by the tenuous hold of communism on East Germany, which has certainly not been strengthened by Ulbricht's role in the assault on Czechoslovakia. The Czechs may have to reconcile themselves to the presence of Russian troops on their western border, as a barrier to any future Czech-German rapprochement.

The sane course for the Czech and Slovak people is clear: they can win only by not being, or seeming to be, victorious. Svoboda and Dubcek have driven the best bargain possible, and can be relied on for a future course along the same lines. The people must support them and show firmness combined with political maturity. Any attempts at mass resistance would only play into the hands of the neo-Stalinists in their own country. The situation is much too precarious for displays of individual heroism. Teen-agers throwing stones at tanks make good pictures for the American news media, but the only aid Czechoslovakia will get from the United States is the verbal output of Radio Free Europe.

Technology Rides Again

In the May-June, 1967, issue of the Diary of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, the Polish-American philosopher Henryk Skolimowski questioned whether human society "can survive the grip of technology." The outlook appears considerably less promising in the light of the August 16 tests of the MIRV ("Multiple Independently Targetable Re-entry Vehicle"). The launchings took place at Cape Kennedy, further dissipating the notion that the National Aeronautics and Space Administration is dedicated only to the peaceful uses of outer space. The Navy and Air Force were equally represented, the Navy by its Poseidon missile, the Air Force by Minuteman 3. According to spokesmen for the services, the tests were highly successful—although precisely what constituted success was left unstated. ("It was a good day for the country," an Air Force public relations man said, identifying the country with the Air Force as the late Charles E. Wilson identified it with General Motors.)

Technology is nothing if not progress. In this case it consists of mounting from three to ten thermonuclear warheads on a single rocket. The multiple warheads can either be targeted on a single city or else cities several hundred miles apart can each receive its designated warhead. Numerous decoys will also be released to paralyze nuclear defense systems, in case anyone has been foolish enough to build them, and there are hints that the warheads will be maneuverable during descent, instead of falling freely.

The present "Model T" ICBM installations designed to protect the United States against a nuclear onslaught by devastating counterforce consist of more than 1,000 Minuteman 1 and Minuteman 2 missiles (the latter predominating) in underground silos, and 656 Polaris missiles in forty-one nuclear submarines. The Poseidon, which is longer and fatter than the Polaris and twice as heavy, will carry as many as ten warheads, with a range between 2,500 and 2,900 miles. The land-based Minuteman 3 is designed to carry three warheads to a range of about 8,000 miles.

In the early seventies, when these weapons are deployed, the number of warheads ready for instant launching will be multiplied several times. If the Russians—not to speak of the Chinese—would only stand still we would be even more invincible, but unfortunately the Soviet technology, like ours, is hellbent on progress. As a result they will have MIRVs targeted on our cities, and nothing much will be changed, except that there will be all the more chance of one of those thousands of bombs (ICBMs are only a small fraction of the total) going off inadvertently.

One change, however, is certain: A lot of money is going to be made by Lockheed (which is responsible for Poseidon) and Boeing (which supplies Minuteman 3) and by their subcontractors, always eager to boost technology to new heights of universal suicide.

'Everything We Can Get'

The MIRV development is only one aspect of the stepped-up arms race which is in prospect, once that nasty little diversion in Vietnam is out of the way. Rarely does the public get any real insight into the dynamics of defense spending, but one case of impressive magnitude is documented in Forbes, August 1.

By way of background, it must be understood that each of the three services (the Marines being included in the Navy) has three enemies: the one it is shooting at and its two brother services. Rivalry is particularly keen between the Air Force and the Navy—as former Secretary of Defense McNamara discovered when he tried to get the two services to share a new fighter-bomber, the F-111. The Navy version, F-111B, was to incorporate modifications to suit the requirements of carrier service, but it was killed by the admirals and their allies in Congress, who now have bigger plans.

They have come up with the VFX. If everything goes according to schedule, this will replace the McDonnell Douglas F-4, the present mainstay of the Navy, Marines and Air Force. The Navy alone figures it will need 1,300 at a unit cost of between $8 million and $9 million, or a total contract value of about $11 billion. If the plane proves to be really hot stuff, the Air Force may have to adopt it to the extent of another 1,700 planes, or $14 billion more, making a grand total of $25 billion.

Naturally everybody is after that tidy little sum, even though so far it is only on paper. North American Rockwell, Ling-Temco-Vought, McDonnell Douglas, General Dynamics and Grumman are already in the race, and no doubt others will appeal for a share.

The case of Grumman is a peculiar one. For many years the firm has been the favorite for Navy aviation procurement and was allied as the chief subcontractor with General Dynamics on the F-111 job. Grumman's share was to be about $500 million, of which it has earned $355 million so far. Undeterred by its link with General Dynamics, Grumman brought the VFX proposal to the Navy.

When the news reached General Dynamics, one of its executives said that his people felt somewhat like a cuckolded husband. They also suspected that the Navy had given Grumman a helping hand—informally and sub rosa, of course—but this is denied by Grumman's president, Llewellyn J. Evans. "We did this on our own, for purely competitive reasons," he insists. "... We spent millions on research and wind tunnel testing. ... This is a damn competitive business, and we're going after everything we can get."

Business is business, whether it's on Seventh Avenue among the cloak-and-suiters, or in the great centers of defense with their palatial offices. There is only this difference: the cloak-and-suiters don't operate with the taxpayers' money.

Ernest Gruening

The youth of America (and the humane spirit that might keep America young), which was battered and gassed through the streets of Chicago last week, also lost a battle in Alaska, where Sen. Ernest Gruening was defeated in the Democratic primaries by Mike Gravel, an Anchorage real estate developer.

Senator Gruening is 81 and if this defeat should mark the end of his public career, he can face political retirement with pride in a lifetime devoted to public service as a journalist, U.S. representative abroad, Alaska governor and legislator. But the country cannot face his departure with like equanimity, for in the case of Mr. Gruening "public service" is no conventional phrase—he served the public, people not institutions, and people not only in America but everywhere in the world and most particularly in the world of Latin America. It is an ironic shock that on the day when the Senator was defeated in Alaska, the U.S. Ambassador to Guatemala, Mr. John Gordon Mein, was shot dead on the Avenida Reforma. Our Latin American policy in recent decades has made us the "enemy" in the eyes of its peoples; they knew Gruening for their friend.

It is a characteristic of many great men that they stay young for their entire lives. A few weeks ago Senator Gruening was taking time out from a barnstorming trip through the Eskimo villages of northern Alaska to swim in the icy Arctic Ocean; a few months ago his strong voice was raised to greet the peace marchers assembled before the Washington Monument. "Never trust anyone over 30," says the young, but they don't mean Ernest Gruening.

Twice in his life from 1920 to 1922 and again in 1933, Mr. Gruening was an editor of The Nation. He has said, "Of no title could I be prouder than that of Nation alumnus." He now becomes an alumnus of the Senate, a title in which he can also take great pride, for he served Alaska well, both as territorial governor and as Senator. We await with confidence the career to which he will devote himself in his "retirement."

The Rediscovery of Cuba

The biggest blunder of the Kennedy and Johnson administrations was of course the invasion of Vietnam. Less disastrous in its consequences but even more illustrative of military and diplomatic idiocy, one may cite U.S.-Cuban relations since Batista was sent packing.

All revolutionary regimes go through a phase of euphoria, marked by great pride (for which there is some reason) and a corresponding sensitivity. Elementary psychology teaches that this is the time to give them a wide berth, in the expectation that things will simmer down, as they almost always do. Contacts with triumphant revolutionaries call for the utmost delicacy.

In the case of Cuba, we were instead at pains to insult Castro on his first visit to the United States and thereafter to make life miserable for his regime and for the Cuban people. Then we committed the blunder of the Bay of Pigs. Since then, we have tried to be generally beastly, though perforce only in a petty way.

Under modern conditions, however, it is impossible for two nations, separated by only 90 miles of water, to exist indefinitely in a state of total hostility. It makes no difference that one is the most powerful in the world and the other among the smallest and feeblest—in today's world such ratios do not mean what they once did. The proximity of Cuba and the United States is too much even for our cold warriors and Communist-baiters and the diehard "anti-imperialists" on the other side.

It is instructive to note some of the factors that are now beginning to compel the rediscovery of Cuba by U.S. statesmanship (such as it is). The first is the hijacking of U.S. aircraft. So far this year there have been ten attempted and successful airplane seizures; five commercial and two private flights were forced to change course and fly to Cuba. The airline companies, and the U.S. Government, are virtually powerless to cope with the problem, which creates justified anxiety among airline passengers.

All the proposals for coping with the hijackers promise to make a bad situation worse. One such bright idea involves equipping the flight crew with tear gas (in a sealed cabin!); another would have the pilots put the plane into sharp dives or violent turns to throw the hijacker off balance (and the passengers out of their seats, and perhaps against the ceiling of the cabin). In one attempt to end this aerial piracy, the State Department has told Cuba that it will fly home any of its nationals on the return trips of the planes which now twice daily bring Cuban refugees to the United States. But Castro has not agreed, and given the backgrounds and mental states of the hijackers to date, there seems no powerful reason why he should. A considerable number have criminal records, several have shown themselves distraught, and not all are Cubans.

Another painful consequence of U.S.-Cuban hostility is the epidemic of bombings at foreign consulates and tourist offices, mainly in midtown Manhattan but also in other cities. While there is no proof that all these bombings are the work of anti-Castro terrorists, the targets have been predominantly the consulates and mission offices of countries that maintain trade relations with Cuba. A leftist bookstore was attacked, as were the offices of Grove Press, whose magazine, Evergreen Review, had recently published excerpts from Che Guevara's Bolivian diary. That bombing came on the fifteenth anniversary of Castro's opening attack upon the Batista government. Cuban exiles have been telling newsmen that organizations they belong to, or know about, are responsible—though the informants themselves claim innocence.

One Cuban exile arrested in Miami in connection with a bombing had been trained by the CIA. There is some reason to believe that we have not cut our ties with militant anti-Castro organizations, and hesitate to take drastic action against them lest some of their officials and members might tell about their relations with the not very successful guardians of our security and liberties.

THE BITTER LEGACY OF LBJ

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Chicago, August 29

At the stroke of midnight Wednesday, the Democrats nominated Hubert Humphrey for the Presidency, but if they did not elect Richard Nixon to that office it was through no fault of Lyndon Johnson, Mayor Daley, or the happy nominee. What they have done to their party remains to be seen. Humphrey's nomination came as no surprise to anyone here, although his vote was somewhat larger than had been forecast. From the outset he had the nomination sewed up. There was no need for Daley's rigging operations, which were carried out in full public view, with the President's approval and with no protest from the nominee. Nor was there need or justification for the fantastic police and security measures which in effect called for the violence they were supposed to prevent. And there was no justification whatever for the brutality which the police inflicted on demonstrators, visitors, newsmen and even some delegates.

The Chicago police are a special breed. My guess would be that they weigh on an average about 50 or 60 pounds more than the average for New York's finest. Even before the trouble started, it was clear that they were spoiling for a fight, and not merely with yuppies and hippies. They were up tight, period. Police, National Guardsmen and federal troops probably outnumbered demonstrators. One Chicago newsmen estimated 20,000 for each side.

The effect of this awesome demonstration of military and police muscle was to create an atmosphere so hateful and oppressive that it drew a mild protest even from joyous Hubert. At the same time it was clear that any of the candidates could have been assassinated with relative ease, precisely because of the confusion, the general milling around and the excessive show of force. Newsmen usually enjoy a degree of immunity from police brutality, but not in Chicago, not at this convention. Secret Service and uniformed police appeared on the floor of the conven-

The only comprehensive answer, of course, is normalization of relations between the United States and Cuba. But that is only the negative side. The fact is that a return to normality in the Caribbean would benefit both countries. Relations between the Russians and the Cubans have cooled. Castro's attempts to foment revolution in Latin America have not been conspicuously successful. Cuba could be a very good market for the United States, and an influx of American goods could alleviate the hardships of the Cuban people.

There are some glimmerings that good sense may prevail. There are even reports that President Johnson, wishing to leave office with the aura of a great peacemaker, is toying with the idea of coming to terms with Castro. It is high time that this long, dreary, absurd chapter was ended.

Abu—The Tribune. London

tion and at various state caucuses; at least two delegates were forcibly removed from the floor by the police. The assaults on newsmen naturally assured the widest possible publicity; the press and the media always become aroused about police brutality when it is directed against their representatives. Never before, at any convention, have newsmen been treated as they were here. "Apparently the police don't understand the English version of 'press,'" wrote Mike Royko, the popular columnist for the Chicago Daily News. "They seem to think it means 'Hit me, please' or 'Smash my camera, please.'"

Federal authorities were concerned from the outset about the measures Daley had ordered. Most of the delegates resented these measures but took no action to repudiate them. An enormous audience, in this country and abroad, watched the disgraceful Chicago street scenes. If Daley had wanted to get the Democrats off to a bad start in this year's convention, he could not have done any better than he did. Richard Nixon, like Daley, is a "law-and-order" man, but he is not likely to pass up the opportunity to make political capital of this disgraceful exhibition of police assault. The image conveyed by the media of the "pacification" carried out by Mayor Daley's "special forces," including firemen and personnel from the Chicago Sewer District, was grotesque, surreal and reminiscent of Storm-trooper tactics in Germany of the 1930s. But oddly enough the street action was largely unrelated to what the delegates were doing; as delegates, they were not intimidated. Many of them seemed to feel that, however distasteful the outside action might be, it did not directly concern them, although 1,761 delegates voted to accept Johnson's protégé and program. It was Johnson who gave the convention to Chicago, as a reward to Daley for services rendered; and it was Daley who directed the police action, the pattern for which had been established during the peace demonstrations of April 27 [See "The Battle of Chicago" by Joseph L. Sander, The Nation, May 20]. The TV-viewing public naturally related the street scenes to the convention coverage; most delegates did not.

After the first few roll calls on the credentials fights, it was clear that there were simply not enough votes at the convention to block Humphrey's nomination. It was also clear that the size of the Establishment vote was not due to Humphrey's popularity—he cut a sorry figure here—nor was it due to any weaknesses in the opposition candidates. It stemmed rather from what might be called "the structure of the situation."

From the outset, Senator McCarthy, as an outsider challenging the leadership of his own party, was at a distinct disadvantage in terms of building delegate support for his movement. This weakness was remedied to some extent when Sen. Robert Kennedy entered the race. But as Senator McCarthy said in an interview yesterday, Senator Kennedy's death meant that "the control of the convention wars was in the hands of the regulars." McCarthy was constantly asked if he would support "the nominee of the convention." But since he was the initial challenger of the Administration, he could not give a direct categorical answer, and that kept him consistently in the role of the outsider who, in the eyes of many delegates, was running against the party, not with it. Senator Kennedy was not in that position, nor was Senator McGovern, who came on strong here at the convention but who entered the race too late to be able to carry his candidacy to the delegates in any systematic manner. The last-minute efforts to engineer a draft of Sen. Edward Kennedy did not help the opposition. With the bulk of his active supporters aligned with either McCarthy or McGovern, most delegates gave little credence to the rumor that he might be drafted.

Senator McCarthy was deprived of the issue on which he might have won—that is, "the Johnson issue." In retrospect it is clear that there was more and stronger sentiment against Johnson than there was against the Vietnamese War. The President offered a perfect target for McCarthy, and if he had not withdrawn, the structure of the situation would have been quite different. His departure not only changed the nature of McCarthy's problem but also took some of the edge off the Vietnamese issue. No longer was McCarthy the David who had dared to challenge Goliath. After March 31, he was a contestant in a struggle for power. In such a situation, and notably in a convention setting, candidates must exhibit a will to win. But McCarthy managed to convey the impression here, as throughout the campaign, that winning the big prize was not his main concern. This casual attitude put off many delegates, but not enough to have made a significant difference in the final balloting. Away from the convention, McCarthy's style and manner were assets, but delegates expect to be importuned by candidates who really want to win.

"We Come Highly Recommended."

A major weakness of the opposition was its failure to penetrate the key industrial states of Illinois, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania. In the case of Illinois, Daley was a major factor, but the basic explanation is that the leadership of organized labor, including Walter Reuther, was committed to Humphrey in all these states. As McCarthy put it, "Those old labor people . . . just dug in and put their heads down, like buffaloes. You couldn't budge them." In the key states of New York and California, sentiment against the Vietnamese War was so strong that the leadership of organized labor was to a large extent frozen out of the delegations. There is strong anti-war sentiment in the Midwest, too, but it was not organized

Pierotti. The N.Y. Post
"But Where Does It Say I Was Always Right?"

in a way that might have offset labor's rock-hard influence with the party's organizations in the selection of delegates. Sen. Robert Kennedy could have made a strong bid for organizational and labor support in these Midwest states; McCarthy could appeal only to the people. Not only was the labor leadership able to play a key role in delegate selection in these states but it was represented by 201 delegates in a labor caucus from forty-three states. In brief, the opposition strength in such states as California, New York, Oregon, Wisconsin, South Dakota, Vermont, New Hampshire and Massachusetts could not offset Humphrey's support in the South, the border states, some of the Western states, and the big industrial states of the Midwest.

In Chicago, as at Miami, the convention nominated its leading organizational candidate. But the opposition in Chicago, unlike that in Miami, offered a real challenge in the key symbolic issue of Vietnam. The vote on the minority report on Vietnam—1,041½ for, 1,567¾ against, demonstrates the strength of the opposition. Paradoxically, opposition to the war is stronger among the Democrats than among the Republicans, but the Democratic Party must be charged with major responsibility for escalation and a special responsibility for the deceptive campaign of 1964. No doubt the Republicans will exploit popular opposition to the war, but they will not mount the kind of attack that was set forth in the minority plank that was offered in Chicago. Humphrey's friends are saying, of course, that he will now move in the direction indicated by the McCarthy-McGovern-Kennedy opposition. But he has publicly reaffirmed his support of the Administration's position. He owes his nomination to those elements in the party most closely identified with the established leadership. At Philadelphia in 1948, Humphrey was booed by the Dixiecrats; here at Chicago, in 1968, he was forced to rely on their support. His backing came essentially from Dixiecrats, the leadership of organized labor, the few old-line bosses left in the party and the entrenched leadership.

The cliché comment on this convention is that the New Deal coalition which kept the Democrats in power in all but eight of the last thirty-six years is now breaking up. Much more to the point, however, is the fact that the elements for a new coalition exist within the party. McCarthy brought many of these new elements into the party—young people, the younger, better-educated, new-salaried middle class, the expanded educational elites, et al.

The mass of Negroes may be disaffected with both parties, but it is certainly a pleasure to listen to roll calls in which Mississippi votes against the unit rule. In this connection the black caucus nominated an impressive candidate, Rev. Channing Phillips, and served notice that it no longer respects, if it ever did, the established party leadership.

Julian Bond, in the bifurcated Georgia delegation, and Fanny Lou Hamer, in the Mississippi delegation, symbolize the "New Politics" that is emerging in the South. The number of Negro delegates, 241, was higher than ever before, and the tide of opposition to discrimination against Negroes, Puerto Ricans and Mexican Americans is running strong, is growing and is irreversible. In addition—and this is one of the major achievements of McCarthy's candidacy—the party has begun to reform the convention system and to give individual voters a better chance to influence decision making through meaningful political action.

It is these currents, including the strong opposition to the war, which underscore the serious consequences that may result from the majority acceptance of the Johnson legacy. The forces of the "New Politics" were strongly represented at this convention. Under the leadership, for example, of Jesse Unruh, a new-style boss who has learned something about the New Politics, the California delegation held only open caucuses as did many other delegations, and the McCarthy-Humphrey-McGovern debate before the Californians was a model of its kind.

Listening in on some of the state caucuses, I was impressed by the desire of delegations to win the right to more meaningful participation in political decision making at every level. The Wisconsin delegation is a fine example of the New Politics. As Miles McMillin of the Madison Capital Times said to me, most of the Wisconsin delegates "came out of nowhere." Few of them have had prior political experience, but it has not taken them long to learn the techniques. Today this delegation constitutes the Democratic Party in Wisconsin. Vietnam is the issue, as one delegate put it, which "brought us together." A professor led the discussion of the reports on Vietnam, and the chairman, Donald Peterson, a businessman, performed like a veteran. Jay Sykes, a newcomer in politics (incidentally a Nation contributor), played a key role in McCarthy's victory in Wisconsin. At the caucus on the Vietnam planks, a pleasant middle-aged housewife foreclosed what might have been some disruptive heckling from a minority by her mild but firm insistence that the delegates stick to the issues.

The Democrats cannot afford to permit these new elements to leave the party; they hold the key to its future—if it has a future. Despite the rigging, wire pulling and other Daley tactics—with the big man signaling his wishes to various chairmen on the floor—and despite the size of the Humphrey vote, one sensed the existence just beneath the surface of a strong political insurgence which could not break through, in part because it did not quite know how and also because the old hands were still operating the controls. In 1972 it could be a different story. Because this potential exists it is a national misfortune that the party did not repudiate Johnson, as the people had done. The party is now stuck, if not with him then at least with his legacy: a gravely weakened party structure, the possibility of a walkout of those elements most needed to reorganize and revivify the party, and the awesome burden of defending the Johnson-Humphrey record on Vietnam. By failing to repudiate the Johnson legacy, the Democrats have not only improved Richard Nixon's chances of winning in November, they have also gravely hobbled Democratic nominees in every state.

John MacLean of the Chicago Tribune reports that when Hubert Horatio learned that he had been nominated he jumped to his feet and started clapping his hands, "How about that?" he shouted as he threw his arms around Mrs. Fred Harris, chairman of the United Democrats for Humphrey, and kissed her. When the image of his wife flashed onto the colored television sets in his suite, he said, "Mom, I wish you were here now." He turned then to a roomful of friends, aides and newsmen, and his voice quivering with elation said, "Look how pretty she looks" (as indeed she did), and leaned over to kiss her image on the set.

Elation at such a moment is to be expected, and from such a man as the nominee it is certain to be mawkish, but on this occasion Mr. Humphrey radiated a joy that was in bizarre contrast to the wicked excesses occurring on the streets beneath his window.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA IN AUGUST

Schweik & the Russian Bear

PATRICK D. HAZARD

Mr. Hazard is a member of the English department of Beaver College.

The clichés of our half-solicitous, half-envious friends about the riskiness of going, the excitement of being where the action is, was far from the reality of coexisting with the Russians from Cierna to Tisou to Bratislava. Not that my wife and I felt none of the factitious anxiety which Raymond Williams has suggested Western media whipped up with their foolishly "friendly" coverage of the Czechs' mini-cold war; it was hard to suppress a very real shiver at the sight of a Tommy gun-manned watchtower on the border between West Germany and Czechoslovakia. But our first contact with Czech officialdom a few minutes later was hardly geopolitical: the Banlon-frocked moneychangers aboard our train could have been, from the pert looks of them, any second-generation American Slavs at any Midwestern state university near Cleveland or Pittsburgh. (But their flattered cross-talk to each other when they realized we wanted to know where in Prague to find more poets like Miroslav Holub and more films like Closely Watched Trains would be hard to imagine among their American contemporaries.)

Our being there "at the historic moment" was mostly chance. After a year of teaching Americans in England, we had qualified for a National Union of Students tour. We reluctantly abstained from Greece to punish the colonels, and long before Dubcek's heroic fortnight, had signed on for Czechoslovakia with thirteen British university students or recent graduates and another American. Not that we were uninterested in what was going on there. Our political awakening had dated approximately from F. O. Matthiessen's suicide over another Eastern European Socialist crisis in the 1950s, and we were eager to see for ourselves "what communism was like." We wanted to believe that socialism could renew itself, that its overbureaucratized ugliness could wither away under the scorn and joy of Czech cartoonists, film makers, writers. Long depressed by the playpen atmosphere of American television, we wanted to believe what we had read about the revolutionary role Czech TV had played in the post-January examination of the national conscience.

So, as the crisis mounted in the fortnight before our departure, we anxiously scanned the dispatches from Prague over morning coffee, gauging whether it would be chicken to back out at the last moment. I cite these feelings at length because I think they illustrate how misleading most of the attitudes inherited from the cold war turn out to be when people—even those who make some special effort to be broadminded—risk their first visit behind (note, not simply "the other side of") the iron curtain. And these (ex post facto) incredible assumptions which we brought to our visit (four days in Prague, three in Bratislava, six in the cities and villages of Eastern Slovakia from Poprad to Kosice) may help to explain the paradoxical exhilaration and depression we brought back from our possibly too bookish tour.

The first, and ultimately only essential, truth to record about the gray socialism that Czech intellectuals

David Myers—Evening News, London
Czech!

are revolting against is that it is indeed revolting. Even to one whose eyes were weaned on the squalor of Midwestern American motorscapes, today's Czechoslovak vistas must be seen to be discredited. Reading Mencken's "Lido of the Ugly" in a copy of Writers in Revolt that our American undergraduate was carrying, we concluded that his archetypal patch of desolation along the 25 miles of railroad track between Greensburgh and Pittsburgh would look almost Edenic by comparison with the bomb-site drabness all over Czechoslovakia. This is the more ironic because Mencken makes the point that the Central European immigrants inhabiting those steel mill towns had made a mighty poor bargain when they traded their quaint Slovakian villages for the infernal river valleys of the coal and steel magnates. It's not just the prevailing torn-up atmosphere—sewer and cable lines "temporarily" dug up, and left behind wooden protective fences which looked as though they had weathered more than one winter; half-erected ski jumps in tourist-development areas, with the missing steel beams complacently rusting away in a crazy heap. And it's not only the run-down quality of public services: clogged bathrooms in trains, bulbless light fixtures (under-illumination is a national vice, especially in museums), unrunning hot water in huge dormitory complexes. Beyond all this, it is the excruciating quality of recent building that is so discouraging.

We walked with a recent British civil engineering graduate through two so-called construction sites in the high-prestige tourist area of Stary Smokovec. It didn't require his professional comment to make us understand that in front of the local post office we were watching the slowest bricklayer in the history of mortar. An amateur could also see that the rubbly bricks he was so meticulously laying one on another were no inducement to speed. That was one Czech structure that would never beat the considerable snows of the High Tatry mountains this coming winter. And down the road, two other workers were hacking phlegmatically at great boulders, chipping them down to size for insertion in a wooden wall form. They might beat the winter, if it was very late. I suspect that this is the kind of disarray that prompted Czechoslovak Life to editorialize in its August issue:

The complete abolition of small-scale private enterprise, which exists to a greater or lesser degree in most of the other Socialist countries, is one of the reasons why local services are at such a low level in Czechoslovakia. To encourage a return to skilled crafts like carpentry and plumbing, national committees last year issued over 20,000 permits to private craftsmen. A law establishing the conditions under which individuals may set up shop will probably be passed before the end of the year. It is envisaged that permission will be granted not only to individuals and members of their families but to groups of individuals working in related crafts. Equipment could be owned or borrowed, and proprietors may also be given the right to train one apprentice.

But the oddest reaction, to one indoctrinated by Western capitalist dependence on creature comforts, is the paradoxical spiritual exhilaration amidst all this physical ugliness. And this is not necessarily a matter of cerebral high-mindedness. On an electric tram one day in the mountains, I struck up a conversation with a steel worker from Brno returning from a holiday with his wife and 11-year-old son. He was carving traditional designs on a walking stick he had cut in the forest, as a summer souvenir for his son. The postcard stands and shops are flooded with crude parodies of this craft, slickly shellacked kitsch, a Czech equivalent of African airport art. But the man from Brno, with whom we carried on in German a clumsy but satisfying conversation on politics and industry, on his grown children and on this his second family, showed us how, in a train jouncing down a mountainside, he carved this stick, ingeniously using the knots in the pine to make variations on traditional patterns. Enchanted by his skill, I asked where one could buy such a present for my son back home (unaware then that he was making it for his own). You can't buy this kind, he told me, you have to make them yourself. You don't sell them, but you can give them away. Generosity feeds benignly on itself, and a boy in Brno now wears my wristwatch. On the bus to Presov, a very ordinary lady was wearing her Sunday-best apron—another brilliant everyday improvisation on traditional themes, the commonest black shiny cotton transfigured by what one is reduced to calling "modern" juxtapositions of green, beige and brown.

The state-run crafts shops attempt to market these everyday arts, but only in Kosice, the least metropolitan of the big cities, did we find materials that even approached in quality the do-it-yourself crafts of the Slovaks. Surely the collections of such materials gathered in the Eastern Slovakian Museum at Kosice are among the most splendid anywhere in the world. It is perhaps significant, too, that the exhibition of Russian useful arts (mostly ceramics and textiles) at the Eastern Slovakian Gallery in Kosice was as vigorous and true as the exposition of Socialist Realism next to the statue of Jan Hus in Prague was complacently tawdry. The Czech (and especially Slovak) capacity to hang onto traits in their culture which protect a human scale in the midst of grandiose bureaucratic failure is a precious legacy they bring into the 20th century. It is part of their Schweikmanship, a tactic learned at infinite cost over centuries of brutal interventionism—Tartars, "benevolent" medieval German economic developers, anti-Hussite mercenaries in search of vacated estates, Bohemian book-burning Jesuits, Hapsburg anti-nationalist overlords, Nazis and now the Russians.

It behooves the Russian occupiers to read The Good Soldier Schweik. It should give them second thoughts about the costs of Russifying Czech Communists. Our Prague guide, who had given up teaching history to be a grandmotherly baby sitter, proudly told us, a week before the Russian occupation, how the city hall architects conned the Nazi authorities out of dismantling the fine Mikolas Ales mosaics in the entranceway to the old Town Hall: They claimed the whole tower would come tumbling down if the occupiers tried to expunge the fighting words worked into the design.

Perhaps the most useful historical tradition the Czechs take very seriously is not forgiving those who have the best of intentions for "helping" them. Peter Chelocky, the 16th-century Bohemian proto-anarchist whom Tolstoy praised for his prescience, had some savage observations to make in The Net of Faith (1521) on another vanguard elite: "It is thus as regards the poverty of the monks: If it were true poverty it would be blessed, but their poverty is insatiable and endures no want; therefore has it only the name of poverty. . . . And if a poor monk obtains such abundance for his dinner table that he disdains beef and delicious peas with fat bacon, but wags his tail when he sees game, birds, or other delicacies that are better than peas, then he has got himself a good livelihood by his begging; and he and his companions the other monks have made a better business out of begging than some squire who has a plough and two fields, or even a large farm."

The night after the mendacious Russian leaders had their ritual visit there, we were taken to the Slavin memorial high above Bratislava by two young architecture students who wanted to show us the best view of their city. They amused us with anti-Russian jokes and stories (and hearty but unsynchronized laughter, because each story was filtered through a babel of Slovak, French, German and English). They pointed to the flaring red exhausts of the petrol refinery along the Danube and groused bitterly that the Russians sent them crude oil and they sent it back, refined, free. They noted bitterly that the American Army had no comparable monument in Pilsen, and openly wished that they hadn't stopped there.

Perhaps it is unfair, even to the Russian occupiers. Americans lost no 20 million in the war against the commonly hated German. But the Russians had better face the utter disillusion of the Czechs with Stalinist rigidity. The students we talked with simply don't accept agitprop ideologies. They regaled themselves with puns on how the Czech pronunciation of democracy comes out sounding "crazy." And they openly mocked tipsy workers at a Danube café who were trying to bait us with workers'-solidarity slogans. The overflowing Sunday churches in Slovakia, with worshipers standing outside the doors in the rain, were offering prayers, we were told, for the success of Dubcek. That is a reality of character which not many Czech quislings will have the courage to buck. Russia's bad conscience about the pressure for liberalization at home has sucked it over the brink in Czechoslovakia. Judging from what we saw of Czech disenchantment with failing slogans and their joy in the new feeling of freedom, the Russians are going to regret this precipitate step. Their cure may well cause them more pain than the infection they wanted to stop. For the Czechs are not melodramatic Hungarians, ready to assault a tank with upraised hands. If I were a Russian occupier, I'd watch my fuel lines. There's more than one way for a Schweik to sweet-talk a Russian bear into wishing he had never left home.

The Voices of Prague

BENJAMIN B. PAGE

Mr. Page, who studied for three years at Charles University in Prague, who married a Czech girl, and who participated in a Christian Peace Conference in Prague last April, was returning to the United States by way of that city just before the Russians moved. In the tense atmosphere that then prevailed, he noted down a number of conversations with Czechs in various walks of life. These give, as he says, some idea of the atmosphere within Czechoslovakia to which the Russians were responding. There was a good deal of disorganization and even uncertainty as to leadership. At the same time, says Mr. Page, "it was a beautiful sight to see Czechs walking with a springy step, an almost moving sight to see the Czech flag flying alone without the Soviet flag beside it, for the first time in twenty years."

Mr. Page does not name his informants, but identifies them by occupation.

We have our own Hyde Park. We hold meetings where we say anything we want. Some people even make love during the speeches. We also now have our own Maoists, which is as it should be. No one pays much attention to them, which is also as it should be. (Student.)

Prague has become a liberal's paradise. But if you make a noise that's even slightly critical, all the liberals jump on you, denouncing you as a Stalinist or Novotnyist. It's almost worse than it was before, for us, except that we've been able to discover each other. (Leftist-Maoist-Poet.)

Give us another five or six years and we'll have most of the industry back in private hands. (Economics student.)

When Tito was here, he was cheered almost as much as Dubcek. Thousands of people went out to meet him.

He deserves it. For twenty years he's been fighting alone, and now the world is beginning to see how right he has been. Sure, the Yugoslavs are a little jealous of all the attention we have been getting, but then we're going much further than they ever have. (Journalist.)

We are the first country to develop an anti-police terror. The police are scared to do anything. They just stand and look—or wave their arms and hope car drivers will obey. But people can do anything they want here now—except the poor police. They're scared that if they do anything they will be accused of brutality, Stalinism, or both. (Radio commentator.)

We're so liberal now that our crime rate is almost as high as yours. There have been eighteen murders just in Prague so far this year—most of them still unsolved. Robberies are committed on the streets in broad daylight. The hippies have an organization and a central committee—and completely disown the hooligans, who seem to be the bad ones. But it's hard to tell them apart. Maybe it's not quite safe here any more, but at least it's a lot freer than it was. (Journalist.)

When Svoboda became President, he declared a general amnesty—it's a tradition with us. But over 300 of the criminals set free are already back in jail. Now maybe the crime rate will go back down. (Waiter.)

Smrkovsky (President of the National Assembly) looked good at first, but it seems pretty clear now that he is a very sympathetic man but really not very smart. He's a bit of a clown. (Student.)

Dubcek and Smrkovsky are both puppets. It's people like Sik and Cisar who are really in control. These are the guys who want our economy to get even worse so that the only way to save it will be to borrow large amounts from West Germany. They turned down a Soviet offer of a hard-currency loan. They say that Czechoslovakia belongs naturally to the Central European economic community, which in effect means Germany. ("Maoist" Student.)

It's a little ironic that just when they are finally planning to build a statue to Masaryk over on the Petrin hill, the country he founded seems to be coming apart. Bohemia and Slovakia were federated under the first republic, that's not new. But now Moravians are talking about wanting their own internal government—so are the Silesians and some of the Hungarians along the border, and even the Germans still in Bohemia and Moravia. A bunch of gypsies recently put together what they called a government and wrote the UN. Some people even go so far as to claim that Slovakia is a Slavic nation and belongs to the Eastern bloc, but that Bohemia has always had stronger affinities to the West and to German and Austrian economies and hence should be separate from the East and maybe federated with Austria or actually part of the Western bloc. Even Otto Hapsburg has been getting a half-decent press in our country. And what is frightening is that some of those who talk like this, still privately, are in responsible positions. (Writer.)

Mahood—The Times, London

The Central Committee—my God you should see it. It's filled with intellectuals like Kosik and the Philosophy Institute crew who say it should be a small, minority party in a Parliament. These damn liberals, they are scared for their own positions in the Party because if the workers ever got mobilized the liberals would be out on their ears. You know it's very interesting to see how quiet the workers have been over the last few months. They tried to make some strikes last spring, but the liberals told them that strikes were a capitalist phenomenon and that they should work even harder under the new economic system. But the workers know that the fruits will go to the intellectuals; workers have already been asked to make more sacrifices, but no one mentions anything of the sort in connection with the intellectuals. That's why the intellectuals are scared, and why they want a small Communist Party, composed just of themselves with no mass membership. ("Maoist" Journalist.)

Not just small shops, but big industry and banking, and maybe even things like medicine should be privately controlled. The state can't do everything; that's the problem here—it has tried to. Look at your country—the highest living standard in the world, the most modern medical techniques, a very efficient distribution of high quality products, all of this you have because the state just worries about politics. (Medical student.)

I've just come back from Greece. You Westerners must have a guilty conscience or something. That country is no Fascist dictatorship. A year ago, I'd have far preferred that kind of "fascism" to what we had here then. The CIA did a magnificent job there, a very well done maneuver. And they're doing a pretty good job here, too. I don't say that Dubcek and the rest are conscious agents, or anything, but few of us would be surprised to learn that CIA money has been involved. But, as in Greece, it's all to the good. (Journalist.)

Of course! A lot in what we're doing, and even more in what we want to do is counterrevolutionary. But what is tragic is that you Americans do not know how much it would be in your interest to help us. Our state treasury is so empty that people are bringing their old gold and jewelry to the state bank account, and you goddamn Americans won't let us have that gold of ours you have been keeping since the end of the last war. (Radio commentator.)

We are absolutely defenseless if the Russians want to do anything. We feel quite certain that there is an agreement between Moscow and Washington, that in return for the Soviets taking no action in Vietnam, Johnson has promised them a free hand with us. Sure, each side will continue to denounce the other's actions, but if anything happens, we're absolutely defenseless. (Journalist.)

For the workers—and maybe the leftists—an intervention might not be so bad, but they're the only ones. Not long ago some workers sent a letter to their “adopted” factory in the Soviet Union criticizing some aspects of our situation. The Soviet press published it, too. A bunch of youths went in and created problems in their factory. I don't agree with that kind of action, but those workers had no business to be critical of situations they don't really understand. All they think of is their beer, and if a return to the old system will keep their pay from going down, then they might not be that opposed to a restoration. Sure, they'd probably resist an actual invasion, along with everyone else, on nationalistic grounds. But we must be careful, because many of them would probably not support the new Party or state leadership for its own sake. (Liberal teacher.)

It's really quite sad. We Czechs have never had the bad feelings toward the Russians that the Poles have had traditionally. When we were under the Austrians and Hitler, we even looked to the Russians as our saviors. After the war, Soviet troops were welcomed with much real joy and hope. And in twenty-three years the Soviets alone have destroyed all that. The tragedy is that with a little foresight they could have helped us make this country into a real showplace. We were the only Socialist country with any industry at the end of the war, and both socialism and the Soviets were extremely popular. But all those bastards did was to rob and exploit us. It's so bad now that they haven't been able to find one Czech willing to play a Janos Kadar role for them, and don't think they haven't been looking. That's probably why they haven't taken any action so far—they have no one to put in Dubcek's place. Novotny? Poor Tonda is so discredited that not even the Russians would be so stupid as to try to put him back in. (Journalist.)

TRUCK GREASE ON CAPITOL HILL

CHARLES RABB

Mr. Rabb is a reporter in the Washington office of the New York Daily News.

A persistent Iowa Congressman, Rep. Fred Schwengel (R.), is challenging the politically formidable trucking lobby for its freehanded attempts to slide special-interest legislation through Congress. Schwengel wants the House Ethics Committee to investigate the “embarrassing circumstances” surrounding the American Trucking Associations' campaign contributions to key Congressmen who cast committee votes for a bill to permit wider, longer and heavier trucks on the interstate highway system. So far, the Ethics Committee, that toothless watchdog of House morality, has shown not the least interest. In the view of its chairman, Rep. Melvin Price (D., Ill.), if any impropriety occurred it was committed by the trucking lobby and is thus beyond the jurisdiction of his committee.

While Price has been ignoring the fact that it takes two parties to make a deal, Schwengel has been firing away in House speeches at the bill itself and at the tactics used to clear it for House consideration. His efforts attracted so much attention that the bill's supporters abandoned their plans to bring it to a vote before Congress recessed for the Republican and Democratic conventions. The bill is still on the House calendar and can be called up at any time.

High stakes are involved for the nation's motorists.

The bill would permit trucks using interstate highways to increase their maximum width from 8 feet to 8½ feet, their maximum weight per axle from 9 tons to 10 tons, and their maximum total weight from 36 tons to 69 tons. It would put no limit on truck length.

Schwengel and other opponents contend the increased weight limits could add as much as $3 billion to federal highway costs for upgrading and strengthening roads and bridges. The American Association of State Highway Officials warns that the higher weight limits would reduce highway pavement life 20 per cent and raise resurfacing costs 30 per cent. The American Automobile Association fears the bill would open the door to “highway trains” which would eventually make the interstate system so hazardous that motorists would be forced to use other roads.

The Johnson Administration—obviously not unaware of the truckers' political muscle—backed the bill on the ground that it would reduce trucking costs, and presumably save money for the public.

Opponents charge that the bill was rushed through the Public Works Committee in forty minutes, although they had been assured by Rep. John C. Kluczynski (D., Ill.), chairman of the Roads subcommittee and sponsor of the bill, that they would have sufficient time to propose amendments. Schwengel says the measure cleared the Rules Committee with no notice being given to its opponents that it was up for consideration. The bill passed the Senate on April 4, when only seven Senators were on the floor.

All this would have been interesting, but perhaps routine. However, Nick Kotz, a reporter for the Des Moines Register, later disclosed that many lawmakers who cast crucial committee votes for the measure and looked after other bills involving the trucking industry had received campaign contributions from the truckers.

According to reports filed with the Clerk of the House, eleven of the thirteen Democrats on the House Public Works Committee received in the past two years campaign contributions from the truckers. A total of $3,000 went to Kluczynski and his fund-raising group. Committee chairman George H. Fallon (D., Md.) received $1,000, as did ranking Democrats John A. Blatnik (Minn.) and Robert E. Jones (Ala.) and ranking Republican William H. Harsha (Ohio). Other committee members with less seniority were given $500 contributions.

Benefits also found their way to some members of the Rules Committee, which gave the truck weights bill final clearance before sending it to the House. Contributions ranged from $500 to two payments totaling $2,500 for Rep. B. F. Sisk (D., Calif.).

Contributions of $500 were sprinkled liberally through the House Ways and Means Committee. A bill increasing the highway use tax on diesel fuel, which the Administration originally wanted moved along with the truck weights bill, is now stalled in Ways and Means.

Seven of nine members of a House Commerce subcommittee and six other members of the full committee received contributions of from $500 to $2,000. The subcommittee and then the full committee approved early in July a bill, now law, which amended a 1935 statute permitting farm cooperatives to earn up to 50 per cent of their income by carrying commercial freight on return trips from delivering farm products. The new measure limits that outside income to 15 per cent of total tonnage and strikes hardest at co-ops which have been hauling for the Defense Department at reduced rates. The Budget Bureau opposed the bill.

In the Senate, Howard H. Baker, Jr. (R., Tenn.) and J. Caleb Boggs (R., Del.) of the Public Works Committee each received $1,000. Sens. Alan Bible (D., Nev.) and Peter H. Dominick (R., Colo.), Senate sponsors of the truck weights bill, also received $1,000 apiece. Senate Republican leader Everett M. Dirksen (Ill.) received $2,000. He is a member of the Senate Finance Committee, which has jurisdiction over the legislation of fuel taxes.

Sen. A. S. Mike Monroney (D., Okla.), who sits on the Commerce Committee and the Appropriations subcommittee on Public Works, both bodies being of interest to the trucking industry, was given $2,375—the largest single contribution listed by the truckers.

The Truck Operators' Non Partisan Committee, the campaign financing unit of the ATA, listed campaign contributions of $83,000 over the last two years, almost all of it funneled to Congressmen strategically placed to push trucking legislation. The extent to which the truckers have contributed to state campaign organizations outside the jurisdiction of Congress is of course anybody's guess. (Neal Roach, trucking lobbyist, helped manage the July 31, $500-a-plate dinner for Vice President Humphrey, which reportedly raised more than $1 million for the Vice President's political campaign. Roach's helpfulness on this occasion may to some degree explain the Administration's reluctance to oppose certain trucking legislation.)

With the record of the truckers' Congressional contributions thus spread before the public, Schwengel turned to the House Ethics Committee. "These official records," Schwengel said in a letter to Price, "show a pattern of contributions directed by the trucking industry to influence committee members concerned with trucking legislation. . . .

"The intent of this pattern of giving was clearly stated by the [truckers'] campaign committee treasurer Frank Grimm who said: 'We do what we can for those on the committees who might help us.'"

Taking care not to offend too many of his colleagues, Schwengel added that he was not implying that any Congressman "was actually unduly influenced" by a trucking campaign contribution, but that every member of Congress involved should be given a chance to disavow publicly "the intent stated by the truck lobby."

Price's reaction was to emphasize Schwengel's denying any suspicion of "undue influence." Since Schwengel hadn't made charges against any Congressman, Price blandly explained to me, the Ethics Committee has no case to consider, just correspondence. Schwengel's letter, he continued, will be considered along with other correspondence when the committee meets this month.

It is not particularly surprising that Price has only modest ambitions for his committee (it hasn't taken a case since it was created in 1967, following the Adam Clayton Powell hearings). A dependable, hard-working, twelve-term Congressman from East St. Louis, Ill., Price was chosen by the Democratic leaders when they reluctantly decided that the Powell furor made an Ethics Committee essential. Price could be counted on to run a committee the House could live with.

Schwengel hopes to create enough continuing noise to hold up the truck weights bill, and the campaign disclosures improve his chances. Meanwhile, the incidents to date have left a persistent odor. A Louis Harris poll earlier this year reported that public confidence in Congress had reached its lowest ebb in five years. The zeal of certain Congressmen on behalf of the trucking lobby will do nothing to improve that point of view.

THE COLLEGES ARE PULLING OUT

GABRIEL KOLKO

Mr. Kolko is the author of The Triumph of Conservatism (Random House) and The Roots of American Foreign Policy (Beacon Press). His Politics of War is scheduled for early publication by Random House. Mr. Kolko is professor of history at the State University of New York, Buffalo.

The past academic year was the most crisis-ridden and violent in the history of the American university, and on a substantial and growing number of campuses 1968-69 will be no different. Indeed, this year will probably be the last opportunity for many universities to avoid the continuous turmoil that surely will overtake the major schools which refuse to make the adjustments to new student-faculty moods that will ultimately upset administrators' complacency to the core. For the sustained crisis of the war in Vietnam has effected an irreversible shift from concern with structure and alienation inside the university to the much more corrosive issue of the relationship of academia to society itself. It is the transition from Berkeley, now a rather placid school, to Penn, Wisconsin and Columbia. [For the development of this shift, see Mr. Kolko's "Universities and the Pentagon," The Nation, October 9, 1967, and "The War on Campus: Untangling the Alliances," The Nation, December 18, 1967.]

The radicalizing process of the past year contains, too, the fact that the most committed anti-war constituency among students and faculty increasingly recognizes the impotence of past demonstrations, petitions and political campaigns to alter Washington's course on Vietnam. And it is no less important that frequent recent successes in opposing Pentagon-university ties have encouraged university activists everywhere. No other anti-war activity has had such large and practical results, or caused the Pentagon frankly to admit, as John S. Foster, Jr., director of Defense research, acknowledged to Congress last March, that the military had a substantial and growing problem on their hands.

The more public manifestations of student-faculty resistance to military research and recruiting on campus—sit-ins and battles with police being the most dramatic—were followed by quiet attempts on many campuses to head off future turmoil by withdrawing from classified and military research. It became increasingly obvious to many administrators, though by no means to a majority, that the practical disruptive consequences of working for the Pentagon far outweighed the monetary gains. Given the government's vague draft-exemption policy on graduate students, which threatens chaos for university planners, and the reduction of federal funds for education and non-military research, to pay for the war, university executives have permitted themselves unprecedented open criticism of at least a few of the more minor consequences of the war.

By the end of 1967, Washington had taken several important defensive steps that failed to stem the persistent disintegration in their university-based research system. The Pentagon's November assertion that it would no longer give classified contracts for "basic" research impressed few, for the Defense Department failed to alter its existing secret contracts and later hinted that it would merely change the term "basic" to "exploratory development" and pursue its old policy of secrecy. The Foreign Area Research Coordination Group (FAR), coordinating body for the CIA, Pentagon, State Department and other agencies offering contracts in foreign-area social science research, released new guidelines on December 19 to head off abrupt ruptures with various academic researchers and to add a gloss of respectability to its functions.

But the new FAR policy left unclear whether its more benign members would, in effect, front for CIA and Defense contracts that the university might otherwise reject: "... no assurances can be given that it [research] will in fact be used or that other uses will not also be made of it, by either the supporting agency or others." The policy played down review of all research for possible classification, and security clearances for all participating scholars, but the rules remained in effect.

At the beginning of this year it was apparent that the government was exploring still other means for patching up rapidly declining relations with the academic community. Sen. Fred Harris of Oklahoma submitted a bill to create a National Foundation for the Social Sciences, which members of the Senate freely admitted would take over various CIA contracting activities, and a reorganization bill permitted the National Science Foundation to take on social science projects which neither the CIA nor the Pentagon could easily place. Vice President Humphrey, speaking to a House Science subcommittee last January, blustered that "if the university wants to exclude itself from the life of the nation . . . the government can set up its own laboratories . . ." but that very month Science reported that many laboratories were freezing and downgrading their participation in the seventy-five federal research labs, and that at least one had broken off all ties, causing a "crisis" in the program of the laboratory involved.

Humphrey's contrived optimism scarcely impressed knowledgeable observers, including those in the Pentagon, who saw only more trouble ahead. During January, Cornell's trustees voted, under faculty-student pressure, to sever ties to its Aeronautics Lab, which does more than two-thirds of its $30 million in annual contract research for the Pentagon. This June, Cornell moved to sell the laboratory; it will probably be taken over by a private firm—a step that lab executives claim will lose it $12 million a year in contracts and seriously diminish its effectiveness.

At the University of Michigan, one of the key military research centers, various faculty bodies approved a resolution which, if rigorously applied, could drastically reduce classified research there. Though rather vague on the standards it would apply to assure the contributions to knowledge required of all contracts, the Michigan policy contains a unique clause that rejects all secret research whose purpose is "to destroy human life or to incapacitate human beings." This proviso has attracted much attention because of its obvious conflict with Pentagon research goals.

At the beginning of February, 433 leading French and Japanese scientists, including three Nobel Prize winners, publicly urged their American colleagues to refuse their personal or university participation in military research and to maintain "ethical and professional responsibilities" essential to an international community of scholars. This much discussed manifesto was well timed to reinforce the private misgivings of many traditionally conservative academics; several weeks later, George B. Kistiakowsky of Harvard, a major Pentagon science adviser for years, publicly broke all connection with the Defense Department. "There is a deep undercurrent of dissent within the scientific community," one Pentagon science expert admitted in response to the national attention Kistiakowsky received. Many of the best scientists, on whom the government could once freely call, were now unavailable, and there was emerging a crisis of individual conscience potentially of great importance to Pentagon research. Almost everyone admitted that the war in Vietnam was the cause of this growing alienation.

By last spring, when many universities, including even Berkeley and M.I.T., were already quietly, if too cautiously, seeking ways to reduce secret military research, the Institute for Defense Analysis became a national cause célèbre as a result of the SDS campaign against it at Columbia. IDA's connection with its twelve university affiliates has for years been a legal fiction, useful mainly for recruiting staff—a function which the final rupture with the universities will hardly affect. By March both Princeton and Chicago had formally prepared the way for such a break, and Chicago has since severed its ties, much to IDA's irritation. To prevent new defections, IDA reorganized itself in early June to reduce still further its nominal university ties. This divorce would have come even without the Columbia student crisis, but that unquestionably speeded its resolution.

But only Princeton, of the twelve former members, actually aids the IDA with physical plant—and could thus impede its work—and it is ironic that Columbia's main support to the Pentagon, its $4.8 million a year Hudson Laboratory, initially played almost no part in the student protest. However, Columbia's faculty-administration committee on external relations has already proposed to stop much, if not all, secret military research actually conducted under university auspices, and it is here that future faculty-student pressure is likely to prove most significant and create the basis for a unified and broader opposition to the stand-pat strategy employed at Columbia under President Grayson Kirk, now retiring.

Quite aside from the fact that Washington's priorities in Vietnam have begun to dry up scarce funds for education and legitimate research, it is now apparent to a growing number of university administrators that their complicity in the Vietnamese War—or future wars like it—can plunge their campuses into internal crises from which they may never fully recover. This was the lesson of the Penn experience. Columbia's continuing travail has deepened the point, and almost certain protests during the forthcoming year are likely to make the impression indelible on the minds of even the most conservative academic executives. If, contrary to occasional student fancies, the university is not the fulcrum whereby one overthrows society, the least that can be said is that it is the place from which one alters the university's own relationship to the military—and therefore the point from which anti-war efforts can have the most direct impact on the Pentagon's otherwise elusive power.

A deep university-military rupture has profound long-term implications for the course of the arms race and the manner, and places, in which the military applies its new technology. Military officials admitted to the House Appropriations Committee last March that research on most of the complex new weapons systems introduced in Vietnam had been initiated five to seven years ago essentially to fight a limited war in Europe. Similarly, the next stage in the U.S. arms race and research will concentrate primarily on a new aspect of warfare involving guerrillas and revolutionary masses rather than nuclear strategies. Moreover, future wars of this nature can occur in environments from the tropics to the Andes and each requiring its appropriate weaponry. Having finally assimilated the fact that it is going to face peasants rather than Russians, the Pentagon finds itself in serious need of research assistance and planning of the type in which only academics excel. In addition to conventional science, the enlistment of much larger numbers of social scientists and "behavioralists"—who, it is hoped, will be better able than the military to predict and manage the infinitely complex global political realities—will certainly become very important to the Department of Defense.

The Pentagon has been entirely frank about these needs and plans. It has indicated that its allocations for behavioral and social science research, the largest part of which goes to university centers, will increase from $34 million in fiscal 1966 to $51 million in 1969, and that it will also draw on the foreign area research authorized by the many other governmental agencies in FAR. And while John Foster at the Pentagon regrets that such research debilitates the life of universities accepting it, he also made it plain to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations last May "that it is the responsibility of the Department of Defense to have initiated those researches. . . ."

The Pentagon's determination to gain access to university social science began in 1967, when a National Academy of Sciences panel confidentially recommended that the Defense Department make a much more intensive and subtle commitment in this field. "Improving our research image," as the NAS report phrased it, requires calling "counterinsurgency" by a more polite name, and it means, as well, minimum use of secret research. Such tact on the part of the Pentagon was inevitable, if belated. It decided that declassification of as many contracts as possible, however military their value, would head off trouble by dulling academic consciences. What the Defense Department must fear most is the adoption by universities of standards which judge contracts by their intent, objectives and appropriateness to disinterested scholarship and humane values, rather than by whether or not they are classified. By such standards the Pentagon would lose all access to university talents.

The new academic year will probably see a continued diminution of university complicity with the Pentagon and the war. If this year is anything like the last, then perhaps the anti-war movement will secure a major and permanent achievement—perhaps its only one to date. The significance of that attainable goal may be less apparent in the current war than on occasions of future threats to other remote regions where the United States seeks to apply its power. For if the anti-war consciousness came too late to the campus to spare Vietnam from university-assisted terror and intrigue, in the next half-decade many more academics may be able to console themselves with the knowledge that they were neither silent nor ineffective during the years of America's torture of nations.

TALENT WITHOUT MONEY

DIXIE'S NEGRO CANDIDATES

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

If Northern white liberals wonder why Negroes have become somewhat disenchanted with their old allies, they can find at least one explanation in some of the recent political campaigns run by blacks in the South. In the first half of this decade, Northern well-wishers pumped many thousands of dollars—it would, in fact, probably total several million dollars—into the Negroes' efforts to break into the political process of Dixie. While that effort could hardly be termed a tremendous success even today, still, about 3 million Negroes are registered to vote in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and the Carolinas.

But recently when the Negroes, not exactly thrilled by the thought of giving their new votes to the same old white racist politicians, came up with some candidates of their own, they discovered that most Northerners with money were apparently no longer interested in helping them. And of course they cannot hope for effective financial support from either race in the South.

It wouldn't matter so much if the black candidates were ex-cotton choppers with no qualification for leadership, but in fact many of the Negroes running in major races in the South this year have been outstanding men—witty, clever advocates with a flair for the kind of publicity that Southerners love so much in their political fights—and virtually all of them pushing the kind of alternative programs for reform that the region has not heard in recent years.

Probably the most exciting black-white fight this year has been that waged between Maynard H. Jackson, Jr., 30-year-old Atlanta attorney, and U.S. Senator Herman Talmadge, one of the most recalcitrant racists produced by Dixie in this generation. Talmadge tried at first to hoot Jackson out of the race, saying, with an unusual show of candor, that he couldn't take any opponent seriously who was unable to raise at least a million-dollar campaign fund. And Talmadge, who taps most of the big purses in Georgia, knew Jackson could never do that.

But within a month after saying he didn't take Jackson seriously, Talmadge went back on television to deny sourly that he had ever said such a thing. Reporters found that the Senator had become touchy, snappish, quarrelsome, and they began to speculate that he was running scared. Not that Jackson—what with the poverty of his campaign treasury and the inexperience of his campaign staff—has much chance to win in the September 11 primary. But he is very likely to run strong enough to show the vulnerability of the Talmadge machine, which has not been seriously challenged in twenty years. Roy Harris, the old Georgia political kingmaker and president of the arch-segregationist Citizens Councils of America, was the man who transformed the playboy son of the legendary Gene Talmadge into the governor of Georgia two decades ago. He is too much of a professional not to enjoy the discomfort of the hollow man he helped create. "Ol' Hummon, he's in an unhappy situation," Harris said the other day, laughing. "A dignified United States Senator from the South can't recognize the existence of a nigger candidate, you know. Or at least he can't do it easily. And Jackson is likely to win as many votes as Arnall" (Ellis Arnall, the ex-governor, was defeated by Lester Maddox for the Democratic nomination in 1966, but he polled 360,000 votes in losing). Charles Pou, political editor of the Atlanta Journal, sees Jackson taking 80 per cent of the Negro turn-out (334,000 Negroes are registered in Georgia) and enough of the white vote (1.45 million registered), especially in the Atlanta area, to make Jackson's chances of victory at least worth discussing. Pou seldom guesses wrong.

As Negro families go in the South, Jackson's is well known; he is a grandson of John Wesley Dobbs, once a formidable name in black circles. He is young and aggressive, and he's raising issues that make him easily distinguished from Talmadge in other than skin coloration; he is against the war in Vietnam, is for repeal of anti-labor legislation such as section 14b of the Taft-Hartley Law, and is eager to bring federal anti-poverty money to Georgia.

And many of Georgia's opinion shapers, bless their hearts, have welcomed this challenge to the Talmadge suzerainty. The Atlanta newspapers are giving Jackson generous and sympathetic space. (During the governorship of Carl Sanders, when Talmadge thought Georgia was becoming more moderate, he became more moderate; but since 1964, when Georgia went Republican for the first time, he has switched back to his normal right-wing stance, and the Atlanta newspapers have lost much of their previous pro-Talmadge patience.) A typical comment is that published by Reese Cleghorn, an associate editor of the Atlanta Journal: Jackson's effort "is a campaign that may do this state more good than anything that has come along in state-level politics for a long time." And Ralph McGill predicted in his front-page Constitution column that Jackson could look not only to anti-Talmadge liberals for support but also to many small Georgia farmers who feel that Talmadge has sold them out for the financial benefit of the big farmers.

The one thing that cancels out all his good breaks is that Jackson lacks money. Lester Maddox is believed to have won the Democratic nomination for governor with an expenditure of only $40,000—which makes him a freak in just one more way. Most men would require at least ten times as much to run a good state-wide race, and a black man would require at least twenty times that sum. Jackson's office says he may be able to raise $100,000 by the end of the campaign, but they aren't sure. Very little of it is coming from the North. Jackson placed a small advertisement in The New York Times, soliciting financial support, but received back only about enough to pay for the ad itself.

Earlier this year, in South Carolina, another very promising Negro attorney-politician was easily defeated in his effort to unseat Mendel Rivers, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. There are many differences between Rivers and his challenger, George A. Payton, Jr., 39, of Charleston. For one thing Payton is a teetotaler while Rivers, according to the frequently repeated writings of Drew Pearson, is "the House drunk." But more important, Rivers is perhaps Congress' most vociferous advocate of an enlarged war-making machine; Payton is for cutting back on the Pentagon budget. Over the years Rivers has established so many military installations in his district that the federal payroll there now totals $300 million a year. Payton suggests that his Congressional district should start diversifying into peaceful industries now, rather than risk a postwar cutback and recession.

Not only was Payton bucking tradition in opposing Rivers he was also bucking the standard Negro leadership and the labor establishment; both have played along with Rivers for years because it profits them—or they think it profits them—to do so. The racial balance of the registered voters in the district is still heavily on the side of any white candidate, but not so much so that Payton, if he had received some campaign funds, could not have seriously pressed the old white-haired political hack. But of the $4,000 he spent on his race, only about $100 was sent in from Northern sympathizers.

Even so, the Rivers forces panicked at the opposition. When Payton's campaign looked spirited, Republicans who were planning on a primary of their own canceled it so that they could vote for Rivers.

A five-minute ad on television was the longest Payton could afford; he had a few thirty-second spots; altogether he spent about $800 on TV and nothing on newspaper advertising—not the sort of campaign, that is, to unseat a Congressman who has streets and schools named after him in Charleston. "If I had had even $10,000," said Payton later, "I could have given Rivers a heart attack. I wanted to run ads in the papers showing the kind of things he had voted for and against, the number of times he was absent. But I had nothing, absolutely nothing, in the newspapers. And I would have had to have ads because the papers blacked me out otherwise. There are nine counties in this district. If I had had between $60,000 to $90,000 for the campaign, which is about what Rivers spent, I could even make these people forget I was a Negro." Whether or not that is an overly optimistic view, it is a fact that for a while Payton had South Carolina politicians so upset that the legislature proposed a law that would have given Rivers a place on the ballot in November even if Payton knocked him off in the primary; this bill was set aside when Payton threatened to take the legislation to federal court.

In North Carolina, Dr. Reginald Hawkins, a dentist and United Presbyterian minister, made his race for the governorship on a nothing budget of $36,000, very little of which, he said, came from outside the state. "Generally, the white money from the North dried up back when they found they couldn't run our lives," he commented. "If I had had $150,000, I could at least have run a strong second. We didn't have any television time to speak of. For getting Negroes to turn out, we had something even better than television—I called it 'telenegro.' But if we had had TV money we could have reached the poor whites, and I would have got a lot of their votes. I was the only candidate espousing the labor position, the small farmer's position. But labor, because it is racist, did not endorse me or give me money. Much of the press—especially in Charlotte—defamed me. And I figure election officials stole at least 80,000 of my votes; in the eastern section of the state they wouldn't allow my poll watchers to come in."

Defeat has apparently stung Hawkins past the point of accuracy. While the North Carolina State AFL-CIO voted only 55 per cent to give him an endorsement (short of two-thirds vote necessary to make the endorsement official), COPE immediately set up a Labor's Committee for Hawkins, headed by Jim Pierce of the Industrial Union Department, and this outfit went to work with devotion. As for the press, Hawkins had plenty of reason to complain, yet there was fair play, too, as in the Greensboro Daily News when associate editor Edwin M. Yoder wrote a long editorial recognition of Hawkins' qualities: "It requires no more than an hour's direct exposure to Dr. Reginald Hawkins, Charlotte dentist and first Negro candidate for governor, to sense that his impact this year could easily be underestimated. Dr. Hawkins is a witty, warm, blunt and passionate man with an ingratiating style of humor. Dr. Hawkins' campaign has opened under a cloud that arises, at least in part, from his willingness to risk professional standing in behalf of race—he is no black bourgeois. The more Dr. Hawkins talks about Carolina's low per capita income, its rock-bottom industrial wage, its lack of Negro—and poor white—influence in citadels of power, its distinct hostility to labor organization, its use of sales rather than luxury taxes, the more the blandness of other candidates may strike the voters."

A Negro candidate has no cause to complain when he can receive that sort of treatment in a major regional newspaper. Each of the three candidates mentioned here were, one way or another, taken seriously by their white neighbors. But Southern whites will not continue to take them seriously if it becomes apparent that without money a Negro candidate can get nowhere. And when the intelligent Negroes of the South once again find themselves dismissed as irrelevant, the bitterness and the move toward separatism will become even more pronounced. It is clear that the moneyed Northern liberal withdrew his purse from the Southern movement much too soon.

GENEVA IN ECLIPSE

MEDICINE AS A WEAPON

L. J. RATHER

Dr. Rather is a professor of pathology at Stanford University. During World War II he was for two years a flight surgeon in the Southwest Pacific; later, he was for five years a consultant to the Surgeon General's office. His most recent book is Mind and Body in Eighteenth Century Medicine (Berkeley).

When it is complained that the laws of warfare have been violated by U.S. military personnel in Vietnam with respect to the treatment of enemy wounded and captured, the customary answer is that such violations, where they occur, are contrary to U.S. Army policy. This reply was in fact valid until recently, when the Army began to countenance directives in its field manuals that plainly conflict with the Geneva and Hague agreements on which the laws of war are based. The Army's rewriting of the rules began in connection with guerrilla warfare and the Special Forces (the "Green Berets"), but now there are signs that all U.S. military forces may be involved. After a hundred years Geneva may be moving into eclipse. To see what is being lost a brief history of the Geneva movement is necessary.

A little more than a hundred years ago allied French and Italian armies faced the Austrians at Solferino in northern Italy. The battle began on the morning of June 24, 1859. When the defeated Austrians withdrew in the afternoon, nearly 42,000 killed and wounded men from both sides lay on the battlefield. Captured medical officers were not allowed to treat their own wounded. There was no provision for neutrality of military medical personnel working in the field, and experience in the past had shown that civilians who attempted to aid the wounded might be subject to attack from either side. The grossly inadequate medical services of the victorious French and Italian armies did make an attempt to care for the wounded of both belligerents on the field at Solferino, but within two days were required to move forward with the advancing allied troops.

A Swiss tourist, Jean Henry Dunant of Geneva, reached Solferino on June 25. With some other civilians he did what he could to alleviate the frightful suffering of the wounded soldiers left behind. While at this work, Dunant conceived his two great contributions: he saw the need for guaranteeing the neutrality of medical personnel and for establishing a civilian organization to supplement and oversee the treatment by belligerents of the killed, wounded and captured. This was the genesis of the Geneva and Hague Conventions on the one hand, and of the International Red Cross on the other.

The first Geneva Convention of 1864 was quickly signed by all European powers, but it was not until 1882 that President Arthur signed for the United States. Since then the United States has signed several revisions of the original agreement, most recently in 1929 and 1949.

In full accord with the Geneva rules for the treatment of prisoners of war, Section III, para. 8 of the U.S. Army TM 8-220, March 5, 1941 (Medical Department Soldier's Handbook) states: "Officers, soldiers and other persons officially attached to armies, who are sick and wounded, will be cared for, without distinction of nationality, by the belligerent in whose power they are." Paragraph II of the same manual states: "Medical troops, installations and equipment are to be protected so long as they are not used to commit acts injurious to the enemy." And in Section V, para. 675 of FM 8-10, March 28, 1942 (Medical Service of Field Units) the directive is: "Prisoners of war are disposed of the same as any other patients." It is unfortunate that an escape clause (uncomfortably reminiscent of the rule changes that appear at intervals on the wall of farmer Jones's barn in Orwell's Animal Farm) turns up on page 33 of FM 8-15, November 1961: "Sick and injured prisoners of war are treated and evacuated in normal medical channels insofar as is possible" (my italics).

Captain Howard Levy first called attention to the role of Special Forces in guerrilla warfare, and he is paying with a jail sentence for presuming to take ethical matters seriously. There is no doubt that he had grounds for doing so. FM 31-21, Special Forces Operations, spells the matter out quite clearly, defining counterinsurgency as "military, paramilitary, political, economic, psychological and civic actions taken by, or in conjunction with, a government to prevent or defeat subversive insurgency." And included among the various kinds of "military civic action" is medical assistance. In this new concept of warfare medical care is a weapon. Yet the whole intent of the movement started by Dunant a hundred years ago was to separate medical care from military operations, to make medical personnel and equipment neutral.

But, the reader may say, these Army directives apply only in counterinsurgency actions and to a special variety of troops. Morally, that would be a quibble, but it is not even true. A wider scope has been proposed in an article appearing in the May, 1968, issue of the professional journal, Military Medicine. The article bears an innocuous title, "Medical Considerations in Internal Defense and Development," and is the work of the former Surgeon, J.F.K. Center for Special Warfare, Fort Bragg, N.C. The term counterinsurgency, we learn from this article, is now out of favor; "Internal Defense and Development" (ID/D) is preferred. The Special Forces having shown themselves "outstandingly useful and capable" in ID/D, their experience "may be useful to all medical units." For now "all (my italics) United States military forces must be prepared to engage in Internal Defense and Development." Indeed, there is much evidence that American military planners now see counterinsurgency as the warfare of the future. Medicine, says the author, "has proved to be an exceptionally useful instrument of national policy in ID/D operations." Medicine will help win for the legal government the "hearts and minds of the people."

What of care of the wounded? The "fallen American will receive all necessary care in the best hospitals available," the "wounded indigenous military will receive the best treatment possible within his military medical structure," while for the "wounded indigenous paramilitary soldier" the situation is admittedly "not so promising." Nothing is said here of wounded indigenous military and paramilitary soldiers of the opposing forces (let alone of whoever might turn out in some contingency to be the counterpart of the "fallen American"—the fallen Russian, the fallen Chinese, the fallen Pole?). The author is not entirely silent on the subject, for "another important facet of medicine in ID/D involves the denial of medical resources to the insurgents." In the context of the article this statement, shocking at first sight, seems to mean only that strict control over medical supplies and equipment is necessary in order that they do not reach the black market or the guerrilla underground. More disquieting is the statement that "much valuable intelligence can be gathered from a local medical system," since patients "under treatment are frequently very cooperative in revealing information about the guerrilla force." The commander should therefore "ensure that his medic is advised by intelligence experts." It is indeed easy to imagine how cooperation might be exacted from a patient under or about to receive medical treatment, but a more profound and far-reaching violation of medical ethics is difficult to conceive.

In the immediate past a man (whether physician or layman) chosen for military service in a war that he could not in conscience support, even a man who opposed all wars, might in good conscience accept substitute service in a medical unit of the U.S. Army with the assurance that he would have noncombatant status and could be equally devoted to the welfare of the wounded on both sides, to the extent that he came in contact with them. Where is that assurance now? Largely because of that assurance the general public has in the past been especially unsympathetic toward physicians who refused to serve in the armed forces. (Witness the recent response in newspapers to the large number of medical students at Stanford who announced their unwillingness to serve in the army in Vietnam. The students were, perhaps predictably, castigated by the local branches of the American Medical Association.) But where is the assurance now? Neither the general public nor physicians have been adequately informed of recent developments in army combat theory, whereby medicine is in the process of being transformed into just another tool of warfare.

The Hippocratic oath in its most recent form (that of the Organization Mondiale de la Santé, Geneva, September 10, 1948) contains some pertinent, although very broadly stated provisions. Perhaps remembering those German physicians of the Third Reich who blindly followed the orders of a criminal government, they enjoin the physician to consider the health of his patient his first care, to use his medical knowledge on no occasion, even under threat, against the laws of humanity, and to permit no consideration of religion, nation, race, party or social class to be interposed between him and his patient. The duty of the American Medical Association is to rule on ethical matters. We may hope that the attention of one of its committees will in the near future be directed toward the problem posed by the activities of the U.S. Army.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Chomsky's Revolution in Linguistics

ROBERT SKLAR

Mr. Sklar is the author of F. Scott Fitzgerald: The Last Laocöon (Oxford). He teaches at the University of Michigan.

Noam Chomsky, as a linguist and as a radical, lives in two worlds which are hardly aware of each other. To radicals he is the author of a formative essay on "The Responsibility of Intellectuals," Norman Mailer's cell mate after his arrest at last October's march on the Pentagon, a leading adult supporter of draft resistance; to linguists he is the controversial creator of a revolution in the study of language, a scientific revolution whose impact has already been felt not only in linguistics but in such other scholarly fields as psychology, biology, philosophy, English literature and education. If this essay on Chomsky's revolution in linguistics slights his current political views, it is only because they are more readily available and require no simplifying explanations. What matters is that Chomsky himself lives not in two worlds but in one. Chomsky's politics and his linguistics have always been more closely integrated than his colleagues in either field have ever suspected; and if the linguistics revolution succeeds, it cannot fail to have its impact on politics as well.

Chomsky's revolution in linguistics began more than a decade ago, at a time when scientists in all fields believed that science advances in a progressive way, through breakthroughs and new discoveries, by the patient or fortunate tracking down of an elusive answer to a tough old problem. It is only since Thomas S. Kuhn's influential and widely debated book The Structure of Scientific Revolutions appeared in 1962 that scientists have considered the possibility that scientific change takes place in a revolutionary way, by a struggle between the familiar mode of conducting a particular scientific field and a totally new one, with the new ultimately winning out and taking over the field. What has happened in linguistics since Chomsky appeared on the scene almost perfectly fits Kuhn's description of how a scientific revolution works.

A scientific revolution, as Kuhn describes it, differs from a political revolution chiefly in that the losers survive—often they go on with their work as if nothing had happened at all. Most scientific work, according to Kuhn, operates under the rules of what he calls normal science. All the researchers in a field operate on the basis of a shared paradigm, which Kuhn defines as something more than a theory and less than a world view. The paradigm provides a set of rules, defining the boundaries of a field and determining the questions a scientist can properly ask.

Given the nature of science, however, the time comes when new techniques, or simply an accumulation of data, begin to create difficulties for the reigning paradigm. Researchers are confronted with anomalies in their work which would not be there if their field were functioning normally, and the science enters a period of crisis. A successful revolution is not always inevitable at this point, but if it comes, according to Kuhn, it will be led by a young scientist, or an outsider new to the field, who asks new questions and produces a new theory, around which a new paradigm can form. The new and old paradigms compete against each other for adherents, but the new paradigm is fated to win, because it provides possibilities for normal scientific research that the anomaly-ridden old paradigm no longer can. How long the struggle may take is another matter. When Darwin published his Origin of Species, he remarked that he did not expect to convince those naturalists "whose minds are stocked with a multitude of facts all viewed, during a long course of years, from a point of view directly opposite to mine," but he expected to win the young and rising generation over.

Chomsky did not begin his linguistic career as a revolutionary but as a young scholar forced to rethink the fundamental questions of his field because the familiar answers were raising more problems than solutions. It had been more than fifty years since any linguist had been driven back to the beginning, "to ask, in effect, 'What is language?'" Before Chomsky the last linguist to ask the basic question so simply and directly was the Genevan, Ferdinand de Saussure, who published a book on language in 1878, when he was 21, and published nothing thereafter during a lifetime of teaching and research. After Saussure died in 1913, several of his students pooled their notes of his lectures and published them in 1916 as Saussure's Cours de linguistique générale, the book which founded modern linguistics.

Saussure defined language as a relationship between a person's thoughts and the sound his voice makes. Thought he called the signified and sound the signifier, and they were linked by something called the linguistic sign. The way to study language, Saussure said, was to study linguistic signs, not in a historical or comparative way but in a single language at a single moment in time. To assist this study Saussure made a distinction between langue and parole, between language and utterance. He held that the ideas, concepts and images of a particular language culture at a particular time could be totaled up and would comprise the language, out of which, in relation to utterance, the linguistic sign could be found.

In the United States modern structural linguistics began as a tool of anthropology, but it attained its independence under the leadership of Leonard Bloomfield, a scholar of German philology at the University of Chicago, whose textbook, Language, published in 1933, is regarded as the founding and classic work of the American school of descriptive linguistics. "There can be no doubt," according to a historian of the field, "that Bloomfield's greatest contribution to the study of language was to make a science of it."

Bloomfield argued that the sound patterns of a language change in a systematic way, and that the road to discovering those changes lay through a rigorous establishment of procedures. To get at the right procedures you had to begin by excluding all non-linguistic criteria. Bloomfield called himself a mechanist, and in his view anything having to do with the mind, thought or mental activity in any form, was not a proper subject for linguistics. In Saussure's terms, the American descriptive linguists studied only utterance, and did not concern themselves with language at all. American descriptive or structural linguistics was nevertheless a growing, confident and influential scientific field until Chomsky began to overthrow it more than a decade ago; and the basic disagreement between the old linguistic paradigm and Chomsky's new one, laying aside all technical matters, lies in their absolute conflict over the nature and relevance of the mind. Descriptive linguistics defines language as "speech sounds which people utter under particular stimuli." Chomsky describes language as an instrument for the free expression of thought and response to new situations.

In our daily lives, Chomsky points out, we are constantly uttering sentences we have never spoken before, and understanding sentences we have never heard before. In other words, our normal everyday use of words is creative. The descriptive school of linguistic scholarship tried to explain the undoubted fact that we make and understand new sentences all the time by various behavioral or mechanistic theories—that in childhood we are trained to respond to certain stimuli or that we acquire certain habits of language use, or that we create new sentences by analogy from old ones. None of these explanations, Chomsky insists, will serve. The only possible source for the creative aspect of language use lies in the innate competence of the human mind.

If it is possible to describe our daily, commonplace uses of language as creative in this sense, what does it mean to say that it stems from an innate competence of the human mind? It assumes, for one thing, that we are capable of forming thoughts and feelings and expressing them through our language. But it does not assume that the way we express a thought or feeling is going to be a complete and accurate rendering of it. The process that creates thought from abstract mental structures is one thing, the process that transforms thought into spoken language is wholly another. The study of language must necessarily be mentalistic, Chomsky insists, or else it will limit itself only to the outer form of language, the small deceptive part that sticks out like the surface of an iceberg. Beneath that, Chomsky says, is a deep structure of infinitely greater complexity and importance.

The notion that language has both surface and deep structures was used in linguistics before Chomsky—by Saussure with his distinction between language and utterance, and even more explicitly by Wittgenstein. But for Chomsky, unlike his predecessors, this dual structure of language provides the key to even more basic questions about the nature of mind. "My own view," Chomsky has written, "is that what is common to all languages is a certain schematism, a set of abstract formal conditions of a highly restrictive sort that sets strict limits on the choice of deep structures, surface structures, the transformational rules that interrelate them, the phonetic and semantic rules that interpret them." What is most exciting to Chomsky and his associates is not the incredible variety and incompatibility of surface language use but rather the underlying unity of language form. "The general features of grammatical structure," he writes, "are common to all languages and reflect certain fundamental properties of mind There are, then, certain language

Books by Noam Chomsky

ASPECTS OF THE THEORY OF SYNTAX. MIT Press. $7.50 (1965).

CARTESIAN LINGUISTICS. Harper & Row. $6 (1966).

CURRENT ISSUES IN LINGUISTIC THEORY. Humanities Press. Paper $3.25 (1964).

SYNTACTIC STRUCTURES. Humanities Press. Paper $2.75 (1957).

TOPICS IN THE THEORY OF GENERATIVE GRAMMAR. Humanities Press. Paper $3.25 (1966).

universals that set limits to the variety of human language." The core of Chomsky's effort in linguistics is to build a theory of how these language universals work.

Chomsky has sometimes referred to language universals as innate or abstract ideas, which has added considerably to the controversy and perhaps also to the confusion surrounding his theories. In technical terms, he defines language universals only as the "highly restrictive conditions that the rules of grammar meet." In Chomsky's theory rules of grammar generate the deep structures of a language, and deep structures are transformed into surface structures when we make spoken sentences out of thoughts and feelings in our minds.

In practice it is not difficult to see how Chomsky's linguistic work differs from that of his predecessors. For the ambiguous phrase "the shooting of the hunters," for example, every linguist would agree that it could have two different semantic interpretations, one based upon a kernel sentence—or a deep structure—with "hunters" as the subject of the verb "shoot" and another with "hunters" as the object. But Chomsky would go further and relate "the shooting of the hunters" as well to underlying abstract structures—the rules of grammar—which generate the two possible semantic interpretations. An example like "sincerity pleases John" might make this more clear. This is a simple sentence with a verb and two nouns, one a subject and one an object. But if one tries to substitute nouns or verbs to make new sentences like "John pleases sincerity" or "sincerity looks John," then it is clear that there are underlying principles—language universals, fundamental properties of mind—which make the first sentence grammatical and the others not. The basic question confronting Chomsky and his co-workers is to specify these principles at each point in the process of language, from rules of grammar through deep structure, surface structure, and finally to the phonetic and semantic interpretations we assign to our words.

Given this kind of theoretical progress, it is perhaps understandable that Chomsky refrained from further complicating an already difficult and hotly debated scholarly issue by pointing out the political and social implications of a theory emphasizing human competence and capacity to use language freely and creatively. In his recent book Cartesian Linguistics, however, talking about Wilhelm von Humboldt, the German statesman and scholar whose work he greatly admires, Chomsky makes clear that Humboldt's emphasis on spontaneous and creative aspects of language use derives from a more general concept of human nature. Thereupon he momentarily let down his guard, and in a long footnote he suggests in a curiously oblique way what the social and political implications of his linguistic theory might be.

After indicating that he approves of the Cartesian picture of human nature, Chomsky relates it to Rousseau's critique of modern society, quoting at length from Rousseau's Discourse on the Origins and Foundations of Inequality among Men. Modern social organization and the national state, Chomsky quotes Rousseau, have destroyed natural freedom, but man can regain his true humanity by "new revolutions [that will] dissolve the government altogether or bring it closer to its legitimate institution . . . the uprising that ends by strangling or de-throning a sultan is as lawful an act as those by which he disposed, the day before, of the lives and goods of his subjects." Chomsky could only have been using Rousseau's phrases to speak his own thoughts. The scientific revolutionary and the political revolutionary, it seemed clear, were one and the same after all.

The roots of Chomsky's scientific revolution in linguistics were laid early in his childhood. Chomsky's father, William, had emigrated from Russia in 1913 to avoid being drafted in the Czarist army, and became a Hebrew scholar at Gratz Teachers College and Dropsie College in Philadelphia, the city where Noam, an elder son, was born on December 7, 1928. During Noam's boyhood his father was writing for publication a 13th-century Hebrew grammar, David Kimhi's Hebrew Grammar, and it was this early acquaintance with medieval Hebrew philology which prepared the foundation for all that followed.

In a recent conversation Chomsky described the background of his career in linguistics. "My father's professional work was medieval Hebrew grammar," he explained, "so at age 10 I was reading proofs on a 13th-century Hebrew grammar. This actually affected a lot of work that I did later, because I came to the field much later, without approaching it through the structuralist position, but rather from a totally informal background in classical philology—just picked up by looking at things here and there. You couldn't even call it a background. I didn't know anything, I just had a feel for historical processes. In fact, though, I've never really been interested in historical linguistics as such, there was one fact about historical linguistics that had been rigidly excluded in structural linguistics that I just took for granted, and I'm very glad I did—that is, an account ought to give explanations, not just descriptions. Historical linguistics was concerned with explaining why such and such a distribution of forms existed at a particular moment, but structural linguistics made a very strict point of not giving explanations. In fact, giving explanations was regarded as some kind of infantile mysticism. Really the only innovation I think I introduced into the field basically was to try to give descriptive explanations—to try to give a theory of the synchronic structure of the language which would actually explain the distribution of phenomena. In my early work, at least, this was very self-consciously modeled on the kinds of explanations that people gave in historical linguistics that I knew about ever since I was a kid. I had no further contact with the field really until college, when I ran into Zellig Harris—the most rigorous practitioner of the linguistic methodology Chomsky was to overthrow.

After graduating from Central High School in Philadelphia, Chomsky started his college career in a desultory way at the University of Pennsylvania. He was more interested in Middle Eastern politics than in academic studies, and he wanted to drop out of college and go to Palestine. In an effort to dissuade him, Chomsky's parents introduced him to Zellig Harris, the linguist, who was then deeply immersed in political activities which seemed to reflect their son's left-wing political views. The two men immediately hit it off well together, and Chomsky decided to stay at Penn and take Harris' courses in linguistics. "He was at that time just finishing up his major work on structural linguistics, the thing that came out as Methods in Structural Linguistics," Chomsky recalled. "In fact, about the first thing I did before I ever took any courses from him was proofread the book for him. That's how I learned linguistics, by proofreading Harris' book—which was fine for me, I really learned the field."

Harris suggested that Chomsky go to work on a grammar of Hebrew. "I worked on it from a point of view which had nothing to do with linguistics whatsoever," Chomsky recalled, "but really had to do with my own background in historical linguistics. I started right off, without even asking any questions, working within the framework of generative grammar, which seemed to be the only conceivable thing, namely, trying to find a system of rules which would enable you to characterize all of the sentence structures in the language. I very quickly discovered that if you wanted to do this properly you had to have a long sequence of ordered rules. I also noticed right off that the logical order corresponded to some extent to the historical order which I knew of. I found that if you gave it the right kind of logical order then you could explain a lot of phenomena which otherwise seemed very inexplicable. I worked on this for a couple of years in really total isolation." Harris apparently never looked at it.

In retrospect, however, Chomsky feels he was fortunate in coming to linguistics by so unorthodox a route. "There is a lesson here for the social sciences," he remarked. "Most people come into the social and behavioral sciences and they're immediately faced with a fixed range of questions and a format of problems that you're supposed to look at, and it's very hard to challenge it, I suppose, because you go through and then you repeat it to your students and the same sort of nonsense gets repeated for fifty years. Finally somebody asks a simple question and the whole field collapses.

"Take this about language being habits. For about one hundred years people were saying language was a habit system and nobody ever questions it. Well, as soon as you ask, 'How can you innovate by habit?' then the whole field collapses and takes some entirely new way. Of course, it doesn't collapse in a minute. People argue for a while. But once one has seen the point of the fact that you cannot innovate by habit then most of linguistics and practically all of modern psychology sort of disappears. Normal human behavior is obviously innovative, and it's not based on analogy or something else."

Chomsky stayed on at Penn after he had completed his undergraduate studies and wrote up his work on Hebrew grammar in a master's thesis, "Morphophonemics of Modern Hebrew," which

How to get rid of Sterilityville

"We are faced with only two alternatives. Either we decide to eliminate the ghettos ourselves. Or they will be eliminated for us. We no longer have the luxury of a third choice."

BEYOND THE BURNING Life and Death of the Ghetto STERLING TUCKER

Coordinator of the Poor People's March on Washington; new National Field Director, National Urban League

The former Director of the militant Washington, D.C., chapter of the National Urban League tells what it's really like for Blacks in "Sterilityville"... shows why only Black Power can kill the ghetto... describes concretely how it can be done. "Blunt spoken... Excellent survey... Fortnight challenge."

—Publishers' Weekly.

$2.50, paper; $4.95, cloth—at bookstores

ASSOCIATION PRESS

291 Broadway
New York 10007

earned him an M.A. in 1951. He had also begun to study philosophy at Penn under Nelson Goodman, and when Chomsky was finishing up his M.A. work Goodman nominated him, successfully, for a junior fellowship in the Society of Fellows at Harvard. Chomsky held a fellowship for four years, from 1951 to 1955, and at the end of that time he received a doctorate in linguistics from Penn.

Chomsky's project for his junior fellowship, curiously, was an effort at improving the techniques of structural linguistics. At Penn he had been working as a student and collaborator with Zellig Harris even while, on his own, he was pursuing the generative approach to Hebrew grammar. "I totally believed in Harris' approach, thought structural linguistics was right, and was trying to work it out," he explained. "The natural thing for me to try to do as a student was to say, 'Okay, here's a diffuse set of techniques'—the techniques, that is, of structural linguistics—'Let's really formalize them and see what their consequences are.' In fact the first article I published was in the Journal of Symbolic Logic. It was an attempt—which I think now completely silly—to overcome some of the inadequacies in the application of those techniques, to really sharpen them up. This was the great mass of work that I was doing for a couple of years after I left Penn. At the same time I was working on the side on this generative grammar approach, but thinking that it must be crazy, and not showing it to anyone." Finally Chomsky came to realize he was getting results through his work on generative grammar, growing out of his earlier work on Hebrew, while his apparently more important effort to improve the techniques of structural linguistics had no visible success at all. "Sometime around 1953 or so I began to think, 'Well, how come this other way is getting results and this is just more and more manipulation, always leading to a blind alley?' As soon as you raise the question it becomes obvious that there's no reason why these step-by-step analytic procedures should ever work."

In his last year at Harvard Chomsky worked feverishly to complete an immense manuscript, over 900 pages long, on the generative approach to grammar, called "The Logical Structure of Linguistic Theory." One chapter of the manuscript, a section on "Transformational Analysis," he submitted to the linguistics department at Penn as his doctoral dissertation. Though he was awarded his Ph.D., at least one of his readers reacted in a way that was soon to be characteristic: "I don't know what field this belongs to, but it certainly isn't linguistics." Over the next year or two Chomsky's dissertation and several articles came back promptly from the linguistics journals and publishers.

In 1957 his first book, Syntactic Structures, was published by Mouton & Co., of The Hague, a little book of less than 120 pages in pale blue paper covers, that had gone through five printings by 1965. Syntactic Structures was not a book Chomsky wrote for publication, since he assumed it was impossible for him to publish in the field, but was rather a compilation of Chomsky's notes for his introductory course in linguistics at M.I.T.

But it had the effect on some structural linguists that Kuhn describes when a new scientific paradigm appears at a time of crisis in the field. One of the leading young structural linguists, Robert Lees, read the book and switched his allegiance to transformational grammar. Lees wrote a long, highly favorable review in the journal Language, and thereupon Syntactic Structures raised a storm in the field of linguistics.

One result of Syntactic Structures, and Lees' review, was an invitation for Chomsky to take part in the next year's Texas Conference on Linguistic Analysis in English. After the Texas conference one of the participants, a professor at UCLA, switched from structural linguistics to transformational generative grammar—another conversion from the old paradigm to the new one, especially significant in the light of Kuhn's model for scientific revolutions, Chomsky, meanwhile, spent the 1958-59 academic year at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, where his work began to attract the attention of young scholars in other fields.

Chomsky had planned for his year at Princeton to revise his 900-page manuscript for publication, and though he got three-quarters of the way through it, eventually he gave it up in favor of a renewed interest in mathematical models in linguistics. His mathematical work resulted in several published papers over the next few years, but more importantly it established Chomsky's credentials as an expert, which have been indispensable for his criticism of the social sciences. "When Chomsky criticizes the application of computers to the social sciences," one scholar has said, "people have to listen, because he's been there and he knows what he's talking about."

At the same time Chomsky began his reading in the history of linguistics, mostly at the suggestion of his M.I.T. colleague, Morris Halle, which was eventually to result in Cartesian Linguistics. It would be interesting to speculate what course Chomsky might have taken had he not made this foray into the past. Very often a discoverer or innovator expends the sum of his intellectual energy on his revolutionary original insight, and thereafter spends the rest of his career repeating himself with minor modifications, while his followers are better able to see the implications of his work and carry it through. The three books Chomsky published between Syntactic Structures and Cartesian Linguistics—Current Issues in Linguistic Theory (1964), Aspects of the Theory of Syntax (1965), and Topics in the Theory of Generative Grammar (1966)—can be seen in this light, as works clarifying his ideas, replying to critics, incorporating revisions in the theory, and so on. But by his work in the history of linguistics Chomsky has been able to widen the boundaries of his basic original insights and relate them not only to the history of his own field but also to the history of movements of ideas in modern times.

Although Chomsky had referred to historical figures like Wilhelm von Humboldt in several of his works of the early sixties, it was not until 1964-65, when he passed a sabbatical year at Harvard's Center for Cognitive Studies, that he immersed himself in the history of linguistics and made the connections, overtly, with the nature of mind, and covertly, with the nature of politics, that appear in Cartesian Linguistics. He saw more clearly than ever that his disagreement with the structural linguists was part of a larger question having to do with the methodology of philosophy, psychology

Why Do You Read So Slowly?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success, and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, many people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More" mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 533-510, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

and the social sciences as well. The dominant trends for half a century in those fields have been empiricist in nature, holding that human knowledge is derived purely from experience—hence the view of structural linguists and behavioral psychologists that the creative aspect of language use could only be developed by training or habit or analogy to past experience. Chomsky's efforts to understand human language, however, had led him to the belief that language universals exist in the mind—that the mind, in philosophical terms, is a source of knowledge independent of the senses. Thus Chomsky placed himself in the rationalist tradition of philosophy.

"Without trying to make this sound a little bit inflated," he explained, "I really think there is a very serious issue that is raised in the empiricist-rationalist controversy. In philosophy this is a very hard position to maintain because almost everyone assumes that these issues are dead, and if you only use words clearly you can see there is no issue. I don't believe that at all." The problem, he suggests, is that contemporary philosophers bring their own concerns to their studies in the history of philosophy, instead of trying to understand past philosophers in their historical and intellectual context. "If you study empiricism and rationalism this way, I think you find two fundamentally different approaches to the nature of human intelligence. The empiricist approach basically says that human knowledge is an adventitious construct which has developed through association and habit and so on from an essentially unstructured organism which has as its structure only the ability to perceive certain impressions—and ability to carry out induction—which Hume quite honestly said must be just animal instinct; there is no explanation for it. The rationalist approach basically assumes that there's some fixed schematic structure within which any human knowledge has to develop and it can be initiated by experience but it's going to take the form which is determined by the nature of mind. This is a very different approach, I think."

In his own scholarly work Chomsky is anxious to move on toward the unanswered questions about the human mind. "I think I've done about as much arguing as I feel like doing for a while on this general rationalist-empiricist business. I think the thing to do now is to try to draw out and give an explicit characterization of those principles which do govern the functions of mind—human cognitive processes—in this domain and try to tie them as much as possible to other things that are known about the psychological capabilities of humans and just build on that."

The linguistics revolution can hardly rest content with the acceptance of transformational generative grammar within its field. One of the difficulties in talking precisely about scientific revolutions, from Copernicus and Galileo to Freud and Einstein, is that they are enmeshed in far wider and more complex changes in the way men view themselves and their world. "Linguistics," Chomsky says, "is really a theoretical biology, if you like, a theoretical psychology." If Chomsky's rethinking of the question "What is language?" has brought about a revolution in the field of linguistics, it cannot help but be involved—in ways we may not yet be able to see—in a larger revolution built upon the question, "What is man?"

In the Old Tradition

ANNA KARENINA AND OTHER ESSAYS. By F. R. Leavis. Pantheon Books. 248 pp. $5.95.

ALAN LELCHUK

Mr. Lelchuk teaches English at Brandeis University. He has published fiction and criticism in New American Review, Transatlantic Review, Dissent and other journals.

This collection of sixteen essays by the well-known English teacher and critic, F. R. Leavis, includes only two that are new to print (studies of Anna Karenina and The Secret Sharer). The rest is reprinted material, reaching as far back in time as 1933 (a requiem for a small magazine of high quality, The Calendar of Modern Letters). In range they extend from Leavis' first foray into a foreign literature, to Anglo-American authors like Eliot and Pound, Twain and James, George Eliot and John Bunyan. There is also a fine appreciation of one of Leavis' spiritual ancestors in literary criticism, Samuel Johnson. But the fact that we are offered so little that is new is disappointing. For after the extended attack on Snow, which exhibited more of Leavis' defects than his virtues, it was interesting to speculate on what further literary directions Leavis might explore. More specifically, one waited to see how the Snow cultural critique might be translated into a discussion of contemporary literary matters.

Thus this collection rehashes old patterns, rather than opening new departures. Leavis' critical perspective derives from a combination of Johnson's moral seriousness, Matthew Arnold's concerns with the cultural condition and with literature as a criticism of life, and from the energizing spirit of Non-Conformist Dissent (translated into literary terms). This last lends to his work the continual combativeness and bluntness which have come to be regarded as the Leavis signature. They are for the most part attractive qualities; Leavis is at his best as a negative or corrective critic—he is fond of storming and defeating favorite Establishment citadels, especially those with large pretensions and exaggerated reputations. He is frequently successful.

Leavis rightfully points out that Dryden's critical writings may be important historically, but they don't exist as major criticism or "living literature." Pound was deficient not merely in humanity but in his art; and, more interesting, Leavis shows that beneath Pound's well-publicized and self-promoted erudition lay essential cultural ignorances.

Commenting on Eliot, Leavis may exaggerate the case (a frequent failing), but he does make useful points. He notes shrewdly that Eliot's best criticism occurs when the problem at hand is directly related to his own technical problems as a poet. Otherwise Eliot's critical judgments suffer from a certain conventionality of mind, narrowness of emotional range, insufficiency of intellectual rigor. About Eliot's famous essay, "Tradition and the Individual Talent," Leavis remarks, "Actually the trenchancy and vigor are illusory and the essay is notable for its ambiguities, its logical inconsistencies, its pseudo-precisions, its fallaciousness, and the aplomb of its equivocations and its specious cogency." Delivered with cunning casualness, the remark is then backed up with a close scrutiny of the essay—at times very cogent, at times not. Leavis is particularly scornful of any "fashionable" group or figure whose essentially minor achievement is labeled—by the mass culture weeklies or the B.B.C.—as major. Thus the elitist coterie of Bloomsbury and its overrated talent receives harsh, disdainful judgment. (Virginia Woolf,

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT  MUTUAL REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

► Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram Dept. MD
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

as novelist and critic, is a favorite target.) And he derives pleasure from recalling how fashionable it was to attribute real creative originality to the modern poets of the thirties, Auden, Spender, Day Lewis, while critics like himself, a tiny minority, earned a different kind of reward by disagreeing.

Leavis is to be commended for his role as a vigorous opponent of gentility parading as serious culture, of mannered style or precious feelings standing for real talent, of journalistic "taste" and academic fashion passing for critical standards. As a close reader of novels, Leavis demands a critical attentiveness and rigor which ignores the dilettantish or impressionistic reader. A critic of personal engagement and moral responsiveness to a particular work or writer, rather than a critical theorist, Leavis refuses constantly to oversimplify a text for the sake of tidy organization or thesis correctness (a peculiarly American fallibility). Leavis cares for literature and for standards—and in an age when most literary criticism consists of a pedestrian professionalism, and when literary standards are too frequently abandoned for this cause or that promotion, Leavis is a welcome reminder that literary criticism can be a serious discipline.

All this is not to say that he is without drawbacks, some of the most serious of which spring from his virtues. One of the unfortunate consequences of his combativeness, for one thing, is that Leavis is continually setting up a straw man and laying him low. This can be useful, if the straw man is worth it (as in the Karenina essay) or really there. Is, for example, Prof. Harry Moore, a weak editor of Lawrence's letters, really worth the rancorous lambasting he receives from Leavis? Clearly Moore serves as the occasion for the renewal of the very personal D. H. Lawrence crusade that Leavis has been waging for years (and should abandon, since, besides its monotony, it represents his greatest critical misjudgment). And take the case of "The Americanness of American Literature." To mount a vigorous attack on Van Wyck Brooks in 1952—as if that critic were a major critical force, or his view a predominant one that Howells was as significant as James—is to display an embarrassingly antiquated contact with the American critical world.

Another defect results when bluntness hardens into rigid dogma or ex cathedra pronouncement. Too often authoritarian assertion replaces analytical discussion. I refer now to Leavis' famous literary traditions, which are frequently mistaken in judgment and artificial in their exclusiveness. In excluding Dickens (except for Hard Times, hardly as powerful a novel as some others) and Hardy from his Great Tradition of the English Novel, for example, Leavis makes two major novelists pay the penalty of debatable criteria and, worse, shuts off the opportunity for a serious discussion of their art. Indeed if cultural matrix or common heritage are to exist as criteria for evaluation, can you really place James ahead of Hardy, or Conrad ahead of Dickens? Leavis' Procrustean traditions point more to his own limitations and biases than to the limitations of those writers he excludes.

My last reservation (in this limited space) concerns Leavis' continual reminder for the critic to preserve standards in his own age. In an early essay, "Towards Standards of Criticism," Leavis writes:

Where there is a "living literature of the time" there is also a "contemporary sensibility," and it is always the business of criticism . . . to define—that is, help to form—and organize this,

and to make conscious the "standards" implicit in it.

Certainly this is an important truth about the responsibility of the critic. Yet, curiously, Leavis has not, in recent years (the Snow controversy notwithstanding), shouldered the burden. For as we can see from this collection, where there is not one single essay devoted to a contemporary writer, work or movement, Leavis has abdicated from the responsibility of which he is constantly reminding us. And when we read, in the essay on Anna Karenina, what Matthew Arnold, that celebrator of the Greek classics, thought about that novel (and about other contemporary works), it is regrettable that Leavis, who has followed Arnold in so much else, has departed from his mentor in offering commentary about contemporary literature. Isn't it ironic that the "news" about this collection concerns an essay on a novel published not in the 1960s but almost a hundred years earlier?

The Stages of Wasp Man

MORNING NOON AND NIGHT. By James Gould Cozzens. Harcourt, Brace & World. 408 pp. $5.95.

EDWIN J. KENNEY, JR.

Mr. Kenney teaches English at Colby College in Maine.

Readers who remember the controversy about whether By Love Possessed was the 20th-century incarnation of the Great American Novel or a badly written, propagandistic defense of WASP values, can prepare themselves for the arguments that will follow the publication of James Gould Cozzens' latest work. Although not so monumentally ambitious, Morning Noon and Night, Mr. Cozzens' first full-length novel since By Love Possessed (1957), is a radical departure from the manner of his earlier fiction, and it raises similar critical questions about his talent and his vision.

Cozzens' new novel takes the form of the reminiscences of a businessman in his 60s, and the narrative moves through time and space according to what the narrator calls the "uncertainties" of his recollections and associations. This range and fluidity of a whole lifetime of different stages of growth in different parts of the Eastern seaboard distinguishes Morning Noon and Night from Cozzens' other novels, like Guard of Honor or Men and Brethren, which were firmly set in a realistically particularized community and formally limited by the brief dramatic moments in which the action or crisis takes place. Even if the reader of a novel like By Love Possessed may feel that there is finally too much detail for its own sake and no real crisis worthy of such elaborate preparation, he may at least be possessed by the rich, dense texture of the fictional world itself and the suggestion of its social, moral, and psychological pressures.

His concreteness and immediacy, his fidelity to what most people consider to be real life, are Cozzens' great achievements as a novelist, but they are missing from the recollections of Henry Dodd Worthington, which move whimsically in time among home town and summer cottage and prep school, Harvard and Boston, business and New York, the Air Force and Washington. The loss of a distinct and palpable external world is by itself an abuse of Cozzens' abilities and a serious weakness of Morning Noon and Night; it also leaves naked Cozzens' tendency to create rather lifeless secondary characters, who have to do all the suffering in his novels, and to present his skeptical leading characters with undue solemnity.

By making the subject of this novel the narrator, Cozzens presents directly and openly the consciousness of his hero and making the life of his fiction depend upon the quality of the narrator's sensibility. Henry Dodd Worthington does not bear this responsibility effortlessly. He is a characteristic Cozzens hero: a white, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant from a New England family of money and position, who has become a successful professional man. He lacks even an ordinary sensitivity to life and to the integrity of the lives around him, and reveals a tired and tiring imperviousness to emotional relations with parents, friends, wives, children. He cannot, for example, sympathize with his daughter's distress at her marital difficulties ("past my help") or her sorrow at her mother's death ("She lacks my schooling in these terminal processes").

Perhaps worse, he cannot even believe imaginatively that he once might have been moved: in writing his autobiography Worthington can "re-experience almost nothing of the animation of high interest, the active enthrallment" of his youth, and the narrative recollection of his experiences conveys to the reader little sense of an active inner life at all. There is too much detachment and abstraction to permit a vivid or dramatic sense of felt life, yet the detachment never becomes comic. He can label his boyhood seduction by an older woman as potentially comic ("now we are to have relishable comedy, albeit low"), but he cannot treat it comically, for he does not truly see it that way. Indeed, his seriousness about himself is extraordinary and oppressive.

Worthington considers his most distinguished quality to be a skeptical habit of mind, what he calls "critical analyzing," the skill that has made him a successful management consultant. He sees this ability "to point out the obvious" as leading to some kind of wisdom ("what I have to say about life deserves attention"); the wisdom is that there really isn't any wisdom about life because it is such a haphazard and pointless business that a man can never be sure about it.

Such a flat vision of the human condition, of course, is meant, on the one hand, to justify the narrator's refusal to confront life with energy and commitment and, on the other, to justify his rejection of those who do, such as "the liberal intellectual pretenders, the social-activist fake or half-writers," and all young people and women with their messy emotions. Without intensely felt experience—perhaps most simply without the awareness of suffering—Henry Dodd Worthington can never reach any true sense of life or understanding of it, and can only narcissistically enjoy his own wonder at his fortuitous and effortless moving from inheritance to inheritance, wife to wife, job to job, comfort to comfort.

In Morning Noon and Night, as in much of Cozzens' other work, the rhetoric inappropriately outweighs the action. There is no action at all here, and the rhetoric is repulsively turgid, stuffed to bursting with badly chosen, misunderstood commonplaces from literature—even from Cozzens' own novels. Worthington's pretentious use of literary allusions shows clearly that literature was never an imaginative experience for him, and so it, too, becomes vulgarized as he quotes it, explicates it, and mixes it with business jargon and cracker-barrel clichés to support and to ornament his smug confidence.

Yes; he that moves others himself unmoved; he that calm and clear-sighted remains stone, who is slave to neither appetite nor passion—he fits himself to get, he deserves to get, favor of the gods and so grow great. Rightly he rules and disposes; weaker, poorer characters come under him ■■ servants.

As in this paraphrase of Shakespeare's Sonnet 94, whose sense both Worthington and Cozzens seem to have missed, the narrator's pompous allusions and self-congratulatory comparisons of himself to heroic and tragic characters such as King David and Hamlet do reveal that in this so-called critical mind there is little self-criticism. Whether these revelations were intended by Cozzens to be ironic is difficult to ascertain because they do not operate with the brilliance

P. V. Annenkov

The Extraordinary Decade

Literary Memoirs

Edited by Arthur P. Mendel

Pavel Annenkov's literary memoirs of the tumultuous 1840's in Russia portray his friends, the intellectual giants of the time—including Gogol, Belinsky, Turgenev, Bakunin, and Tolstoy—in vivid detail. Though the main focus is on the renowned critic Belinsky, Annenkov considers all of the principal figures and comments incisively on the general intellectual, economic, and political climate.

$8.50

Now in Paperback

The New Writing in Russia

Edited and Translated by Thomas P. Whitney

Students of Russia and general readers will value this highly praised collection of current literature. These stories by five modern Russian writers, Aksenov, Kazakov, Rozov, Nagibin, and Tendryakov have the enduring qualities common to great literature of all times. Whitney analyzes the important role of literature in the U.S.S.R. and the rising conflict between writers and the government.

$4.95 paperback

$6.95 hardbound.

Rebel Voices

An I.W.W. Anthology

Edited, with Introductions, by Joyce L. Kornbluh

The Industrial Workers of the World tell their own story in a brilliant collection of songs, poems, stories, and cartoons. The selections range from the Wobblies' manifesto that "all peace as long as the wage system lasts is but an armed truce" through the famous poems of Ralph Chaplin and the satires of T-Bone Slim. Each selection begins with an introduction that clearly relates to the over-all development of this powerful radical group.

$ 4.95 paperback

$12.50 hardbound

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS
ANN ARBOR

of controlled ironic form. Worthington, like Profrock, may think himself a Hamlet and actually be a Polonius, but thinking so does not lead Worthington to a discovery of that truth. And Morning Noon and Night, unlike Eliot's poem, does not lead the reader to believe confidently that the author knew the truth about his character. How, the reader keeps asking, ought a passage such as this be read?

[It the life of the great and powerful] closely pertains to me. To one Henry Dodd Worthington, today's man of uncertainty, of two or more minds in his remembering, as he looks at random episodes of history, comedy, and tragedy by memory restaged, and to that poor player who today, this minute, is busy strutting and fretting his current hour's part of slipper'd Pantaloons. Often I may still feel incredulous but there can be no doubt about it. Speaking of the great and powerful I do not speak objectively. I am speaking of myself. I am one of them. I, as lingering incredulity says, of all people.

The disingenuous remarks about incredulity from a stone man who believes he deserves the favors of the gods are hard to take, no matter how they are taken. If they are meant to be ironic, the irony is neither sudden, sharp, and devastating here, nor sustained, complex, and revealing throughout the narrative. If they are not meant to be ironic, they and Worthington are at best disagreeable and dull.

If Cozzens' champions complain that his works are too often attacked for social and political reasons instead of being criticized as literature, the answer is that his works too often seem to be social and political tracts instead of literature. Worthington at one point in his narrative describes it as an "apology for myself and life"; analogically it is also an apology for the lives of all the heroes that have preceded him in Cozzens' work and for Cozzens' persistent imaginative concern with such heroes. If Cozzens were less fascinated by the happy little ironies of his heroes' assured superiority and more attuned to literary irony, this might have been a marvelous ironic presentation of an unusually pretentious and protected man. The energy for the book could then have come from a richly ambiguous authorial view of the hero. But Cozzens always seems to take his heroes as solemnly as they take themselves.

And how can one know that what remains is any more true than what is repudiated? Indeed, Myrdal says that he has shaped and censored to make truth out of fact—which I interpret as making art out of life. I could cite passages wherein dramatic form wins out over plausibility, and there is one memorable paragraph wherein Myrdal's zeal for the well-turned anecdote traps him into claiming that he assumes on the toilet a position which the contours of that device would make ludicrous if not impossible.

But if the book in retrospect is only a qualified success—disjointed, self-commiserating, fickle—the process of its making is a fascination. I think I have never read a work that so urged me to try my hand at the same thing; that is because Myrdal makes so plain how one must go about it if one has really the determination to strike a balance for one's time and one's relation to it. He was a rebel from his early teens (a real one—out of school and on the road); I think he became so in part because he was attracted by hard tasks and it was not easy for the son of Gunnar Myrdal to rebel. He does not much mention his parents except in one passage where, with an understanding bitterness, he explains how their position of liberal eminence in Sweden blocked for years the publication of his iconoclastic works. Editors solicitous for the intrepid social programs of the elder Myrdals were disinclined to embarrass them before their enemies by sponsoring their son's acrid nonconformity. But he cites his experience at the Lincoln School in New York, where for a time he was placed and where he came into frustrated opposition to a "tender and group-minded" administration. It is easier, he says, "to develop one's personality in an old-fashioned school among mad teachers without either understanding or tenderness." And easier, one may assume, in the company of parents similarly deficient.

So the very young Myrdal, by his own account, overreacted to understanding and encouragement, grew his hair long, omitted baths, slept where and with whom he pleased, froze on the roads, burned in the desert and managed to save his soul by outraging the proprieties of even his complacent society. It is as well that his parents endowed him at least with an almost indestructible body and mind. Sore as a bear, from deepest convictions, he has had the wit to direct his misanthropy against sufficiently large targets. He is disloyal to Europe. "The monuments our Western ideals construct rest on a firm base of torn-off fingernails." And this bias acquired from study and observation turns him toward a kind of allegiance to the East. (If his novels gave his parents some pain, Report from a Chinese Village

A Passionate Memoir

CONFESSIONS OF A DISLOYAL EUROPEAN. By Jan Myrdal. Pantheon Books. 202 pp. $4.95.

ROBERT HATCH

Jan Myrdal is 40, but he has written a book which seems much younger than that. Partly it seems so because he is largely recalling the events and feelings of his youth; but more deeply it is because, even now, he displays a youth's admirable inability to come to terms with his own and his society's corruption.

The catalyst for Confessions of a Disloyal European was the suicide of a girl (here called A; many of Myrdal's associates are thus identified by initials, which is tactful of him, but gives the company a somewhat ghostly cast) who had borrowed his apartment for a time. He was in no way to blame, as men normally weigh blame, but she had phoned him and he had put her off, being engrossed in his own work. And by a combination of association, dream and insight—whose threads he weaves into a brilliantly revealing example of what we mean when we say we know something that we cannot possibly know—Myrdal knew he should not put aside that call. "Knowing but not doing is betrayal."

Being a writer ("I am a mixer of words . . . but I mistrust my tools"), he sublimates the betrayal of A into the larger frame of Europe's betrayal of the rest of the world. "My guilt is that of the consciousness that does not carry responsibility": in microcosm, it is the guilt of the European, that most conscious of men. As expiation, and to force some meaning out of A's quite meaningless death, he will write an honest book about his times, his heritage, his loves, dreams and ascent to manhood.

The utter honesty he would embrace turns out not to be easily achieved. Myrdal's memory is good—indeed superb: he can recall conversations decades old, the sensations of his early teens, the underlined passages of books unseen for years—but memory proves to be less a guide than an ambush of exculpation. He keeps setting down passages of the seeming most vivid relevance, and then turning against them in a revulsion of superior candor. Indeed, the reader may become vexed by this process of alternate construction and demolition: a writer should perhaps do such homework in his study and come to the printed page with his affairs in a semblance of order. There is something liverish about this repeated flinging down of the pencil.

must have fed their pride.) But I feel that it is a negative allegiance—at least. Myrdal offers not much evidence in this passionately carpentered memoir that man fares better East than West. It is more the case that Europe's analytical superiority makes the failure there more clammy.

In any event, man is Myrdal's single, if abstract ally. "I have been convinced for a long time that it is the idea and not the organized idea that has any rights over me." Religion not church, theory not party, man not society. It can be the life work of a very good man to keep the distinction clear.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

THE BEAUTIFUL ONES ARE NOT YET BORN. By Ayi Kwei Armah. Houghton Mifflin Co. 215 pp. $4.95.

Armah is an American-educated Ghanaian now on the staff of Jeune Afrique in Paris. His novel, set in Ghana, is an unrelievedly repelling and hopeless portrait of a society whose ruling class is literally obsessed with money and prestige; the intensity of their worship of power is comparable only to their contempt for those outside its magic circles. The main character is a railway clerk squeezed between the pressures of "succeeding" and remaining human. Armah shows us the actual process of what seems to be an inevitable personality disintegration of those who struggle to survive in the world of the novel. His prognosis, as relayed in the title, is that no possibility for change is yet in sight. One particularly fascinating section of this angry and profound book tells of the rise to power of a Nkrumah-like character.

THE PENNY WARS. By Elliott Baker. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 255 pp. $5.95.

What starts out as an unusually wise, moving, funny and authoritative novel about being 16 in 1939 middle-class America ends up as a bad failure for the author of A Fine Madness. Mr. Baker's likable young hero, intent on such matters as his sex life, the coming of fascism, and his relationship with his widowed mother, gets pushed by his author into a series of progressively strained events, first with a newly arrived German refugee who courts his mother, then with a group of young black kids, and finally, in a climax fraught with symbolism, into a confrontation in which both converge to make a moral. Mr.

Baker's main character is so well drawn that one feels he'd be agast at the gimmicky ending his author has slapped onto his saga.

ONCE AN EAGLE. By Anton Myrer. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 817 pp. $7.95.

This immense windbag of a novel follows the career of one Sam Damon—born soldier, leader of men and the best combat commander the U.S. Army ever had—from his youth in small-town America through both World Wars until, a three-star general at the age of 65, he is called to "Khotiane" as an adviser. Here he dies in his boots after enlightenment, trying to convince his colleagues that they are heading for a land war in Asia. The result is an unintentional, magnificent parody of the worst American war novels. Every hackneyed, simplistic and sentimental idea about love and war since time began seems to be intoned at one time or another by its wooden characters. Sam himself is deified throughout for his wisdom, integrity, and sheer goodness, while the perspective is always as if a man who had said tsk-tsk at the bombing of Hiroshima were covered with medals by the War Resisters League. If the members of the Book-of-the-Month Club were ever to rise up in revolt against its judges, their selection of Once An Eagle would seem to offer a fine occasion.

KISS KISS BANG BANG. By Pauline Kael. Atlantic-Little, Brown. 404 pp. $7.95.

Pauline Kael on the movies makes most critics of anything else seem like careful and well-intentioned bores. This collection includes her celebration of Bonnie and Clyde and her wincingly accurate put-down of Blow-Up but, best of all, a selection of her notes—most of them a single, paragraph long—on 280 of the thousands of movies on which she has commented over the years. There is a 31-page index. Miss Kael's candor, range, wit and immense knowledge are only part of what makes her book so absorbing; what is rare is the way she gives herself to what she sees and what she writes, and her assumption that both filmmakers and readers are at least as human as she is. The State Department would do well to give this book away by the thousands to replace whatever else they may now be using as an introduction to American culture. This is a serious suggestion.

BLOODLINE. By Ernest J. Gaines. The Dial Press. 249 pp. $4.95.

The two best stories in this collection are child's-eye views of being black in Southern plantation country. Mr. Gaines, who grew up working on a plantation, conveys it all with the kind of artistry that reminds us how numb we've become in putting up with mediocre dialogue in fiction for the sake of "story." He is fine at both, but any (white?) admirer of Bloodline, and of his earlier novel, Of Love and Dust, also set on a plantation, has to wonder now what he would do with another setting. It is interesting to speculate about how Mr. Gaines's further experiences—in the Army, or in San Francisco, where he's lived for some time—would be filtered through the sensibility that makes his Southern-based books so good to read.

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVICK

Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario

Since George Bernard Shaw has long since been granted at least de facto recognition as the second playwright of the English-speaking world, it is only fitting that there should be an annual festival in his honor. The Malvern Festival in England, which flourished during the thirties, has been defunct for many years, but every summer since 1962 there has been a Shaw Festival here at Niagara-on-the-Lake, an idyllic little town within fairly easy reach of both Buffalo and Toronto. This Shaw Festival is still in some respects a rather primitive operation; it functions in a cramped, makeshift 400-seat theatre that has to be fitted up from scratch every year inside the Niagara town hall. But it has succeeded in attracting both good actors and large audiences. And, at a time when Shaw tends to bring out the worst in directors, its work is marked by a refreshing absence of camp, cuteness and misplaced ingenuity.

From last season I remember with particular pleasure a production of Arms and the Man that made Shaw's points with economy, deftness and plenty of impact; this season began with a production of Heartbreak House, a far more difficult work, that fared less well. Heartbreak House is one of those frustrating works that attempt greatly, that have glints and gleams of extraordinary brilliance, that might have been masterpieces, and that do not come off. It is Shaw's attempt to write an English Cherry Orchard; but Shaw thought that to write like Chekhov meant a relaxation of artistic discipline, whereas, if anything, the reverse is true. "Heartbreak House," says Shaw in his preface, "... is cultured, leisured Europe before the war." But it isn't; it is a "menagerie," a "crazy-house" (I quote from the play itself), populated by fantastic, implausible Shavian figments.

An inspired director might perhaps be able to make the play seem to be in toto what it is in flashes: a powerful metaphor for a disintegrating, suicidal society. But Val Gielgud (B.B.C. radio producer and elder brother of Sir John), who directed the festival production, was not thus inspired. He appeared to respect the play, even to understand it; he just could not make it work—not with this cast, anyhow.

There were a couple of fine performances. Tony van Bridge as old Captain Shotover, who sees clearly what is going on around him and takes refuge from it in senility, eccentricity and drink, resisted the temptation to cuteness, which so marred the characterization of Maurice Evans on Broadway a few years back. Mr. van Bridge even made a brave attempt to show us the pain that lies beneath Shotover's antics. And Bill Fraser as Boss Mangan, the pathetic nouveau riche captain of industry, was vulgar in an unhackneyed, economical, and unmistakably authentic fashion, and very funny into the bargain.

But other actors in important parts were unable to hold together the divergent elements of their characters. Jessica Tandy, for instance, as Shotover's daughter Hesione, managed very well with the cozy side of the character, but she failed to project the mysterious sensuality that the text insists on attributing to Shotover's "demon daughters." Paxton Whitehead, who played Miss Tandy's husband, is a young English actor whose marvelous gift for comic fatuity in this case obscured Shaw's point that the character is not only a romantic poseur but also an intelligent man whose comments on the futility of the lives around him deserve to be taken seriously.

The Shaw Festival is interested not only in Shaw but also in his contemporaries, particularly the comic writers. After Heartbreak House this season came a week-long guest engagement of The Importance of Being Oscar, Micheál MacLiammóir's one-man show about Oscar Wilde, and this was followed by the English-language premiere of La Main Passe! by Georges Feydeau, translated especially for the festival by the Canadian actress Suzanne Grossmann, and retitled The Chemmy Circle. From one point of view, this last is an incongruous offering for a Shaw Festival; Georges Feydeau (1862-1921) was the great master of the French bedroom farce, a genre of which Shaw most vigorously disapproved. "To shout with laughter at a farcical comedy," Shaw once wrote apropos of a play by this same Feydeau, is "the deliberate indulgence of that horrible, derivative joy in humiliation and suffering which is the basest element in human nature." But time brings its revenges; Shaw and Feydeau now seem much closer together than they ever did in their lifetimes, both products of the same 19th-century comic tradition. Shaw is no longer an avant-garde writer, Feydeau is no longer a commercial hack; both, in their varying degrees, are classics. Eric Bentley, who has written a brilliant book in defense of

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

PERSONALS

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team!" For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 20 East 41 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION

9-9-68

111 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $4

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1262

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 One of the chief adherents to a symphony by Huxley? (5, 3, 5)
- 10 Take care not to do so. (7)
- 11 In the eagle, a medium amount is shown by the sound of it. (7)
- 12 Enter into a holding arrangement. (9)
- 13 It might go around the head of Caesar, according to Brutus. (5)
- 14 If you like to be asleep, perhaps? (6)
- 16 A daughter of Aeolus might help if you're feeling cranky! (8)
- 19 Ate about a few hundred pounds of pork, and turned out this way? (8)
- 20 One of those sell-out pieces? (6)
- 22 Not an express term for the pub. (5)
- 23 Not well, yet resting comfortably. In fact, quite the opposite! (3-2-4)
- 25 Pray. (7)
- 26 A prosecutor might have a bad time with one barely visible. (7)
- 27 Like one of O. Henry's titled subjects? (13)

DOWN

- 2 What one might claim isn't left straight? (5)
- 3 Their time is a quarter less than full, with such as Morgenblatter. (8, 7)
- 4 It could turn out to be lousy humor one provides! (6)
- 5 How one might travel on the Continent

at least implies the coach isn't in the dark. (5-3)

- 6 What one might have to do at Customs with obvious jurisprudence. (4-3-4, 4)
- 7 Almost pure carbon, going from light to dark. (9)
- 8 No hanging matter with such things! (8)
- 9 Puzzlers might recognize it as a favorite passage of mine. (4)
- 15 Free seat? (4, 5)
- 17 White Russian finally, but lives otherwise at first. (8)
- 18 Might be helped by vitamins and a couple of portions of fruit, by the sound of it. (8)
- 21 A chapeau the French raise, having long, soft hair. (6)
- 22 The upper story should obviously have a high pitch. (4)
- 24 Twice-called to Byron's native shore. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1261

ACROSS: 1 and 22 down A fate worse than death; 9 Matinee; 10 Proviso; 11 Sineux; 12 Arrested; 14 Climate; 15 Durum; 17 Eagle; 19 Interns; 23 Lithia; 25 Detrain; 26 Regards; 27 and 8 down In the Year of Our Lord. DOWN: 1 Armistice; 2 Actinic; 3 Erstwhile; 4 Order; 5 Superheats; 6 Those; 7 Aviator; 13 Malignancy; 15 Derring-do; 16 Merganser; 18 Glisten; 20 Scherzo; 21 and 21 across Body-building; 24 Area.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

"SUMAC," a tri-quarterly, will appear in September, publishing poetry, fiction, criticism. The first issue includes work by Robert Duncan, Louis Simpson, Kenneth Koch, John Thompson, Denise Levertov and others. Edited by Dan Gerber, Jr. and Jim Harrison. $3.50—one year. Ms. and Subscriptions, Box 29, Fremont, Michigan 49412.

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

OVER 2,000,000 Back Date Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send no money. MIDDLETOWN, Box 934-N, Maywood, N.J. 07067.

CENSORSHIP TODAY—the international news magazine of the battle for free speech. Includes the most up-to-date listing of current banned books, plays, films, etc. Informative articles by authorities illuminate background details. One year subscription only $10. CENSORSHIP TODAY, 1680 Vine St., Suite 700-D, Hollywood, Calif. 90028.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. four 47th years, 3430 S. 34th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

LITERARY SERVICES

LITERARY "handyman." Talent for humor. Will help enliven your play, speech, report, Piecework, line, paragraph, page. Box 617, c/o The Nation.

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE
by Meyer A. Zelligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $4.45
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) $4.45

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

GUILTY

We at The NATION are guilty—guilty of conspiring to tell the truth.

Join the conspiracy!

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

FREE OFFER: We'll send you The NATION free each week for two weeks—or, if you wish to subscribe now, we'll extend your normal subscription by four bonus issues.

☐ I'll join the good fight for 1 year (48 issues) plus four bonus issues. I enclose $10.

☐ I'll try you for two issues, free of charge.

Name

Street

City State Zip

N9-9

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 16, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
SEP 16 1968
LIBRARY

THE CENSORSHIP WAR

What Moscow Fears ALEXANDER WERTH

An Ounce of Lead Gunning for Senator Church

MICHAEL McCHERY

Philanthropy

THE GOLDEN CROWBAR

GEORGE G. KIRSTEIN

POETS ON POETRY

10 Poems by FERLINGHETTI, JAMES WRIGHT, JOSEPHINE MILES, LOGAN, BELITT, HAINES

15 of SYLVIA PLATH, SEFERIS, KINNELL, BLACKBURN, SNODGRASS, MERWIN

5-200N PL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME, CA 94010

LETTERS

hodgepodge system

Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR SIR: In a country that fairly teems with able political executives, the best our hodgepodge nominating system can come up with is two men whose main experience has been in the flunky job of Vice President.

Virtually every competent commentator has deplored the present system. Can anyone tell me if there is any movement actively working to create nation-wide Presidential primaries? If not, I'd like to start one.

Tertius Chandler

on conservation

Seattle, Wash.

DEAR SIR: In their otherwise excellent article ["Conservation for Survival," The Nation, Aug. 26], Robert and Leona Rienow imply that increases in the incidence of infectious hepatitis and mononucleosis may be consequences of river pollution.

While it is true that hepatitis can be transmitted via human excreta, and recent outbreaks have been caused by ingestion of shellfish from contaminated waters, the statements concerning mononucleosis seem not to be based on fact. There is no "rising tide" of mononucleosis, so far as I am aware; it has always been an extremely common disease. It is quite misleading to identify mononucleosis as "resembling leukemia." Though the clinical and blood manifestations may indeed be similar, the courses are vastly different: all varieties of leukemia are eventually fatal, while mononucleosis resembles the common cold in being generally mild though technically incurable. Recovery is almost universal, and death from mononucleosis essentially a medical curiosity. Most important of all, there is no evidence that the transmission of the disease is in any way related to water pollution. In fact, though recent research seems to be confirming the long-held suspicion that the disease is caused by a virus, the mode of spread remains a mystery. . . .

I have a vested interest neither in the continued propagation of mononucleosis nor in water pollution. The importance and validity of the Rienows' arguments will in no way be diminished by attention to this kind of small detail, but in view of the prevalence of the disorder among young adults (who may well account for a substantial proportion of the readership of The Nation), it is probably worth while to quell the notion that mononucleosis is a major or growing threat to health.

Victor R. Lavis, M.D.

Santa Barbara, Calif.

DEAR SIR: A classic demonstration of "the pitiful incompetence of both industry and government to protect the natural heritage or safeguard the future" is the despoilment of the natural beauty of the famed Santa Barbara coastline and channel and the devastating certainty of pollution on a wide scale.

Recent action of drilling leases in coastal waters brought the unprecedented amount of almost $700 million into the federal treasury from a combination of the major oil companies. Very shortly oil drilling platforms sprouted like mushrooms offshore in the channel and inevitably oil spillage accidents began. One nasty one off Gaviota killed millions of baby lobsters overnight. And now adding insult to injury, Humble Oil Co. (Standard of N.J.) proposes to build oil processing and storage plants upon the shore. . . . A taxbase conscious Board of Supervisors

(Continued on page 243)

EDITORIALS

The Blowout

Reporting in The New York Times on the reactions of Chicago South Side Negroes to the Democratic National Convention, Earl Caldwell found a total lack of enthusiasm, but not a lack of awareness. "Certain people don't say anything," a newsstand operator remarked, "but that doesn't mean they are not listening and watching." An older man picked up a paper at the stand, viewed the headline predicting the nomination of Vice President Humphrey, and said: "It looks like a blowout. We're without a light. We got nobody to look up to now. No father, no mother, no brother, no sister. Who we got to look up to now?"

Caldwell has no comment, but that man must have been hoping for something better—McCarthy, Ted Kennedy? He is not alone in his depression. In politics, as in war, however, one cannot afford to be discouraged by one defeat or even a succession of defeats. The United States is still a going concern and it must be governed. Barring a conversion in the religious sense (which would also be a miracle in the political sense), neither Richard Nixon nor Hubert Humphrey is capable of governing it. So the people will have to protect their interests, by pressure on whoever wins in November, through new leaders or leaders chosen from among those who lost in Miami and Chicago, and by the re-election of such Senators as Morse, Clark, McGovern, Fulbright, Church (see article page 233), and the election of such Senatorial nominees as Gilligan (Ohio), Cranston (California) and O'Dwyer (New York) and as many trustworthy Representatives as possible.

To leave Nixon or Humphrey to their own devices (forgetting Wallace for the moment) would also be to leave the country where it is now—and that's pretty much the way the man who bought the paper described it. After that, things would get even worse; if anyone thinks that the worst is already here, he must be euphoric.

For this prognosis one need only examine the two candidates. There is a curious likeness. Both have been Vice President. Both are supreme opportunists, though in their physiognomy and public behavior they reveal it in different ways—Humphrey by volubility, Nixon by the craftiness to the question raised during the 1960 campaign: "Would you buy a used car from this man?" Both are in essential agreement on foreign policy, including Vietnam. Both, to a significant degree, owe their nominations to the Dixiecrats, Nixon to a coalition led by Thurmond and Tower, Humphrey to Smathers, Ellington, Connally, et al. Both were organization favorites; they served the machine and the machine served them.

In a sense, both won by default, Humphrey because he avoided the primaries and Nixon because he had no real opposition until it was too late. Neither man is genuinely popular with the general public, and not even particularly popular within his own party, except with the wheelers and dealers. Both catered to the power centers in their respective parties, and one feels they would have made even more discreditable concessions if they had deemed them necessary. Both are masters of the cliché and the "balanced" statement—on the one hand, but then on the other—designed to make everybody feel good and extract the maximum number of votes from the undecided.

Humphrey's rhetoric is full-blown; he will promise more and promise it more emotionally. Nixon puts on the deliberate manner of the elder statesman. Humphrey will hornsoggle the Democratic Left, while Nixon will do the same with the Republican Right. Those wooed and betrayed in both cases may have more than an inkling of what is being done to them but will feel it is the best they can get. The two candidates might well have run as a "coalition" ticket—either Nixon and Humphrey or Humphrey and Nixon, the order would not have mattered much. In the event of a divided Congress, there is already talk of a possible need for a government of "national unity" after the election.

The basic trouble with these two, and with those who pitted them against each other, is that they are out of touch with current realities, with the troubled times, with the future. Neither can communicate with the young, with the blacks, or with that large army of voters who feel alienated from both parties. Their credibility gaps are enormous to start with. What voter with a normal endowment of intelligence can take at face value Humphrey's promises, knowing that he is beholden to Johnson, Daley, the satchaps of the AFL-CIO, the South? Who can put trust in Nixon on the basis of his record and of his well-deserved disrepute? The basic function of the President of the United States is to inspire the nation and bring out the best that is in it. It is absurd on its face to expect leadership of that sort from either of these men.

It may be said that we have got the nominees we deserve—a half-truth at best. While neither party is endowed with giants, both had men who stood head and shoulders above the two who were chosen. We deserved better, much better, and given an honest, responsive system of selection we could have had it. As it is, it will be a strain on the country's patience and forbearance to maintain a workable cohesion until our politics can be brought into consonance with the times.

Autopsy on Chicago

Vice President Humphrey, who now aspires to be President and for the first time in four years to be his own man, has proved that the latter ambition is vain. In an effort to divert attention from the disaster of Mayor Daley's performance in Chicago which he—Humphrey—condones, he has suggested that it was a case of violence leading to violence "on both sides." He feels sad about it, but his grief is overlaid with strictures on "self-appointed, self-righteous persons" who resort to force to press their claims.

This is far, far wide of the mark. The basic pattern of what happened in Chicago is all too clear. Daley staged a rehearsal of the action in putting down the peace demonstrations on April 27. In effect this was a warning that no demonstrations would be tolerated during the con-

IN THIS ISSUE

September 16, 1968

EDITORIALS

226

ARTICLES

- 230 The Censorship War:
What Moscow Fears

Alexander Werth

- 233 An Ounce of Lead:
Gunning for Senator Church

Michael McCrery

- 235 Philanthropy: The Golden Crowbar

George G. Kirstein

- 240 The World's Most Harassed Fish

Anthony Netboy

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 244 The Bear in the Poet in the Bear

John Logan

- 245 Plath: A Terrible Perfection

Gary Kissick

- 246 The Search (poem)

John Logan

- 247 A Line to the City

Allen Planz

- 248 Seferis the Greek

John Arthos

- 250 Five Poems:

An Elegy for the Poet

Morgan Blum

James Wright

The Well-Dwellers

Ben Belitt

America

John Haines

The Secret Meaning

of Things

Lawrence Ferlinghetti

If You Will

Josephine Miles

- 252 Public Intimacy

Jerome Mazzaro

- 253 Death Camps of the Free World

Robert Hass

- 255 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL HEN

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN TOLSON

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREIFUS; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office for editorial correspondence only: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information in Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 8

vention. We pointed this out at the time, and in our issue of August 26, published before the convention opened, we ran an editorial titled "Daley Asks for Trouble," based on the report, "Dissent and Disorder," which had been issued by a committee of distinguished citizens of Chicago. This report also anticipated trouble, and constituted a clear warning of what was likely to occur. Daley must have seen it, but it had no more effect than a peashooter against the hide of a rhinoceros.

Mr. Humphrey's neutrality served its purpose—to keep him in the good graces of the Mayor, but it was a falsification of the facts. As Tom Wicker wrote in The New York Times, "violence did not breed counter-violence in Chicago—not in any sense justifying what the police did." Wicker points out that the demonstrators had petitioned for weeks to get permission for a peaceful march on the convention hall and a demonstration outside it. Had this permission been granted, the wind would have been taken out of the sails of those who wanted a confrontation with the police.

But when Daley chose repression, it was he and the Chicago police who forced a confrontation. The result was the obscene spectacle that millions of Americans witnessed on TV and that Humphrey could see from his hotel window. He has said, in chorus with Daley and Daley's apologists, that the police were verbally abused before they resorted to their clubs. No doubt they suffered this injury, which in every disciplined police force in the country, controlled by a level-headed civilian administration, is shrugged off. A policeman is not a civilian in a bar, easily aroused by any insult. He is expected to defend himself against physical assault, not taunts and jeers, however uncomplimentary. The police themselves, like soldiers, generally use language that would be out of place in a drawing room. To side with them on this ground is hypocritical nonsense.

A notable aspect of the disgraceful scenes in Chicago is that Negroes took very little part in the demonstrations. They had good reason for staying in their ghettos. As several of them said to reporters: "They wanted us to make a move so that they could shoot us down."

The assaults of the police on newsmen have aroused the anger of all but the most reactionary papers, and with good reason. Some thirty reporters and photographers were injured. They were simply doing their job of informing the public; they surely had not violated the sensitive dignity of the Chicago police force, but they were beaten just the same.

The large-circulation magazines and wire services have propagated a false image of Daley as the gruff but honest and good-hearted leader who has "built Chicago." What they have neglected is that he is a Neanderthal type who has cost the city dear in the way he ran the convention and repressed protest. One of the reasons he wanted the convention in Chicago was to drum up business in the form of future conventions. Instead, the Chicago tourist bureau is getting cancellations. But that is the least of it. If Chicagoans continue to tolerate him, one of these days he will precipitate a disaster on a scale which will make the events of August seem like a tea party.

The Fear of Violence

On the face of it, the confrontationists, the activists, won the "Battle of Chicago," but they won it in large part because Daley played the game their way. He defended his police force on the ground that whereas a few might have overreacted, the great majority behaved judiciously. This is belied by the television pictures and the testimony of impartial eyewitnesses. Many people who have been skeptical of the charges of "police brutality" which follow every encounter will henceforth be less skeptical.

But this applies only to the humane, fair-minded, articulate minority. There is another segment, perhaps a majority of the adult population, who think that clubbing is too good for hippies, yuppies and dissenters in general. George Wallace knows them well. There are even political morons who declared themselves for McCarthy but said if they couldn't get him they were going to vote for Wallace. It is this section of the population—and all the millions of apathetic, family-centered Americans—that leaders like Tom Hayden and the more moderate but equally determined David Dellinger must watch out for. There is a point beyond which this group will no longer remain apathetic.

They are already frightened, but so far well below the panic level. However, if confrontation-style politics increases in magnitude and violence, they will reach the flash point. This is where a most serious reaction may (predictably will) set in. A current book, Urban Riots: Violence and Social Change, published by the Academy of Political Science at Columbia University, should be required reading for militants and activists. The major theme, according to Henry Raymond of The New York Times, is "a rebuttal of the radical assertion that the United States is entering a revolutionary phase." Several of the contributors warned that an increase in Negro violence "could lead to a further polarization in American politics, even to 'an American style of fascism.'" This applies equally to white revolutionists.

Mayor Daley has his supporters as well as his detractors. Nelson Algren, who knows Chicago about as well as anyone can, said in reference to Daley: "I don't think the clubbing represents one man. I think it represents a majority of the people of Chicago. If an election were held today, he'd win."

This may seem preposterous to what Mencken called "the civilized minority," but votes and firearms are also in the hands of the majority, call them what you like. Daley, says Algren, "would win out of fear—out of the fear of violence. He is the guy who will get the police out—and I think most people vote that way. He is a big property man, and the city is full of little property people." They don't mind violence—as long as they are not the victims.

The Nation does not presume to advise revolutionists. They must follow their star. But, in their own interest and that of their movement, they should realize what the odds are and base their strategy on realities, not on the way they would like things to be.

The Hilton Hotel Incident

The unprovoked blitzkrieg police attacks on the pacifist crowd and bystanders in front of the Conrad Hilton Hotel in Chicago on the third day of the Democratic convention can adequately be compared only to the Nazi use of Black Shirts during Hitler's rise to power in Germany.

In the Hilton assault it is significant to report that the victims included guests of the hotel, elderly bystanders and women and children who had the misfortune to be standing behind the police barriers outside the picture window of the Haymarket Inn. After first assaulting the pacifist demonstrators, the police turned on this group of witnesses and pressed their club-wielding attack so severely that, in panic, the bystanders pressed back until they crashed through the window. But their glass-spiked, bloody escape route was cut off inside when the police flanked them by running around into the restaurant and began beating the people who had fallen through the window. At this point one young man was dragged through the revolving doors of the hotel and beaten until his face turned into an unrecognizable mass of loose pulp. Another victim was forced into a partially opened section of the revolving door and beaten through the crack until he fell into a heap on the floor. He was then swept out of the hotel by a man pushing the door around.

In Chicago, the law-and-order standard became particularly ironic when the great majority of the crowds that were being assaulted by the police remained true to their credo of nonviolence. In the heat of the rape, even veteran newsmen lost their cool and began screaming at the police from the safety of an awning that hung over the scene in the street. But even after the first line of protesters had been peeled off—by clubbings and knees to the groin—the next row remained firm and refused to defend themselves, with what few weapons the street is able to provide.

Still the police pressed forward with their sticks, their well-practiced karate chops, and their boots until finally they themselves fell back exhausted with the efforts of their administered beatings. Soon afterward the Chicago police were replaced by the National Guard. Remarkably, the uniformed soldiers were cheered.

The Orwellian factor in this practical example of the law-and-order fixation which is now being touted by the two major Presidential candidates, as well as by the Wallace-Daley types, is that in the name of law and order the basic freedoms of a large minority of people are being suppressed. In the name of law and order the police attacked peaceful demonstrators, putting down their right to assembly and halting their freedom of speech, and by brutal attacks on scores of newsmen they attempted to muzzle the press.

If they did this while the whole world was watching, what might they have done if they had been off camera?

Coming in an Early Issue

Life Insurance: The Immaculate Deception

by G. Scott Reynolds author of The Mortality Merchants.

If their unprovoked attacks were carried out with the intention of triggering a violent response from a nonviolent crowd, to what lengths might they have gone if the crowd had responded with violence, or even if they had defended themselves?

THOMAS W. PAW, JR.
Editor, Troy Daily News

The Shame of Chicago

It is provocative to have every Chicago policeman wear a riot helmet.

It is provocative to display machine guns—against whom would they be used?

It is provocative to have National Guardsmen with fixed bayonets.

It is provocative to arrest the chairman of a state delegation for inserting the wrong card in the security machine.

It is provocative to plan for 100,000 demonstrators and then not change those plans when the number is a few thousand instead.

No one faults all the policemen. They worked long hours and the provocations were great. At the same time they cannot be judged by the standards we apply to the rioters. As a city we are entitled to expect more restraint, judgment and commitment to law and order from the policemen than from law breakers.

History has tragically shown that the police state begins by terrorist tactics against the press. No reasonable person can doubt that television and other members of the press were calculated targets of some police officers.

What went on in the streets of Chicago—at Lincoln Park and at Grant Park—is the tragedy and shame of our city. What went on at the Amphitheatre was more subtle but no less oppressive. The number of delegates, news people, staff people for the various candidates, and observers who complained about the "pushing around" and humiliating experiences suffered at the Amphitheatre make it clear that the atmosphere was not conducive to the free discussions and movements necessary to a deliberative body.

ABNER J. MIKVA
Democratic Candidate for U.S. Congressman
2nd C. D. Chicago

Drinking Drivers

When the U.S. Department of Transportation was established in 1966, one of the stickier problems facing Lyndon Johnson was the selection of the director of the National Traffic Safety Bureau. His choice was Dr. William Haddon, Jr.

Dr. Haddon's reputation in traffic safety rested almost entirely on a report he had written which linked traffic fatalities to drinking. The drunken-driver theme has always been a favorite of the auto industry, since it focuses attention on driver irresponsibility and deflects it from the unsafe cars produced by Detroit. Clearly, then, the industry found Dr. Haddon acceptable.

This summer the traffic-safety field is experiencing a feeling of déjà vu in the wake of Dr. Haddon's latest report, a rewritten and expanded version of his earlier report. The chief message is the same: Drinking drivers are responsible for a large percentage of traffic fatalities. Again attention is focused on irresponsible drivers, and a smoke screen is thrown over unsafe cars.

Shortly after this latest report was released, Dr. Haddon went to a safety seminar at the General Motors Proving Grounds at Milford, Mich. General Motors welcomed Dr. Haddon to Milford, where members of the national press could interview him about the dangers of drinking drivers. One GM vice president, speaking of the National Traffic Safety Agency, told the automotive editor of the Boston Globe: "Haddon is the best man for the job, no matter if we have a change of administration next fall."

In his "new" report, Dr. Haddon points to the drop in British traffic fatalities and injuries since the institution there of a crackdown on drinking drivers. True, the British have had success in the first five months of the program, but it is too soon to tell whether it will hold up. Traditionally, campaigns against drinking drivers have initial success, but then everything slips back to where it was before. In addition, the stringency of the British measures—and presumably of any U.S. program which might be successful—is such as to raise questions about the violation of civil liberties.

The problem of drinking drivers is real, but it should not be so emphasized as to divert attention from the cars themselves. The auto industry should be compelled to build cars that will protect—to the maximum degree that engineering can devise—all passengers and drivers, including those who have been drinking.

THE CENSORSHIP WAR

WHAT MOSCOW FEARS

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris, August 28

As I write, it is more than a week since Soviet troops and the troops of their faithful allies—East Germany, Poland, Hungary and Bulgaria—have entered Czechoslovakia in response to a pressing and desperate appeal by "a group of members of the Central Committee of the Czech Communist party, of the Czech Government, and of the Czech National Assembly" to render urgent help, including military help, to the Czechs against the counterrevolution threatening them.

I have before me a copy of Pravda dated August 22, with its editorial called "We Are Faithful to our Brotherly Duty"; its Tass communiqué stating that the Czechs have taken the entry of the allied troops into their country calmly, and that "many Czechoslovak citizens are expressing their gratitude to these troops"; the above "appeal" by the "group"; and then sixteen columns—yes, sixteen—enumerating the reasons why it was the sacred "international duty" of Czechoslovakia's allies to "defend socialism" in that country.

Today we learn that the National Assembly of Czechoslovakia has unanimously rejected the so-called Moscow Agreements signed after four agonizing days and nights of negotiations by the Soviet and Czechoslovak delegations, the latter headed by President Svoboda. This in itself is sufficient to show that no member of the National Assembly signed the appeal which, in fact, does not bear a single signature. In short, it is on the basis of this unsigned and anonymous fabrication that the Russians and their allies invaded Czechoslovakia on August 21.

Invasions have, in the past, been based on forgeries, the most famous example being Bismarck's EMS Telegram which started the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. But for sheer cynicism and impudence and utter lack of plausibility there is nothing to equal the "reasons" given by the Russians for the invasion—not even the "reasons" given by Hitler for his countless invasions of other countries, by Nazi mouthings that "the Poles attacked us," the Russians attacked us," etc.

One thing is clear. The Kremlin leaders, or rather, those whose invasion plan was finally adopted, completely miscalculated their chances. They assumed that the Czechs would "accept" the occupation (with the same Good Soldier Schweik shrug of the shoulders) as they had "accepted" Hitler's invasion of Bohemia and Moravia in March, 1939, and that the establishment of a puppet government (if not under Novotny, then at least under some Novotnyite) would be a matter of a few hours. But the Nazi invasion of 1939 and the Russian invasion of 1968 had entirely different contexts. By 1939 Czechoslovakia had become utterly hopeless and demoralized by the Munich betrayal six months earlier, and by the consciousness that nobody would help the Czechs against Hitler. Today the Czechs know that they are not alone; that their passive resistance has not only the sympathy of the whole world; that the invasion represents a deathblow to the "world Communist movement," headed by Moscow, and that the time may not be far off when Moscow will have to think up a good excuse for pulling out of Czechoslovakia. The alternative would be an endless, ruthless occupation by the invaders, complete with massacres, a Russian-directed police terror and overcrowded prisons and concentration camps.

But the Czechs did not prove fatalistic this time, and although President Svoboda and Alexander Dubcek did not have the physical means of fighting the Russian armed forces, they knew that the overwhelming majority were absolutely hostile to the Russian invaders. The Russians, in taking their fateful decision, imagined that at least a substantial part of the country would show, if not joy, at least a relative indifference and resignation toward Russia's "brotherly help," and that a quiescent would turn up without much difficulty. There is no denying the existence of potential quislings in Czechoslovakia; in any country ambitious scoundrels can be found in such circumstances. But the reason nobody volunteered to set up a Russian puppet government lay precisely in the fact that the whole of Czechoslovak public opinion would have regarded any such government as utterly odious and unacceptable.

The Russians started by locking up Dubcek and some of the other, more "dangerous," liberal Czech leaders, and agreed to President Svoboda's offer to go to Moscow. Here one is reminded of another precedent. On March 14, 1939, Hitler summoned the senile President Hácha to Berlin where he was bullied and threatened for hours to sign away the post-Munich Czechoslovakia (or, rather, Bohemia and Moravia) as a German protectorate. If he refused, Goering's Luftwaffe would annihilate Prague that very night. This was not the threat the Russians could utter; the repercussions of an A- or H-bomb on Prague would have been too unpredictable. But they tried to bully Svoboda, accompanied as he was by some Czech "conservatives," into a far-reaching surrender. Svoboda, however, said he could not take any such responsibility unless Dubcek, head of the party, Cernik, head of the government, and Smrkovsky, speaker of the National Assembly, took part in the Moscow talks. All these had to be let out of jail and flown to Moscow.

We shall perhaps, at a future time, have the full record of the four days and nights the Czechs spent at the Kremlin in "negotiations." We might then also know more accurately how the Russian "hawks" were, and whether there were any "doves" on the Russian side. This is a question that is directly related to the next—and probably altogether inevitable—changes in the Soviet party leadership.

The very fact that the Russians had to accept Dubcek, Smrkovsky and Cernik, together with President Svoboda, as the most authorized Czech representatives is in itself a Russian setback of the greatest magnitude. The Czechs, it is true, negotiated under duress; they had to accept a "temporary" occupation of their country by Russian and "allied" troops; they had to impose a censorship on the press, radio and TV "as regards news and comments concerning the Soviet Union and other Socialist countries." By imposing the "Moscow Agreements," on Svoboda, Dubcek and the others, the Russians carried out an action very similar to Hitler's "Hácha operation."

When the Czech delegation was in Moscow, the Czechs embarked on an extraordinary act of passive resistance, while their press and radio, though hounded and hunted by the Russians, carried out one of the most spectacular morale-maintaining acts in the history of radio.

It is too early to say how many people—including children and students—were crushed to death by the Russian tanks, or shot or put in prison; perhaps far more than we know. The actual figures may not be important, but the fact that many Czechs lost their lives during the invasion is something the Czech people will never forgive or forget, and it may have the most far-reaching effect on the future relationship between Czechoslovakia and Russia.

But one must ask the determining reason for the criminal Russian invasion. I had, at the time of Cierna and Bratislava, some rather acrimonious correspondence with some friends in Russia—if I can call them that—including some old Stalinists. One of these wrote to me: "The trouble with Czechoslovakia is that the anti-Socialist forces in that country are strong; as distinct from other Socialist countries, there are no Czechoslovak émigrés to speak of; the anti-Socialist elements are still inside the country; it is also a country with a strong bourgeoisie which is hostile to us." Maybe. But what came as a shock to the Russians was that not only the bourgeoisie in Czechoslovakia but the entire nation, including the working class, is hostile to the Soviet Union and, indeed, has been so since the bullying began—that is, since the overthrow of Novotny, the Stalinist leader, last January.

Abu. The Tribune (London)

No, the existence of a bourgeoisie inside Czechoslovakia is not the real reason for the invasion. Nor is the "German menace" and the alleged Czech "collusion" with "the militarists and revanchards of Western Germany." This is one of the silliest of all the Russian arguments used. Even the fact that some Czech leaders may have seriously thought of establishing diplomatic relations with Western Germany was no reason for the invasion. Romania has had diplomatic relations with Western Germany for a long time and the Russians did nothing about it.

A month ago, in writing to Stalinists, I said: "If you send your troops into Czechoslovakia you will have finally bitched your precious international world movement." I received no answer. Yet it is only too obvious that this is now inevitable. The two biggest Communist parties of the West, the Italian and the French, are up in arms against the invasion. The Romanians and Yugoslavs made their position amply clear; and it is just possible that the triumphant visits to Prague of Tito and Ceaucescu a few days before the invasion may have been used as a final argument in favor of this invasion. Here were three Communist countries deeply resenting Moscow's bullying of Prague. And what were the real thoughts of the great majority of people in Poland and Hungary? Was not the Stalinist monolith threatening to become a loose-knit military alliance of half a dozen Socialist, but also profoundly national, "polycentrist" states? And the unkindest cut of all came from Mao who, without approving Dubcek and Svoboda, still accused the Moscow "revisionists" of "Hitlerian gangsterism"—a charge extremely difficult to deny. I am not even sure that the Russians are particularly pleased with Castro's backhanded compliments about their "aggression" which, he said, they shouldn't have tried to cover up with so many fig leaves.

The real, indeed the only, reason for the invasion of Czechoslovakia was the liberalization of the regime and (to the Russians) the unholy alliance of socialism and intellectual freedom. The timing is significant: it was essential to occupy the country before the meeting of the Czech Communist congress which was scheduled for September 9, and which would have produced a virtually all-liberal Central Committee from which the last remnants of the Stalinist-Novotnyite element would have been eliminated. And the greatest crime of the liberals, in the Russian view, was a free press, free speech, an uncensored radio and TV. This plague might have spread to Moscow!

The greatest fury and rage of the Stalinists in Moscow (and it is they who set the whole tone of the Soviet press) has been concentrated since January against the Czech press and radio. Nothing infuriated the Moscow Stalinists more than an article like the "Two Thousand Words" which was an open attack on the Stalinist type of bureaucrat—selfish, stupid, dishonest, with no standards of the most elementary human decency. Even compared with the Khrushchev regime, which had its good anti-Stalinist moments (publication of Solzhenitsyn's Ivan Denisovich or Yevushenko's devastating poem, "The Heirs of Stalin," which appeared in Pravda in October, 1962), the intellectual atmosphere of terror and oppression was worse under Brezhnev than anything seen since the blackest days of Stalinism. One has to distinguish between two things: the satisfactory economic progress of Russia in the last few years and the contentment of millions of Russians with the regime, if only because it has built up a highly impressive welfare state: there are millions of new homes, there is no serious food shortage, and Russia is not at war with anybody. So, with the growth of material comforts, millions of Russians are favorably impressed by their government. But there are other millions of intellectuals (including the relatively new class of the technical intelligentsia) who are far from happy. Significantly, it was not under Khrushchev but under Brezhnev that the intellectual oppression, starting with the Siniavsky-Daniel trial, became truly horrible. Intellectual life was dominated by a specifically Moscow bureaucracy which dreaded all signs of nonconformism, and reverted, since the fall of Khrushchev, to a neo-Stalinist mentality to which "democratic centralism" meant nothing less than the domination of all thought by Moscow. One of its biggest phobias is any kind of "intellectual polycentrism" which, as I found last year, manifested itself not only in the non-Russian parts of the Soviet Union (Georgia, Armenia, the Ukraine) but even in a city like Leningrad which, though Russian, had a long pro-Western and anti-Muscovite tradition of its own. It is this terror of independent thinking inside the Soviet Union (an independent kind of thinking which Moscow hastens to brand "bourgeois nationalism" in the case of the non-Russian areas, and, in the case of Leningrad, as "Czarist nostalgia") that would help to explain the extreme exasperation caused in Moscow by the fantastically independent way of thinking that has developed in Czechoslovakia. In their famous "Survey" of the first fifty years of the Soviet regime the Central Committee of the CPSU pays lip service to polycentrism—to every foreign Communist party's right to follow its own course, in accordance with the local national conditions—and to the sacrosanct principles of national sovereignty and noninterference in the internal affairs of other countries. We have now witnessed how all these lofty principles have been respected in the case of Czechoslovakia.

The Prague coup, more than anything the Russians have done since World War II, has made the Soviet Union hateful in the eyes of the world. Romania, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia have become violently anti-Soviet; the Italian and French Communist parties now detest Brezhnev; numerous reports show that Poland and Hungary are in a state of extreme nervousness bordering on Russophobia. The great reputation the Russians have tried for years to build up as the "number-one peace factor" in the world—as the nation helping North Vietnam in the name of "Socialist solidarity" and "in the name of peace," and who behaved with commendable restraint in the case of the Arab-Israeli War—has now been blown to the winds.

And what of the long-term effects of the invasion of Czechoslovakia? Nothing could have played more effectively into Richard Nixon's hands than the occupation of Prague. And why was this done? Primarily because of the maniacal desire on the part of the Moscow bureaucrats to silence the free Czech press. That is why I call this article "The Censorship War." Inside Russia, censorship is the pillar on which the Stalinist conformism of the Soviet Union rests. In the other Socialist countries there is also a censorship of varying severity which may be one reason why, despite much else the Russians disliked about Romania, they left that country alone (at least up until now). And when one considers it, Stalin behaved infinitely more cautiously and intelligently over Yugoslavia than Brezhnev did over Czechoslovakia. Stalin denounced Titoism as a heresy; he took economic sanctions against Yugoslavia, isolated it as a leper, but did nothing more about it. And the context of Budapest was also different; it could be argued that there was a counterrevolution there.

And now? My old "friend" Yuri Zhukov of Pravda continues, even after the Czech-Soviet agreement, to rage and fume against the "counterrevolutionary" elements in Czechoslovakia. Which in fact amounts to saying that the whole of Czechoslovakia is now counterrevolutionary, i.e., anti-Stalinist, and, thanks to Brezhnev, anti-Russian. No doubt an overthrow by the Russians of Svoboda and Dubcek is not to be ruled out; although these capitulated they cannot be regarded as Russia's friends and flunkys.

But there is one great unknown. Will not the Kremlin, or some people in the Kremlin, realize (if they haven't already done so) that the restoration of the monolithic Stalinist empire cannot be achieved in 1968? And will there not be a group of leaders who, to save the Socialist world from economic, ideological and psychological chaos, will realize that a quick withdrawal of the "allied" troops from Czechoslovakia can alone restore some degree of international order and mutual confidence? It is rumored that Kosygin and Suslov (yes, even Suslov who worries about the world Communist movement, and the great rally scheduled for next November in Moscow) were sharply against the invasion. Will not Suslov, who played the leading role in overthrowing Khrushchev in 1964, now bring about the fall of Brezhnev, the number-one villain of the Czech tragedy? The Czech people, with their "Brezhnev-Hitler" posters, seem to realize it only too well.

All reports from Prague show that the young Russian soldiers who occupied the city are extremely perplexed by the reception they got from the Czechs. They had been told that they were sent as friends to "save their allies from counterrevolution and from a West German invasion." They will have many sad stories to tell when they go home. But in a police state like the Soviet Union—getting worse in this respect every year—revolutions do not come from below; if anything is to change for the better, it will have to come from above—from a palace revolution inside the Kremlin. The best hope, I think, is for an agonizing reappraisal by the Kremlin of the entire Czech problem. This cannot happen without the elimination of certain people. My guess is that Brezhnev will go before the end of the year. But it is, unfortunately, no more than a guess.

AN OUNCE OF LEAD

GUNNING FOR SENATOR CHURCH

MICHAEL MCCREERY

Mr. McCreery has written extensively on Idaho politics, particularly for the Boise Intermountain-Observer. He is also a correspondent for the Republican magazine, The Ripon Forum.

Boise

Probably the dirtiest political fight that will be waged in the months from the conventions to the elections will be that staged by George V. Hansen, Republican Representative from the Idaho 2nd District, to capture the seat of Democratic Sen. Frank Church.

Idaho has long been a fortress of reaction, and one of the states most isolated from the movement of the nation. After the Civil War, the then Idaho territory was settled by ex-Confederates fleeing the Reconstruction in Dixie, and Idaho today is, outside the South, probably the most racist state in the nation—despite a marked absence of Negroes on whom to exercise prejudice. In addition, it is one of the last states whose economy depends almost totally on agriculture; over the years, powerful farming interests have kept a tight clasp on Idaho, shielding it from the outside world and from such things as industrialization, better wages and living conditions and urban renewal. In this climate the John Birch Society thrives; Idaho is one of the five states where Birchism is said to be the strongest. The present Republican Governor, Don Samuelson, was listed by Newsweek (January 31, 1966) as a member of the John Birch Society, when he was running for office.

Against this background, Hansen is mounting a furious campaign against Senator Church, issuing bigoted appeals to Idaho's traditional conservatism, and apparently feeling that Church's liberalism will unseat him. One issue that Hansen has raised is civil rights for minority groups. Church has been an effective supporter of civil rights legislation, and Hansen, who never voted for a civil rights bill during his four years in Congress, has been diligent to rally Idaho's racist vote.

Hansen takes to the Idaho campaign trail as a hard-line advocate of "law and order"; he has publicly called for the firm and vigorous repression of Negro demonstrations, demanded a moratorium on civil rights legislation (which he charges causes riots) and raised the implication of treason in a very wide spectrum of Negro leadership, ranging from Stokely Carmichael and Rap Brown to Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young and even the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Of Dr. King's assassination, Hansen observed that it was a case of "the chickens coming home to roost," and not the tragedy it was being made out to be. Hansen has also endorsed Chicago Mayor Daley's order to his police to "shoot to kill or maim" Negro looters. Recommending this as a step to be taken nationally to "end violence," Hansen concedes that it might result in a good many deaths but adds that a little killing now to end riots might prevent more killing later. This ounce of lead prevention was too much for the GOP majority leader, state Sen. William Roden of Boise, who called Hansen's statements "unfortunate." "I don't think he's ever seen a riot," Roden said.

Others in Idaho have been more favorably impressed by Hansen's statements. The Idaho branch of the American Independent Party, which is offering candidates for most state offices, has declined to run a candidate for Senator, and has instead endorsed Hansen. AIP state chairman Joseph K. Stumph, Jr., of Twin Falls, reports that Hansen's "strong conservatism" and his "law-and-order" policies figured in the party's decision to back him. Hansen has enthusiastically accepted the aid of the party which will run George Wallace for President in November. As well he might—Idaho is one Northern state where fear of the "nigger" is so strong that in a three-way race Wallace may well carry the electoral vote.

Another area that has figured prominently in Hansen's attack is foreign policy. Church is one of the most outspoken "doves" in the Senate, and a charter opponent of Administration policies in Vietnam. In fact, his feelings on the war are so intense that earlier in the year, before LBJ withdrew, Church indicated that he might support the Republican candidate should the GOP offer a reasonable alternative. Presenting himself as a super-hawk, Hansen deplores the "appeasement" policy of President Johnson, and ridicules the notion of peace talks. He talks of the Vietnamese conflict as part of a Moscow-based Communist conspiracy to take over the world. He wants the Administration to get tough with the Soviet Union, applying any pressures necessary. Just what pressures he would in fact favor, Hansen does not make entirely clear. However, in other comments he has at times asserted that the best way to preserve America's "honor" and achieve a quick way out of Vietnam is by military victory. Asserting the "need" to stop communism somewhere, Hansen favors a no-holds-barred policy, saying he will not rule out either nuclear warfare or an invasion of North Vietnam and China.

Following the recent Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, Hansen has further intensified his hawkishness: the Soviet action has proved to his satisfaction that communism is an evil system and can never be trusted. Following this line, Idaho Republican leaders have been quick to imply that Church's dovishness was somehow responsible for what happened to the Czechs (though Church has issued strong condemnation of the Soviet action).

In general, the Communist label has been frequently and indiscriminately used against Church ever since Hansen became the GOP candidate. The less respectable levels of the Hansen campaign have been suggesting for some time that a vote for Hansen is a vote against communism. Or, when communism is not the issue it is often "the nigger," although the more vociferous Hansen supporters seem often to equate "niggers" and "Communists." Church, on the other hand, has refused to compromise his liberalism, and so far has managed to avoid mud slinging. The Church people have, in fact, almost avoided mentioning Hansen, and have conducted a low-key, bread-and-butter-issues campaign. They apparently believe that Hansen's bluster and bigotry will win the election for Church. At the same time, the Senator is taking no chances, and has been stumping the state to demonstrate his concern for his constituents' welfare.

Present indications and polls suggest that, in the end, Church will survive the Hansen flak and gain a third Senate term. Despite the powerful grass-roots strength of Hansen's brand of conservatism, Idahoans admire courage and independence in politicians. Though a good many may intensely dislike some of the things that Church stands for, they respect his integrity and opposition to many of the policies that his own Democratic Party has followed under Johnson. A thin majority of Idaho voters have rewarded Church for his independence in two previous elections, and may do so again. However, the contest will be close and, whatever the outcome, it is apparent that Hansen's campaign has paid off for him. He will probably emerge as titular head of the Idaho Republican Party. Should Hansen manage to get as much as 46 per cent of the vote in November (and he will probably do better), he may well become in 1970 his party's candidate for governor.

The Congressional seat which Hansen is vacating this year is expected to be retained by the Republicans, and it is therefore unlikely that Hansen would try to regain his seat two years hence. However, Governor Samuelson will be up for renomination and re-election in 1970, and some GOP stalwarts already wonder whether he can hold out for another term. The Governor's bumbling style has alienated many voters. Therefore, though Samuelson is quite conservative enough for most GOP leaders, they may well scout about for an equally conservative but more impressive candidate to oppose him in a primary, rather than wait to test his popularity in the general election.

Should Hansen lose to Church this November by only a thin margin, it is expected that he will take on Samuelson in 1970, and if he does he will probably be the next governor of Idaho (a Republican nomination is usually tantamount to election in Idaho, the Democratic Church being a notable exception). Though many Republicans now think that Hansen made a mistake to go gunning for Church, the fact that he has proved himself an impressive vote getter in the past (70 per cent of the vote in his 1966 Congressional campaign) would stand in his favor should he wish to try a comeback against someone of less formidable stature than Church. Samuelson looks to be the obvious victim.

Philanthropy: The Golden Crowbar

GEORGE G. KIRSTEIN

Mr. Kirstein was publisher of The Nation from 1955 to 1965. This article has been condensed from a chapter in his forthcoming book, The Rich: Are They Different?, which Houghton Mifflin will publish on October 24.

Only the rich are in the unique position of having more money than they need or can use; thus for them, and only for them, the singular question arises as to what to do with the excess. The social institution to accommodate the rich in disposing of this surplus is organized philanthropy. The enormous number of philanthropic organizations that have burgeoned in this country to support the church, the private school or college, the voluntary hospital, the library, or the museum are exactly tailored to serve as repositories for excess individual wealth. Tax laws favor gifts to philanthropy; press acclaim and public approval greet announcements of the donations. Government-licensed philanthropic institutions, those which enjoy tax exemption, supposedly assure the rich man that his money will not be wasted. Billionaire John Paul Getty's observation is typical: "Like almost all wealthy men—certainly, all with whom I am acquainted—I make my contributions only to organized, legitimate charities. . . . This is the only way one can give money with any degree of assurance that it will be received eventually by deserving persons." This timesaving and generally applauded approach has few critics. One of the more acid was O. Henry who wrote at the turn of the century: "How properly to alleviate the troubles of the poor is one of the greatest troubles of the rich. But one thing agreed upon by all professional philanthropists is that you must never hand over any cash to your subject. The poor are notoriously temperamental; and when they get money, they exhibit a strong tendency to spend it for stuffed olives and enlarged crayon portraits instead of giving it to the installment man."

But both Mr. Getty and O. Henry are talking of another era, despite the fact that the oil man's comment was made fairly recently. Today, charity, in the ancient sense of giving alms to the poor, has been taken over by the government, and all who pay taxes share the burden. Not the rich but the government declares "war on poverty"; organized philanthropy has very little to do with alleviating the miseries of the poor. This function today is the responsibility of federal, state and municipal governments that distribute funds raised by taxation to recipients entitled to aid as a matter of right under law. Today, Medicaid and Medicare laws provide payment for the indigent from federal, state and municipal funds, and for all those, indigent or not, over the age of 65. The healthy poor wend their monotonous way to the welfare office where governmental funds are doled out. Indeed the rich benefactor looking for a charitable organization which would distribute funds to those "deserving persons" mentioned by Mr. Getty would be hard pressed to find it. Today the donor who wishes to heap largess on his favorite hospital will discover that his money is required not to maintain poor patients but to refurbish outmoded buildings or construct new facilities for the installation of scientific devices. If a cure for cancer is discovered in a beautiful new research building it is obvious that poor and rich alike are benefited. If knowledge is advanced by a new library memorializing the donor in letters carved into marble, the society as a whole is enriched.

So, win or lose against Church this year, George Hansen will probably survive to work political mischief in Idaho. But should Frank Church lose in November, not only would the forces of peace, racial equality and progressive change be deprived of one of their most effective spokesmen in the Senate; a full take-over by the extreme right wing would destroy whatever thin hope liberalism may have in Idaho.

But though continuing problems of the poor have proved to be too urgent to leave to the whims of the rich, the rich still require conduits through which to siphon off their surplus wealth, and selecting the most suitable receptacle poses a problem. Julius Rosenwald, an original partner of Sears Roebuck, once declared that he found it "nearly always easier to make $1,000,000 honestly than to dispose of it wisely," and any number of rich men have echoed his words. This type of remark may infuriate a great many people who have strived a lifetime to accumulate far less than a million dollars, but the fact remains that many rich men have pointed to their acquisition primarily as an instrument for philanthropy. Andrew Carnegie pontificated to the young graduates of a commercial college: "As an end, the acquisition of wealth is ignoble in the extreme. I assume that you save and long for wealth only as a means of enabling you the better to do some good in your day and generation."

Giving to philanthropic institutions is invariably hailed as an act of personal generosity, especially by professional fund raisers and public relations spokesmen for the institutions that receive the gift. Listen to the speeches at the dedication of a new building on the hospital grounds or college campus, with the donor in beaming attendance as he is heaped with praise for his generous gift. But here "generous" is equated with "large" rather than with any motive of the donor. If we think of the word generosity as connoting some sacrifice on the part of the giver, philanthropy, as it is organized today in America, has little if anything to do with generosity. The amount to be donated is frequently dictated by an accountant who is thoroughly familiar with the Internal Revenue Code's encouragement of charitable gifts. An unusually frank statement which might be interpreted differently from its speaker's intention is revealing: "What are you put on earth for, anyway? To be productive—for yourself until you've got everything that money can buy. After that, it belongs to humanity." The speaker—an extremely successful self-enriched man, who made this statement in connection with a donation of $6.5 million—is at least no hypocrite about his priorities.

If "generosity" is the wrong word to use and "sacrifice" a factor completely absent in philanthropic donations by the rich, it would nonetheless be a mistake to assume that decision making on their part is coldly logical and unaccompanied by emotion. In any number of utterances accompanying gifts, the rich voice the sentiment that a feeling of deep satisfaction rewards those who "do something for others rather than just for themselves." This feeling of euphoria results directly from a temporary easing of guilt rather than in any positive prognostication of the resulting joys to others. Frequently, in connection with a major gift, usually by a self-enriched man, we read that the donor considers it part payment on a debt to the United States for his success, achieved under its "free-enterprise" system. The idea of repaying society for one's own good fortune is an emotional rather than a logical reaction. The ancients expressed their gratitude to the gods following some particularly fortuitous chain of events by sacrificing some valuable animal. The fact that much of the fund raising in America is conducted along sectarian lines of church affiliation supports the theory that philanthropic impulse is stirred by religious emotion. The hope is that the gates of heaven may be forced to open by use of a golden crowbar. Neither the pangs of guilt nor the fear of damnation retard the accumulator in his pursuit of wealth, but once he has achieved his objective, he will consider placating the gods by bestowing part of his wealth on some "deserving" charity. It is significant that both the rich and the fund raisers continue to use "charity" and "philanthropy" interchangeably although the words have quite different meanings.

The self-enriched are less apt to feel guilt than the hereditary rich, but they are frequently motivated by an additional incentive—pride in their accomplishment. For this reason, the self-enriched, recalling the enormous effort of building a fortune, are far more likely to release emotional statements to the press. By highly publicized munificence they establish the clear evidence of business success and financial accomplishment. The anonymous major gift, a fairly rare phenomenon (according to one expert fund raiser, fewer than 2 per cent of all major gifts are anonymous), almost always comes from the hereditary rich. Of course, even these anonymous gifts are not truly anonymous in that the trustees, at least, of the benefited institution, know the identity of the donor. An anonymous gift simply means that newspaper publicity is avoided.

Further insight on "generosity" may be gained by examining the dissimilar motives of those who give away large sums in their lifetimes contrasted with those who provide in their wills for some philanthropic cause. In the case of the living gift a man is donating unneeded money; in the case of the bequest, he is donating an excess which obviously cannot follow him. Thus we find the childless particularly "generous" in their wills, whereas people with heirs tend to give during their lifetimes, leaving the residue to their children. Some rich men, particularly the self-enriched, live in unreasoning terror that in old age their fortunes will vanish and their standard of living be reduced to the dreaded privations of their modest beginnings. For such men, the bequest has particular appeal. In addition, there are men with such highly developed instincts for acquisition that it is emotionally impossible for them to part with any portion of their fortune. Such men, particularly if they are childless, frequently leave their money to philanthropies, often by establishing foundations whose trustees are charged with the responsibility of distribution. Russell Sage was such a man. Psychologically unable to rid himself of any substantial part of his vast fortune during his lifetime, he passed the responsibility on to his widow, who in turn formed the Russell Sage Foundation which over the years has distributed the funds wisely.

Some of the benefactions inspired by one or more of these motives are truly enormous. For example, in 1964 the following gifts topped the list:

- $10,000,000 Gift to University of Illinois by Mr. and Mrs. Herman C. Krannerts—for construction.
- $5,306,903 Gift to Princeton University by Shelby Cullum Davis—toward furtherance of study of history.
- $5,000,000 Anonymous gift to Stanford University—for undergraduate library.
- $4,000,000 Gift to Hunter College by Samuel J. Silberman—for scholarships, etc.
- $3,000,000 Gift to Smith College by Mr. and Mrs. Van Alan Clark—construction center.

In the same year, 258 gifts or bequests of $1 million or more were made by individuals for a total of $504 million. Of this sum, various educational institutions received approximately 70 per cent. In 1966, the most recent year for which data is available, the major gifts were even more imposing, although of the ten largest, six were made by bequest.

- $100,000,000 Bequest to a variety of educational institutions and hospitals by James A. Chapman.
- $90,000,000 Bequest to M.I.T., Sloan-Kettering Institute, Memorial Hospital for Cancer and Allied Diseases, Alfred P. Sloan Foundation by Alfred P. Sloan.
- $47,000,000 Gift of Paul Mellon to Yale University—art collection worth $35 million, building to house it $12 million.
- $25-50,000,000 Art collection. Gift of Joseph H. Hirshhorn to U.S. Government.
- $25,000,000 Gift of Temple Hoyne Buell to Colorado Women's College.

- $22,000,000 Art collection. Bequest to National Gallery of Art by Chester Dale.
- $14,200,000 Gift of Mrs. Florence Dailey to Georgetown University and Notre Dame University.
- $11,000,000 Gift of Harold S. Vanderbilt to Vanderbilt University.
- $10,000,000 Bequest to Billy Rose Foundation by Billy Rose.
- $10,000,000 Bequest to a variety of philanthropic organizations by Harold L. Stuart.

Huge as were the gifts in these recent years, some of the benefactions of the past were equally impressive. The Rockefeller family gave something more than $80 million to the University of Chicago; Gordon McKay, a non-alumnus, gave Harvard $16.5 million; Senator Leland Stanford's original endowment of the college which bears his name was more than $20 million; George Eastman gave $25 million to the University of Rochester; Edward S. Harkness, a Yale graduate, gave Harvard $13 million and his alma mater $24 million; John Sterling gave $39 million to Yale and C. Mahlon Kline gave the same university $10 million; Hugh Roy Cullen, over the years, gave the University of Houston some $27 million.

Before the income tax became law, large donors did not enjoy the government subsidy in the form of tax deductions that the rich are permitted today. While the government has taken over the ancient role of charity in the sense of alleviating, to some degree, the travails of the poor, it has simultaneously adopted tax legislation calculated to encourage and reward gifts of philanthropy—religious, educational and cultural. A man whose taxable income is $50,000, or a married couple whose income is twice that, can save in taxes 60c on every dollar they donate. And there are tax gimmicks, perfectly legal, which can result in types of philanthropic gifts that essentially enrich the donor. Without going into a detailed discussion of the federal tax laws, suffice it to say that they permit some men with incomes of a million dollars or more a year to pay no income taxes whatever.

Notwithstanding all of the tax advantages which the Internal Revenue Code offers the rich, this attractive bait does not loom large as a motivation for all of them. In fairness one must remember that both the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Corporation, two of the largest foundations, were established before any income tax law existed. And today, when tax benefits make giving relatively painless, they are in no sense a determining whip or even an ultimately effective carrot, for the fact is that very few of the really rich give away in any one year the entire 30 per cent of their incomes permitted under the tax laws. Huge gifts are made, but in most cases they occur in years when the donor has enjoyed a particularly successful sale of stocks or property which has appreciated greatly in value. Professional fund raisers will tell you, and the figures bear them out, that the rich as a class give nearer 15 per cent of their incomes.

The increasing popularity of the foundation as a repository for the excess wealth of the rich is indicated by the fact that during the whole 19th century only five rich men established foundations for philanthropy. Six new ones were established in the first decade of this century, twenty-two during the second decade, and forty-one in the third. The pace has so increased that in 1963 nearly 15,000 such foundations existed of which more than 13,000 were established after 1940, and roughly 1,200 new ones are created each year. In 1966, there were said to be more than 17,700 foundations with assets of approximately $15 billion, making grants of more than $1.25 billion annually.

By establishing a foundation the donor can siphon off his surplus wealth with maximum tax advantage and at the same time create the impression that his gifts become impersonal and receive studied consideration by a wise and fair board of trustees. The tax advantages granted foundations are known to accountants and lawyers; the claims for objectivity and careful consideration are less valid, for the truth is that most foundations set up by individuals are almost as completely dominated by the donor as if the money were in his own checking account. Articles describing the careful screening that applications to the Ford Foundation receive from a dedicated and highly trained staff indicate that in America's largest foundation every possible effort is made to give money where it will do the most good—at least in the minds of a majority of the trustees. Even so, one must wonder what the decision would be if Henry Ford II became intensely interested in a particular pending application. With the smaller foundation, established by an individual, often in the name of his family, one need do no guessing. The dominating figure in almost every case is the donor, the members of the board of trustees being hand-picked to agree with decisions he may make and compensated for their time by having grants made to their own pet charitable institutions. When we talk of the Ford Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, and a very few others of the largest, we are talking of impersonal and objective boards of trustees, composed of leaders in the fields of education, the arts, business or the law, supervising large staffs of investigators who make every effort to recommend grants wisely. But when we talk of the Smith Family Foundation, we are talking about the whims, caprices, or chance knowledge of old Joe Smith.

The foundation as a repository offers one more important advantage which may explain their rapidly increasing number. Just before the end of any given calendar year, an accountant can calculate almost exactly the amount that may be given away to take maximum advantage of the tax laws. The donor need not make a hurried decision as to just which worthy recipient will be showered with gold. He can make a hasty gift to the foundation, and at his leisure, in a following year, distribute the largess to its ultimate destination.

In seven cases out of ten, educational institutions, especially colleges and universities, receive the benefactions of the rich. Of the 258 gifts or bequests exceeding a million dollars in 1964, 70 per cent of the total went to educational institutions. The proportion was approximately the same in the following year. This pattern of giving is not typical of the population as a whole. Of all the money given to philanthropy in 1964, 49 per cent went to religious causes and only 17 per cent to education. Why do the large, individual donors favor the college so overwhelmingly as against the church? In the first place, the thirst of the university for money and its capacity to absorb it in terms of new buildings, research programs, scholarships, endowed professorships, athletic facilities, expensive manuscripts for the library, and works of art for the museum far exceed any program that even the most ambitious church can propose. Secondly, the very diversity of university needs presents countless opportunities for the donor's name to be inscribed for eternity as a benefactor, or at least until the ground is needed for newer or larger buildings. Stroll around the complex that constitutes Harvard University and the memorials to the rich donors are your companions. The Widener Library, the Houghton Library, Loeb Theatre, Harkness Commons, Kresge Hall, Lamont Library, Lehman Hall, Mellon Hall, Morgan Hall, Straus Hall—all these and more memorialize huge gifts made by the supporters of one of America's foremost educational institutions. Rewards for religious giving may come in heaven but praise for educational gifts is earthy and immediate.

Quite apart from the memorial in brick and mortar, the donor, if he selects a small enough college, may well be repaid by an honorary degree at the very next commencement. To the man who earned his degree at college, the honorary degree may not be a particularly meaningful gesture; but to the self-enriched man, who places an extremely high value on the formal education he never had, the honorary degree is a real stimulant to giving. Still another motivation that makes academe such a favorite is the gratitude of the alumnus to his alma mater for the joys of being an educated man. The non-graduate may feel an almost equally grateful impulse toward the educational institution which trained his children. Moreover, a major gift to a university is noncontroversial. Make a gift of an expensive painting to a museum, and some hostile critic will soon contend that the work is an unfortunate example of the artist's genius and that, in any event, it cost too much. Make a major grant to a ballet company to help meet the deficit, and all but balletomanes will cry, "Who needs ballet?" Give major support to a repertory theatre group attempting to present Shakespeare, and skeptics will carp, "if the company were any good, it would be a financial success." But a smashing donation to the college of your choice will be widely publicized, universally approved, and the general assumption held that the money will be well and carefully spent.

Although our society applauds large donations and our legislators enact tax laws encouraging the rich to give, the question arises as to whether the public interest is best served by leaving the decision of philanthropic priorities to the whim of individuals. The adult population and its duly elected representatives could conceivably rank philanthropic needs far differently than do the haphazard individual decisions of the rich. Indeed, the large gift tends to establish its own order of priorities. For example, a New England preparatory school without benefit of a major endowment fund improved over the years in the quality of education it offered and, as a result, in reputation. The school's physical needs grew in proportion to the rising list of applicants, and a succession of headmasters presented their rich alumni and their parents with a lengthening list of requirements. Major gifts for particular items carried the reward of memorializing the donor and publicizing his "generosity." Thus an early gift was the Jones Football Field, followed by the Smith Hockey Rink, followed by the Murray Dormitory for Seniors, and a new Wilt Infirmary. During all the years that the physical plant improved, the library was sadly inadequate as to the number and quality of volumes. Each succeeding headmaster was aware of this basic lack of the fundamental tools of education, but there appeared to be no donor willing to give a sizable sum merely for the acquisition of books. It would probably have been easier to raise the money for an elaborate library building than for the books themselves.

Examples of distorted priorities resulting from individual decision making by the rich are numerous. A major voluntary hospital, like all such institutions, had a schedule of improvements and enlargements designed to better its already splendid facilities. Perhaps the most urgent requirement was the modernizing of the kitchen and food-handling equipment which had remained virtually unchanged for some twenty-five years. A new building to house research laboratories was also required. A widow offered to donate the money for the laboratory building, and estimates were made of the cost. To the widow this building was to be a permanent and beautiful memorial to her husband. She insisted on the selection of one of America's finest architects and gave him carte blanche for the most magnificent research facility he could design. The resultant expenditure was probably $2 million more than an adequate but more modest building would have cost. With the difference, the kitchens and food-handling equipment could have been improved to a high level of efficiency. Not that money was wasted on the research laboratory. The building is a model of grace and beauty, and the scientists who work there will doubtless be inspired by the architect's magnificent accomplishment. But the decision to spend the money this way was made by a single person, not by the Board of Trustees or the Hospital Director or any body of experts planning maximum benefits for the hospital.

Whether major gifts are made by individuals or by foundations that they establish, one generalization is undoubtedly true: the influence of the rich in philanthropy focuses on the established institution, tends to maintain the status quo. It is rare, indeed, that major donations are made to encourage basic change or even minor dislocation of any aspect of established society. For example, a relatively small foundation might contribute funds, and one (the Vera Foundation) has, to study the effect on legal processes which would result from lowering the bail required from minor criminals. Even larger foundations might contribute to some agency such as the Legal Aid Society, which furnishes lawyers for the poor. But it is almost unthinkable that a major contribution from either a foundation or an individual would institute a program, for example, of instructing Harlem's residents in how to receive every single benefit to which they are entitled under existing city, state and federal welfare laws. Such a program would inevitably lead to greater relief payments and ultimately result in higher taxes. The more established the institution, the greater its present reputation in its special field, the more likely it is to enjoy added largess in the form of major donations. Thus Harvard, Yale and Princeton are favored for major gifts not only from their alumni but from non-graduates as well. If major philanthropy by the very rich sets itself to encourage the arts, it is likelier to encourage a major real estate development such as Lincoln Center rather than to formulate a plan for an improved procedure to aid the creative painter, poet, or writer. The Guggenheim Foundation, which has established a deserved reputation for encouraging the creative artist, is an exception, but the rare exceptions only prove the rule.

Quite apart from the inherent tendency of the rich to select the established institution with the noncontroversial program, there may be a heavy penalty in the form of lost tax exemption if either the foundation or the individual plows into virgin fields of basic social reform. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, for example, studies problems concerning the maintenance of peace, but it carefully eschews, as indeed it must if it wishes to keep its philanthropic status, any basic effort to swing government policy away from war and toward non-violence. It is philanthropically permissible to study peace and the causes of war; it is not acceptable to encourage peace through political activity or to urge the removal from public office of those who counsel war. Another more concrete example of the possible hazards of a tax-exempt institution taking a public position to influence legislation is the dilemma faced by the Sierra Club, an organization dedicated to the conservation of the country's natural resources. The Sierra Club has long participated in a campaign to save the redwood forests on the West Coast from the pillages of the lumber companies. However, when the Club actively supports legislation to turn redwood groves into federal park lands—the only effective way of guaranteeing that future generations may view these stately thousand-year-old trees—the reaction of the Internal Revenue Commissioner is to rescind the tax exemption. Indeed, while our society encourages the philanthropist to “do good,” he is restricted from doing “too much good” even if he wants to.

Money is not the only benefit that the rich bestow upon philanthropy; they give their time as well by acting as policy makers on boards of trustees. Sons of the rich are frequently selected at a relatively early age, often soon after they leave college, to serve on the boards of philanthropic institutions in the hope that, by participating in the formation of future plans, they will eventually become sufficiently interested to donate large sums to implement them. The self-enriched, of course, do not participate on this level of activity until after they have accumulated enough money to attract the attention of the alert trustees ever on the lookout for people capable of making major contributions. By serving on the board of trustees the major donor becomes familiar with the problems and needs of the institution, adds his voice to the deliberations which determine the ways in which future needs will be met, and generally becomes familiar with the various facets of activity in the general field to which the institution is devoted. If it is a hospital, the trustee will become familiar not only with the financial activities of his own institution but also well versed generally in medical economics, in the progress of various phases of medical research, and in a large variety of social problems relating directly and indirectly to the institution's general sphere. The same generalities apply to the trustees of art museums, botanical gardens, libraries, opera companies, civic symphony orchestras, secondary schools or colleges. Money raising and money giving are, of course, the primary concerns for the man who accepts a seat on the board of trustees, but his contribution is enlarged by the time and energy he donates to learning of the institution's problems and debating with his fellow trustees on the solutions.

The trustee system works surprisingly well. Most philanthropic agencies are at least as well conducted as analogous institutions administered by the government. Compare a major voluntary hospital, the Columbia Presbyterian Medical Center in New York, for example, with even the best municipal or Veterans Administration hospital, and in nearly every phase worth considering, the philanthropic institution surpasses the public facility. With some exceptions, the same comparison applies to the large private, philanthropic college and the state-run university. The explanation is, I believe, that the rich are at their best when they are devoting their time to the basic problems of the voluntary philanthropic institutions of their choice. Not only is the profit motive, which accompanies so much of their other activity, absent; but also the ever-present pangs of guilt are assuaged. As a result they are apt to display an idealism and objectivity lacking in their day-to-day business activities.

All this is not to say that philanthropy today, dominated as it is by the rich, is the most perfect system that the mind of man can devise. The dislocated priorities that result from today's practices are sufficient evidence of this. Of course, an alternative system is available and already has been substituted in the case of "charity" toward the poor. The obvious alternative would be to have the government, through the people's elected representatives, establish the priorities and furnish the funds through general tax levy for the functions now performed by philanthropy. In fact, this has already occurred in relation to the most urgent social problems. Social Security, Medicare, and all of the laws granting financial aid to the jobless, the poor, and the handicapped replace yesterday's charitable bequest. But without doubt, much of true value would be lost if the government also assumed total responsibility for encouragement of the arts, for all education, and so on. For one thing, the rich would lose the only direct approach they possess to knowledge about society's needs. In the last century, the rich were fairly knowledgeable about the poor as a result of firsthand charitable contact. They didn't do nearly enough to alleviate the conditions that fostered poverty, which is why the government was forced to assume direct responsibility. But today, the rich have no personal charitable relation with the poor, in fact precious little contact of any kind. On the other hand, a surprisingly large number of rich men are extremely well informed about hospital needs, the progress of medical research, the requirements of the great private universities and the lesser colleges, the financial problems of the private secondary schools, and many other institutions which are still within the province of philanthropy and outside that of government responsibility. In short, if the government took over the entire present philanthropic structure, the rich would be deprived of all avenues of direct interest in our society except for business and investment. Assuming that the same amount of money would be expended by the government as is at present collected and disbursed through voluntary philanthropy, there would still be a loss in that the rich would lose even what interest they now have in society's struggle to improve itself. The poor and the middle class might or might not be affected beneficially. Unquestionably, the rich would be socially impoverished.

The World's Most Harassed Fish

ANTHONY NETBOY

Mr. Netboy is assistant professor at Portland State College. His latest book is The Atlantic Salmon: A Vanishing Species?, to be published on September 17.

In a year-end report released early in 1966, Secretary of the Interior Stewart L. Udall gave Americans a picture of some of the wildlife resources of the United States. "Despite unprecedented conservation," he said, "we are still losing the overall battle to save America's endangered species of fish and wildlife from extinction." He listed seventy-eight species so threatened; one of them was the Atlantic salmon.

During all the years I lived in the East I never saw an Atlantic salmon, and neither did any of my friends or acquaintances. In fact, I never met an American who had caught one in the United States, or eaten one. Yet, in the colonial era, and as late as about 1800, salmon were as populous in New England rivers, especially in Maine and Connecticut, as they are now in the Columbia River, the Snake or the Yukon! In the year Udall made his announcement, barely 500 Atlantic salmon were caught in the United States—in a few small streams in Maine. All the other New England rivers, and those in northern New York flowing into Lake Champlain and Lake Ontario, which in the 18th century were often jammed with salmon, had been completely deserted by this noble fish. No nation has frittered away its salmon so completely.

One naturally asks how a fisheries disaster of this magnitude could occur. What social and economic forces were responsible? From the scanty records available it seems that salmon were important items in the food supply of some Indian tribes in New England and New York. Thoreau reported that in his time remains of stone weirs erected long before by the Indians were still to be seen on the Winnepesaukee, a tributary of the Merrimack. Champlain found an Indian salmon fishery when he discovered the Big Chazy River that empties into the lake named after him. It is possible that the salmon were as important to the Indian diet as the wild turkey.

The colonial fishery for salmon started up about the end of the 17th century. The fish could be bought for a penny a pound in Hartford, but the price had risen to 2c and 3c a pound by the time of the Revolution. By then salmon were being fished hard in many places, by nets which sometimes stretched across the entire width of a stream, and by weirs as well. But this threat was dwarfed by the advent of industries and growth of towns. Even as the colonial era came to a close, the practice began of damming streams to provide a water supply for a settlement or local mill, with no thought to how the fish might reach their spawning grounds.

The fate of the Connecticut River, in its pristine state probably as productive of salmon as any stream in continental United States, illustrates the process by which exploitation of natural resources and utter lack of conservation, at least until the late 19th century, deprived America of one of its major food fishes. As late as 1790, fish ascended the Connecticut to its farthest reach. At times there was such a glut of salmon that indentured apprentices protested the unvarying diet of fish, and housewives in the Connecticut Valley who went to purchase shad from the fishmonger had to take a salmon as a tie-in sale. Fishermen caught as many as 3,700 salmon in one haul in Old Saybrook's South Cove.

Then, in 1798, a corporation known as the Upper Locks and Canal Company built a 16-foot dam across the Connecticut at Hadley Falls—without a fish ladder. Later, dams were built downstream, also without fish passes. Until about 1810 many salmon made their way to the upper waters but could not reach their spawning grounds. Then they disappeared. When a solitary salmon strayed into the Connecticut in 1872, the Saybrook fishermen could not identify it.

One by one, the New England rivers became unlivable to fish, as the flow was usurped by factories which sometimes polluted the waters. In 1840 there were 1,200 cotton-spinning and weaving establishments in the United States; and two-thirds of them were in New England, often situated on salmon rivers.

The boom in lumbering in Maine and New Hampshire accelerated the murder of the salmon runs. By 1840, Maine had 1,380 sawmills, clustered mainly around tide-water, squarely in the path of upstream-moving salmon and other anadromous fish. The Penobscot, probably the richest salmon stream in the state, supported 250 such mills. As time passed, the rivers accumulated mountains of sawdust and other debris, creating sand bars and narrowing the channels, thus making fish movement difficult. State laws designed to prohibit stream pollution were ignored. Worse still, clear-cut logging—cut out and get out!—invited erosion and induced silting. Logs were flushed down the channels by splash dams, and the water and logs scoured the stream beds, removing the rubble needed for spawning beds.

But again the real destruction of the Maine salmon runs was due chiefly to dams. By 1880, only seven Maine rivers continued to support regular salmon runs; six others had them occasionally. The Penobscot held out longer than any other major stream. In 1872, about 15,000 salmon were taken in the river and the bay; between 1873 and 1890 catches dropped to an average of 12,000, and after that tobogganed, despite plantings from the salmon hatchery at East Orland, Me., the first of its kind in the United States. The basic cause of the destruction of this fine river was not so much pollution—the lumber mills largely disappeared as the white pine forests were cut out—but overfishing. In 1947, when salmon weirs were finally declared illegal in Maine, the commercial catch on the Penobscot was forty fish. Sportsmen probably caught as many as a hundred.

A similar disaster killed off the once prolific salmon runs in New York State and Vermont. It is hard to believe that salmon used to go up the Oswego River as far as Cayuga and Seneca Lakes. When I lived in the Finger Lakes region in 1937, nobody I knew had ever seen or heard of a salmon in neighboring waters. In fact, the fish had become extinct about a century earlier, thanks mainly to overfishing, land clearing and settlement.

No appreciable attempt was made to restore any of the salmon rivers of New England until World War II. A glorious opportunity was missed during the depression,

Salmon of the Atlantic (top) and Pacific

when WPA labor and Works Progress funds were available, because the people of Maine seemed to have no interest at that time in salmon. Rivers in other Eastern states were too far gone to offer hope of bringing anadromous fish back into them.

In 1948, pressure from sportsmen led to the creation in Maine of the Atlantic Sea-Run Salmon Commission. The state appropriated a niggardly $35,000, the federal government pitched in a like amount and sportsmen and power companies added their own money. The old hatchery at East Orland was remodeled, and work was begun to clean up a half-dozen watercourses and plant baby salmon in them. As a result of these improvements, chiefly on the Dennys, Machias and Narraguagus Rivers, the sports catch of salmon, which had dropped to almost nothing by World War II, has increased to 400 to 500 annually. There is virtually no salmon netting any more.

In 1965, Congress passed the Anadromous Fish Act as a move to spur salmon restoration. For the first time millions of dollars will be available to the state of Maine for this purpose, and the much-abused Penobscot has been chosen as the major focus of the biologists' efforts. Fish passes will be built derelict dams dynamited, water-improvement works installed and hatchery stock planted. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service plans to build a major salmon hatchery to replace the century-old plant at East Orland. If all goes well, an annual run of 1,200 to 3,000 fish may eventually be established in the Penobscot at a phenomenal cost—and this, says Dr. Harry Everhart, architect of the program, will permit "an angling harvest of 200 to 750 salmon annually."

The question is often asked, "Will the Atlantic salmon ever reach its former abundance in the United States?" The answer the Fish and Wildlife Service gives is, "Probably not." The reasons are that restoration of the rivers has been too little and too late, in contrast to the Pacific Coast, where the prick of conscience, sometimes termed "the conservation ethic," and the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, has saved the valuable Columbia River and other runs—or to be accurate, has at least slowed down the depletion.

What about other countries which once had fabulous Atlantic salmon stocks? There is not much left in Spain. Here too the rivers have been cluttered with small dams that have no fish passes, or are equipped with ladders that do not work. Poaching and overfishing by netters has helped to diminish the stocks. The salmon rivers of France are as scenic as those in Spain, and once they were as thronged with fish as those in the United States. The Rhine was probably the richest of them all. Men fished for salmon at strategic places on the river in Holland, Germany, France and even in Switzerland. At the bend of the Rhine, where the Lorelei is said to have lured sailors to their destruction, there is a deep pool where fishermen used to take as many as 6,000 salmon a year. The last salmon was caught on the Rhine in the 1920s. Since the river is now the longest sewer in Europe, there is no possibility of bringing the fish back.

All the great French salmon rivers are now derelict except the upper Loire, the Adour which flows into the Atlantic along the Cantabrian coast, and some of the small Breton and Norman streams. It is unlikely that the annual French catch of salmon is more than 3,000 to 5,000—there are no decent statistics, for the French Government feels it cannot infringe on the privacy of sports or commercial fishermen by requiring them to record their catches. Pollution, dam building and incredible poaching, now somewhat arrested, are the chief factors in the catastrophic destruction of the French salmon.

The Swedish and Norwegian people have been much more solicitous of the fish. Although the Swedish Baltic rivers are being increasingly blockaded with power dams, provisions are made to save the salmon, not by passing them over dams (as is done on the Columbia River) but by producing equivalent stocks in hatcheries. There are seventeen salmon hatcheries, or fish factories, as they are sometimes called, in Sweden. Millions of smolts (young fish ready to go to sea) are reared annually and sent on to the Baltic. And two or three years later those which have not been caught by fishermen, or killed by predators, return to the very river where they were released. This is an expensive way to keep the salmon runs going, but Swedish law stipulates that the private power companies or the State Power Administration must produce and liberate as many salmon as were estimated to be present in rivers they blocked with dams. The consumers of electricity pay for the fish production in their monthly bills.

Russia, Finland and Sweden contribute smolts to the Baltic sea fishery but it is estimated that one out of every four salmon caught is the product of a Swedish hatchery. By 1970, only two Swedish salmon rivers will still be free of power dams and remain natural rivers; all the others will be heavily sustained by the planting of hatchery stocks.

In contrast to the Swedes, who have fish and power, too, the Finns have preferred to kill off the bulk of their once considerable salmon resources by damming the rivers for electricity without providing fish ladders or passes. "Power development is moving at such a rapid pace," the Finnish biologist Seppo Hurme said to me, "that all of our rivers will be full of these dams in the next twenty years." Other factors that helped to deplete Finnish rivers are pollution, principally lumber floating, sewage and wastes from industrial plants; and waterway manipulation that has decreased the flow needed for fish migration. Finland has but two good salmon rivers left, the Ii and the Torne, and the latter is the boundary shared by Sweden. Hurme has been trying to interest his government in building hatcheries on the Swedish model, but, he said, "the state machinery works very slowly in handling such matters." Thus Finland takes its place beside France and Spain in preferring kilowatts to salmon.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

It is difficult to gauge the Atlantic salmon situation in Soviet Russia, because statistics are irregular and unreliable. From discussions with Swedish biologists and from study of Russian scientific papers translated into English, one gets the impression that, while the USSR is a monolithic state, the forces working for conservation have a tough time getting the attention of the counterforces that would develop rivers for power generation—exactly as in capitalist countries. Russia has a considerable Atlantic salmon population, although it is small by comparison with its Far Eastern Pacific salmon stock, and there is evidence that the resource is declining.

Norway has a much better record than either Russia or Poland (where salmon is now a rare delicacy; when my parents lived there, the fish was the peasant's staple). In fact, Norway now produces more salmon than any other European country. There are at least 200 good salmon rivers; nearly every fjord, especially in the northern part of the country, receives the flow of salmon streams.

The Norwegians will tell you that the Vikings were largely sustained on their voyages by their yen for fish, especially salmon, which was stored in the holds of their big black ships. Now Norway is most famous for salmon angling. On the River Alta, for example, it costs approximately $2,500 a week per person to fish for salmon and there are ninety-six rivers where salmon beats can be hired.

Almost all of the once-teeming salmon rivers of England and Wales, though protected by their private owners, have been ruined by pollution from industrial plants and overfishing. Many of the industrial cities of England and Wales are situated on waterways which in the 18th century were salmon anglers' paradises. Not until the 1920s did the British pass effective fishery regulations and anti-pollution laws. Although Scotland has lost much of its salmon wealth, there are still plenty of fish in the Highland streams outside the industrial belt, and Scottish salmon is for today's epicure in Europe what Rhine salmon was over a century ago, and Nova Scotia salmon is to a New Yorker who likes his lox and bagel. Lox is served in many British pubs at about a fourth of the price one pays in New York City cafeterias.

Scotland is the third largest producer of Atlantic salmon, behind Norway and Canada. Ireland is fourth, and being a relatively unindustrialized country, is actually increasing its stocks.

In the past generation or so, the nations awakened to their heedless destruction of salmon, but that is not to say that they will now make amends. There is no possibility of the salmon's return to the rivers of Portugal, Holland or Switzerland, even if there were any desire on the part of their peoples to restore them. In other countries, the United States, France and Spain, the runs have been reduced to a trickle because the nations did not care enough to save them. Even in lands where substantial stocks remain, as in Norway, Sweden, Russia, Scotland and Canada, there is no assurance of their continuation in the face of increasing industrialization. Salmon and civilization, it is said, do not mix.

Apart from the difficulties of keeping rivers pure and inviolate, the salmon's life in the sea is now threatened by the discovery of its feeding grounds in the vicinity of Greenland. There the schools from the British Isles and occasionally from Sweden meet their kin from Canada and the United States, and the Danish fishing boats and the Greenlanders' nets await them. Greenland catches have zoomed from only 60 tons in 1960 to 1,400 to 1,500 tons in 1966 and 1967. These were all foreign fish, for there is but one salmon river located in Greenland itself.

Although the salmon industry of the British Isles and Canada is up in arms because of this slaughter, and even American sportsmen who fish in Canada are seeking action, all efforts at persuading the Danes to reduce their catches in the interests of conservation have been in vain.

It is clear that while conservation of the fish in the rivers is essential to the species' survival, there must also be conservation in the sea. And this is at the moment a dream. Better fishing boats are being built, and each year the Greenland fishery, which was nonexistent a decade ago, looms as a greater menace to the stocks that made their home in Ireland, Scotland, England, Canada and Maine. Fish tagged in all these areas have been found in the nets of the Greenlanders and the Danes.

LETTERS (Continued from page 226)

compliantly enacted a county ordinance allowing this potential hazard of enormous magnitude to water-related resources.

The immediate impact and the evidently dangerous precedent of this ordinance galvanized the hitherto apathetic citizenry into spontaneous action. Overnight petitions were signed by the hundreds demanding repeal of the ordinance. Within a period of thirty days 8,000 valid signatures were required to force the supervisors either to repeal or place the issue on the ballot in November. On Aug. 27, the deadline, over 11,000 signatures were turned in. . . .

We shall hope to wipe the sardonic grin off the face of the Western Oil and Gas Association.

Theodore Schoenman

Czech workers

Great Neck, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I believe I detect the unwholesome aroma of contempt or condescension toward the working class in the article by Jiri Mucha ["The Cool Czechs," The Nation, Aug. 5]. One does not have to be a working-class sentimentalist to regard this attitude as hostile to the values of a humanist Socialist society . . . Czech workers bear no more of the blame for the maladministration of the economy than do other occupational groups . . . Nor is it abhorrent for workers to insist on economic security as the economy is radically transformed; after all, this would seem to be one of the more elementary distinctions between democratic socialism and capitalism. If the Czech intellectuals, who admittedly are spearheading the drive for reform, view themselves as superior to the workers and treat the latter as objects to be manipulated, we soon will be witness to the birth of a new type of deformed Socialist society.

Jack Minkoff

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Bear in the Poet in the Bear

BODY RAGS. By Galway Kinnell. Houghton Mifflin Co. 63 pp. $4. Paper $1.95.

JOHN LOGAN

Each generation looks about to see who the great ones are in the arts, and in our time we can single out Galway Kinnell as one of the few consummate masters in poetry. His third book, Body Rags, is uniformly strong beside What A Kingdom it Was (1960) and Flower Herding on Mount Monadnock (1964), and it takes some risks those books do not. In two of the three poems in the final section of the new book, "The Porcupine" and "The Bear," there is some of the best poetry to be found any place today while the long, civil rights-concerned poem, "The Last River," which makes up the entire second section, is one of the most pertinent and ambitious poems of the time.

The latter poem turns the situation of a jail in the deep South into a Dantesque drama and reflection of considerable complexity. One should know that Kinnell was in fact jailed for civil rights activities in Selma. Although I admire it, I do not find the poem entirely successful because the elements of formal repetition and of classical allusion sometime appear too heavy-handed. For example this:

*He comes out of the mist,
he tells me his name is Henry David,
He takes my hand and leads me over the plains of crushed asphodel.*

However, if one is going to seek an analogue to Virgil as a guide through the hell of Selma, it would be difficult to better the choice of Henry David Thoreau who, in a planned act of civil disobedience during the Mexican War, refused to pay taxes to a government he considered abstract.

"The Last River" repeats many of the images of the nineteen (mainly short) poems which constitute the first section of the book. There is a good deal of specifically religious symbolism ("Let's go I say, a big/salty wafer of spit in my mouth") and there are wings, flowers and flames employed in connection with a Roethke-like motif of opening and/or being transformed. But the longer poem, understandably in a poem of the South, lacks the snow that frequently falls in the shorter ones—sometimes in a climate a bit like that of Robert Bly:

*Soon it will be spring,
again the vanishing of the snows,
and tonight
I sit up late, mouthing
the sounds that would be words in this flimsy jew's-harp of a farmhouse.*

The farmhouse, by the way, is a real one near Sheffield, Vt., red, windy, on top of a beautiful hill at the end of an isolated, unimproved road, and it has for some years been a site of inner and outer lookings and of labors which Galway Kinnell has turned into poetry.

"The River" also contains the title motif:

*A man of noble face sits on the iron bunk,
wiping a pile of huge blades clean in the rags of his body.*

This is varied twice in the descriptions of the horrid Charon-figure in the poem: "limbs tied on with knots and rags", and once in "The Porcupine" where the title phrase "body-rags" occurs directly. The title is perhaps meant to echo the famous "aged man" passage from Yeats's "Sailing to Byzantium," possibly as prefigured by Pound (Yeats's secretary at the time) in a letter to Viola Baxter, October 24, 1907: "This body-rag thing tattered on my soul."

The two poems "The Porcupine" and "The Bear" I think the best in the book. They make up a pair on related subjects having finally to do with the poet and with poetry. There is a strong identification of the poet-speaker with the animal in each case, and the animals themselves share certain qualities—ponderousness, voraciousness and resilient, brute strength.

Kinnell details seven (highly ironic) points in which the porcupines resemble man in general and poets in particular. In his bear poem, the identification of the poet and the bear is made extraordinarily close—in the first place, through the starving speaker's subsistence on the blood-soaked turds of the bear he hunts, so that that which has passed through the bear passes also through the poet, and in the second place, through the fact that the poet cuts open the warm carcass of the bear and takes shelter there against the vicious wind and cold.

*... lumbering flatfooted over the tundra,
stabbed twice from within,
splattering a trail behind me*

He is born out of the body of the bear again, having thought in his dream that he "must rise up and dance"—and he writes his poem. But first he makes an agonized step, infantlike and bearlike as well (it is a "hairy-soled trudge"), and like the ancient mariner he wanders the rest of his days wondering "what anyway . . . was that sticky infusion, that rank flavor of blood, that poetry, by which I lived." The present poem is to be seen as the fruit of that wondering, and it is a remarkable one in its re-enactment of the existential loneliness, the sense of abandonment before the elements and the dual role of hunter and hunted under which we all live out our lives.

The image of poetry itself as a "sticky infusion" of bloody bear shit must make us reflective when we find it in the work of one of our best poets. The figure of the poet-as-bear is familiar from the work of Theodore Roethke and Delmore Schwartz. Roethke's bear, like Kinnell's, dances: "O watch his body sway! This animal remembering to be gay." Schwartz, Roethke and Kinnell are all big men, and they have projected their size into an image whose emotional dynamics all poets share to a certain extent, beginning with their disbelief in the likelihood of a creature such as melancholy, flesh-heavy man bursting into song.

The element of bearlike ponderousness or awkwardness we are familiar with in the image of the poet, for it relates to his (no doubt justified) feeling of being "out of his element" like Baudelaire's albatross on the deck of a ship.

Voraciousness is another element in this image, for the poet gluts himself with reading and experience out of which to write, and it contributes to the concept of ponderousness, particularly in those constipated times when one produces nothing. Kinnell's porcupine is voracious as the bear—and on a diverse diet as if for making poems:

*Fatted
on herbs, swollen on crabapples, puffed up on bast and phloem, ballooned
on willow flowers, poplar catkins, first leaves of aspen and larch,
the porcupine
drags and bounces his last meal
through ice,
mud, roses and goldenrod, into the stubby high fields.*

The last line reminds us of Eliot's line adapted from Mallarmé's description of poetry: "Garlic and sapphires in the mud."

The resilient strength of bear and porcupine is a quality the poet desperately needs in order to counterbalance his (killing) sensitivity and which, like them, he sometimes possesses sufficiently to survive.

But neither the bear nor the porcupine in Kinell's poems does survive. They die slow, terrible deaths, the first from the inner stabbing of a sharpened stick coiled in his food and the other from being shot three times and falling to unwind his guts from a tree limb.

Seeing the poet as imaged by the bear returns one to the image of poetry itself as the excretion of the wounded animal: "that sticky infusion, that rank flow of blood, that poetry by which I lived." The visceral connotation is not of itself arresting for again it is part of the general image of poetry which, when it is any good, comes certainly from the inner depths—and the sexual ring of "sticky infusion" is predictable and right. But there is an aura of violence (self-destructive, dying) to the visceral imagery of the poems and to the phrase "rank flavor of blood" which stops me, and I want to comment on it.

In the porcupine poem the self-pain is quite specific:

*In my time I have crouched, quills erect,
Saint
Sebastian of the sacred heart, and been beat dead with a locust club on the bare snout.*

And in the bear poem the figure of the poet's dream (himself) is "stabbed twice from within" (compare the "self-stabbing coil" of bristles reversing" in the porcupine poem) while the trail of generative blood behind the dying bear is related to the umbilical cord or life line of the producing poet. This figure of the agonized generative trail is repeated in "The Porcupine" and in the third poem which makes up this final section of the book, "Testament of a Thief." In the latter poem it takes the form of a peeworm whose path, as it is drawn out of the body "by winding him up on a matchstick/ a quarter turn ■ day for the rest of your days" creates ■ "map of my innards," that is, a poem of the interior life. In the former poem it is figured in the strung-out intestines of the shot porcupine who "paying out gut heaved/ and spartled through a hundred feet of goldenrod" before dying.

Poetry is a wandering trail of blood and bear shit. It is a peeworm wound through a hole in the buttocks or cheeks of a man. It is the tree-hooked entrails of a porcupine. The images are all repulsive and they are all figures of the slow destruction of the self. They remind specifically of George Barker's description of poetry: "I give you the image of the captive of the Gaels whose torture was to . . . unwind his intestines around a tree, for this is the poet . . . whose bowels are wound around Eden tree in coils at once agonizing and glorious. I mean each turn is a poem." Kinell writes very similarly, "I have come to myself empty, the rope/ strung out behind me/in the fall sun/suddenly glorified with all my blood."

The idea of the poet as masochist emerges. Sartre levels the accusation tellingly in Literature and Existentialism. But I would insist that poetry is not a record of self-destructive experiences. Rather, it is often a record of recovery from them. It is not the blood-soaked shit of a dying bear. Rather, it is the gold into which that stuff is turned by the magus gift of the poet. Thus the horse droppings in a poem of James Wright's "blaze into golden stones." But perhaps this is basically what Kinell means by putting his poetics inside a poem, like a hunter inside a bear which shelters and transforms him into something fecund, dreaming.

On the other hand, if the content of Kinell's bear poem does really have a masochistic bias to it, then this emphasis is (quite brilliantly and purposefully) weakened by the choice of a form in which the material is repeated from a dream inside the poem. For the meaning of the dream-within-the-dream Freud has said is often to put down the significance of the content so displayed, to say in effect "it was only a dream."

These two poems are very rich and mind-seizing and might be seen in other ways. I want finally to mention two other angles of vision: One might look at the images of porcupine gut, peeworm and bear trail simply as derivative from or extensions of the figure of the poet into something quite real (the poem). And one might look at the immersion of the hunter in the warm, colorful vitals of the bear as a figure of the contemporary poet who, withdrawn at last from libraries and from psychoanalysis (the book of himself), steep himself instead in the pied field of human experience, partly revolting, partly serene and beautiful—like the porcupine amid the mud and the goldenrod.

Plath: A Terrible Perfection

GARY KISSICK

Mr. Kissick is record reviewer for the Daily Iowan. He is a member of the Writers Workshop at the University of Iowa and is currently writing a book-length study of Sylvia Plath's poetry.

The issues of our time which preoccupy me at the moment are the incalculable genetic effects of fallout and a documentary article on the terrifying, mad, omnipotent marriage of big business and the military in America—"Juggernaut: The Warfare State," by Fred J. Cook in The Nation, October 28, 1961). Does this influence the kind of poetry I write? Yes, but in a side-long fashion. I am not gifted with the tongue of Jeremiah, though I may be sleepless enough before my vision of the apocalypse. My poems do not turn out to be about Hiroshima, but about a child forming itself finger by finger in the dark. They are not about the terrors of mass extinction, but about the bleakness of the moon over a yew tree in ■ neighboring graveyard.

The above quote from an essay by Sylvia Plath in London Magazine (1962) may well prove to be a prose key to her art, to understanding the relationship between her daily preoccupations and the preoccupations of her poetry. Fred Cook's article is a well-documented indictment of the military-industrial complex whose policies are leading us into World War III. It judges specific actions by specific people.

In her two books of poetry, The Colossus (Knopf) and Ariel (Harper & Row), Plath also indicts; but her poetry contains no national figures, no current events. It is about subjects such as "the moon over a yew tree." Here is the opening of the poem which she holds up as an example of her art's transfiguration—"The Moon and the Yew Tree."

This is the light of the mind, cold and planetary.

The trees of the mind are black.

It is to here that Plath has traced the terrors of the modern world—to the mind, where there is blackness; more specifically to her mind where the blackness is bathed in that cold piercing vision, that unrelenting perception, which proved to be her gift to art as well as the source of her own demise. (Sylvia Plath committed suicide in 1963.) There is no escape in her mind; there is no optimistic faith in good, there is only despair:

*The moon is no door. It is a face in its own right,
White as a knuckle and terribly upset.
It drags the sea after it like a dark crime; it is quiet*

THE SEARCH

But for whom do I look?
 The whole long night you will see me walk or maybe during the day watch me pass by.
 But I do not wander—
 It is a search. For I stop here, or here, wherever people gather.
 Depot, restaurant, bar.
 But whom do I seek?
 You will see me coming back perhaps at dawn. Sometimes the faces seem like tombs.
 I have tried to read the names
 so long my eyes darken in their graves of bone. (The bodies of our eyes lie side by side
 and do not touch.)
 But for whom do I look? My search is not for wife, daughter or for son for time to time
 it has taken me from them.
 Or has wrenched me from my friend:
 I will abruptly leave him,
 and I do not go home.
 For whom do I seek? Out of what fear?
 It is not for queers,
 for my search leads me from their bars.
 It is not for whores,
 since I reject their wares,
 or another time may not.
 Then for whom do I look?
 When I was young I thought
 I wanted (yearned for) older age.
 Now I think I hunt with so much rage
 that I will risk or lose family or friends for the ghost of my youth
 Thus I do not know for what I look.
 Father? Mother?
 The father who will be the mother?
 Sister who will be the brother?
 Often I hunt in the families of others—
 until hope scatters.
 I will call up friend or student at night or I will fly to see them—will bask and heal in the warm places of their homes.
 And I must not be alone
 no matter what needs be done,
 for then my search is ended.
 So now the panicked thumbs of my poem pick through the grill. They poke the lock and put out a hand and then an arm.
 The limbs of my poems
 come within your reach.
 Perhaps it is You whom I seek.

JOHN LOGAN

*With the O-gape of complete despair.
 I live here.*

*The moon is my mother. She is not sweet like Mary.
 Her blue garments unloose small bats and owls.
 How I would like to believe in tenderness—*

The positing of her mind as a moon-bathed landscape gives evidence to Charles Newman's assertion in *Tri-
 Quarterly* (1966) that Plath shared

Thoreau's microscopic vision that the structure of the self suggests the structure of the universe, that nature is an organic externality of the soul.

But Plath was disillusioned with her own soul, sometimes terrified. In her poetry she projects her inner nightmares on the world around her, as when the elm tree says to her, "How your bad dreams possess and endow me." In "Elm"

*The moon, also, is merciless; she would drag me
 Cruelly, being barren.*

in the same manner as "It drags the sea after it like a dark crime."

In "The Munich Mannequins" Plath says of the mind's cold, planetary vision—

*Perfection is terrible, it cannot have children.
 Cold as snow breath, it tamps the womb*

*Where the yew trees blow like hydras,
 The tree of life and the tree of life*

Unloosing their moons, month after month, to no purpose.

Here, Plath has made an interesting reversal. The moon is not now shining on the yew; but instead, becomes each seed cone on the tree of life. Still maintaining a superior position in the hierarchy, however, is the unrelenting and accurate vision of the mind—"Perfection," "Cold as snow breath." It is this accurate vision that makes life sterile, thereby precluding the possibility of hope. Plath goes on in this poem to equate human beings with the mannequins—due to her cold vision, humans do not really ever get beyond that blank barren stage that the mannequins represent. Whatever garments the human may don, whatever masks, her mind peels them away.

"Perfection is terrible." There is throughout Plath's work an obvious sense of real terror. It is not merely her interminable perception that is terrible in its perfect ability to sustain itself despite her demands that the visions cease.
 For Plath the entire universe is a similarly efficient machine—creating and destroying man, producing him from the intangible stuff of darkness, recalling him to it. In Plath's poetry men are neither slowly grown nor decomposed as we know them to be in nature; but they are, instead, constructed and disassembled like dolls, limb by limb, in a truly assembly-line fashion. Plath does not, instead of Hiroshima, write about an embryo growing two hands in the womb; but she writes "about a child forming itself finger by finger in the dark." In "Words for a nursery" a child's hand speaks—

*I learn, good circus Dog that I am, how
 To move, serve, steer food,
 Index the arrow,
 Thumbhead, blunt helper.
 My master's fetcher,
 Whipper of itches,
 No pocket dozer.
 I shut on the key
 of this blue-green toy.*

*Ill-served he'll be when Age manhandles me
 (A crab to nap on
 Chair arm and tables,
 Five wickless candles
 To wag at the dark)*

In "The Stones" Plath makes an assembly-line terror out of reincarnation (for if children are made of the same darkness that the dead become, there is, in a sense, reincarnation).

*The grafters are cheerful,
 Heating the pincers, hoisting the delicate hammers.
 A current agitates the wires Volt upon volt. Catgut stitches my fissures.*

*A workman walks by carrying a pink torso.
 The storerooms are full of hearts.
 This is the city of spare parts.*

*My swaddled legs and arms smell sweet as rubber.
 Here they can doctor heads, or any limb.*

On Fridays the little children come

*To trade their hooks for hands.
 Dead men leave eyes for others.
 Love is the uniform of my bald nurse.*

*Love is the bone and sinew of my curse.
 The vase, reconstructed, houses
 The elusive rose.*

*Ten fingers shape a bowl for shadows.
 My mendings itch. There is nothing to do.*

I shall be good as new.

"The Applicant" is queried

*Do you wear
 A glass eye, false teeth, or a crutch,
 A brace or a hook,
 Rubber breasts or a rubber crotch.*

Stitches to show something's missing?

and is offered a woman

Naked as paper to start

*But in twenty-five years she'll be silver,
In fifty, gold.*

A living doll, everywhere you look.

It can sew, it can cook,

It can talk, talk, talk.

In "Getting There" we have as a sight at a train stop

Legs, arms piled outside

The tent of unending cries—

A hospital of dolls.

The box car which Plath rides in "Getting There" is a last desperate hope for peace and an end to destruction. But because Plath is in a boxcar, we know her hope to be false—as false as the hope of the Jews box-carred for "resettlement." Thus, those last four lines present us with a tremendously bitter and sarcastic comment on the chances of man's history ever recording a chapter that is not replete with suffering.

When Plath plays Clytemnestra she does not merely warn of the dangers of the military-industrial complex; but she warns, instead, of the horror present when potential destruction is intricately linked with assembly-line creation. This is the case in the terribly efficient universe. That man actually aids in his own humiliation is most terrifying. That a "Nazi lampshade" ("Lady Lazarus") is made of human flesh, is a fact that should be incomprehensible; but the cold, planetary vision of Sylvia Plath's mind gives a blue illumination to the black trees of its own landscape. Plath knows man's mind to be capable rather than accidental. There are no excuses. This is from "Fever 103°":

*Radiation turned it white
And killed it in an hour.*

*Greasing the bodies of adulterers
Like Hiroshima ash and eating in.
The sin. The sin.*

Plath's insistent and true perception had told her that she, herself, was a machine-made machine.

A Line to the City

THE CITIES. By Paul Blackburn. Grove Press—Evergreen original. 157 pp. $2.95 paper.

ALLEN PLANZ

Mr. Planz's latest book of poetry is Heir to Anger (Swallow Press).

This book, the first full-sized presentation of Paul Blackburn's poems, reminded me of the things said of his work in the years it was widely published but never adequately collected. Of contemporary American poets, he has been reputed to have the best "ear," to be in the firmest control of the line break, to be the most persistently experimental younger poet in the innovative tradition advanced in our times by Pound and Williams. This book abundantly demonstrates those virtues, and more: it presents the work of a master poet. Unfortunately, many of the poems for which he is justly famed are not here—I think, for instance, of that wildly inventive "alphabet" poem that M. L. Rosenthal rescued for his anthology of British and American poetry. Blackburn literally needs lots of space, and while he has the wit and grace to snap out incisive short poems, he also has the power to sustain marvelously long constructions. The rich, multifarious music of The Cities is at once fulfillment and prelude.

Most contemporary poets, attempting to bring their craft into greater consciousness, heightened self-awareness, settle for a style which if not ruthlessly evolved can lose freshness and become mannerist. But Blackburn's forms remain open, fluid, expansive; his awareness of language—his love of it—carries a dedication that identifies it at the heart of the creative act. Each poem has its own measure, discovered by the poet's voice (which can whisper, sing, harange, yell, talk quietly or loudly—and all in one poem). "Sirventes" is an extravagant example.

And he succeeds in making you hear. Blackburn redirects one's attention to the act of reading creatively, so that one hears more, even while reading silently. His repertoire of technical devices—which another poet would invoke to combat rhetoric—are used to convey the precise reading of the poem, to orchestrate the silences within it and without, to reveal nuances and depths previously unsuspected in the most casual word. Here is "Phone Call to Rutherford" in full:

"It would be—a mercy if you did not come see me . . .

*"I have dif-fi / cultry speak-ing, I cannot count on it, I am afraid it would be too em-ba rass-ing
for me."*

—Bill, can you still answer letters?

Publicly revealed for the first time—with an explanatory introduction—
by CORLISS LAMONT

The complete
stenographic transcript of

THE TRIAL OF ELIZABETH GURLEY FLYNN BY THE AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

BERTRAND RUSSELL says:

"A fascinating and tragic case...
I commend this book in the hope that it will remind the present generation of what they owe to those such as Dr. Lamont who have fought bravely for civil liberty."

Many a conservative will lift his eyebrows in amused amazement, and many a liberal will blush for shame on reading this on-the-record account of the stormy meeting in 1940 at which the Board of Directors of the American Civil Liberties Union, by a closely split vote, expelled Miss Flynn from the Board, primarily because she was a member of the Communist Party.

Reading this book, one wonders who was really on trial: Elizabeth Gurley Flynn or the American Civil Liberties Union itself?

A salient feature of this timely book is the section compiled by Dr. Lamont (then a Board Member of ACLU and one of the participants at the trial) which presents the text of important exhibits and related documents, including ACLU's own 1939 pamphlet "Why We Defend Free Speech for Nazis, Fascists and Communists."

Beyond its historical importance, this book has special relevance today because the Civil Liberties Union has recently made mandatory new political tests for its officers and staff of the same general nature that led to the expulsion of Miss Flynn.

At your bookstore $5.95

HORIZON PRESS
156 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK, N.Y. 10010

"no . . . my hands are tongue-tied . You have . . . made

■ record in my heart.

Goodbye.

Blackburn is really concerned with, and immersed in, the vitality of language, the American language, as it is spoken, felt, and heard. Robert Frost claimed that his own greatest gift was in getting the sound of his voice in his lines. It is also Blackburn's gift. Other voices, sounds, noises, events, and even things get in too, as the organic unity of the poem directs—though, to be sure, they sometimes get in the way, when, as relief, they lower the textural intensity of the poem. The risks Blackburn runs are enormous, but worth it.

There are many masterly pieces in the book: "How To Get Up Off It," "Faces I," "Bryant Park," "Phone Call to Rutherford," "Ritual IX." Plus a lot of fun, hilarity, joking and clowning, that give this book an unusual character, the work of an original man.

In a prefatory note Blackburn tells us the book "is the construct out of my own isolations, eyes, ears, nose, and breath, my recognitions of those constructs not my own that I can live in. The Cities." The poems in this book, then, reveal an unyielding, existential engagement with the metropolis—using all the resources of language to explore what concerns the poet. Yet these recognitions do not resolve into rites of passage, or abscond to myth: rather, they expand to a vision that, for all its gentleness, its celebration of passion and youth and craft, is essentially tragic. Hence the resonance of the remarkable technical proficiency becomes finally song, eloquence, out of which the paradigm of the book becomes clear. Our cities. On this score, Blackburn is our most engaged poet.

and Eliot. Seferis says that Odysseus "speaks humbly and calmly, without effort, as though he were my father." With such words and such simplicity he is able to bridge ancient and modern worlds, and he even succeeds in getting outside the deracinated, skeptical, fragmented mentality of the great modern capitals:

*how strangely you gain strength communing with the dead
when the living who remain are no longer enough.*

*I imagine that he who'll rediscover life,
in spite of so much paper, so many emotions, so many debates and so much teaching, will be someone like us, only with a slightly tougher memory.*

If this is a key to the tone and the success of Seferis, as it is of Cavafy, there is of course much else in Seferis' achievement, in the scope of his undertaking. For one thing, the body of his work reveals an enormous landscape at once real and grotesque—sea, hills, caves beneath the sea, the battlefields of Marathon and El Alamein, the Trojan Plains, the second Coming of Christ, and in the sea off Cyprus the Second Coming of Aphrodite. In this beautiful and terrible landscape are seen the very processes of history and pre-history by which universes come into being and pass away—stones are created out of nothing and out of consciousness, and the proud consciousness of even the Sons of Odysseus turns into stone—

*I thought of playing a tune and then
I was ashamed of the other world
the one that watches me from beyond the night from within my light
woven of living bodies, naked hearts and love that belongs to the Furies as it belongs to man and to stone and to water and to grass*

*And I looked again at that body ascending;
people had gathered like ants, and they struck her with lances but didn't wound her.
Her belly now shone like the moon
And I thought the sky was the womb that bore her and now took her back, mother and child.
Her feet stayed marble still and vanished: an Assumption.*

Voices out of the stone out of sleep deeper here where the world darkens, memory of toil rooted in the rhythm beaten upon the earth by feet forgotten

But moderns who try to connect past and present generations, who establish a perspective that will justify the sig-

Seferis the Greek

COLLECTED POEMS 1924-1955. By George Seferis. Translated, edited and introduced by Edmund Keeley and Philip Sherrard. Princeton University Press. 490 pp. $10.

JOHN ARTHOS

Mr. Arthos teaches English at the University of Michigan. He is the author of Dante, Michaelangelo and Milton (Hillary) and Language of Natural Description in Eighteenth Century Poetry (Octagon), and is presently preparing a book on Greek life.

The ties that bind modern Greece to ancient are partly in the language as such, partly in what the same mountains and sea demand of the people, but chiefly in what we do not ordinarily relate to classical antiquity, the Greek church. Greek Christianity has preserved more of the ancient feeling for the pervasive divinity in the soil and sea and sky than religions in the West, but most significantly it has never diluted the idea of the majesty of God, the majesty of Christ Pantocrator being very like that which Homer ascribes to Zeus. Strangely enough it is this idea of majesty that helps foreigners establish the most confident communications with Greeks, since it is this that underlies what is the dominating characteristic of modern Greece and of antiquity alike—the cult of individuality. Each man is the important thing he is because God, in man's image, is the important thing he is. Any traveler coming to Greek shores from the Nile Valley or Mesopotamia or Israel is immediately invigorated, the first words he meets tell him he is being valued for his own sake, he is once more an individual in his own right.

It is a more profound and satisfying recognition of his desire to be taken on his own terms than even France affords. When we understand what this signifies I think we are on our way to valuing the special interest of modern Greek poetry. For all their cosmopolitanism the Greek poets never deny this quality of their being. For all of them have grown up in Paris and London and Berlin, they have caught on to positivism and existentialism and the whole spectrum of comparative studies, but as Greeks they have, perhaps uniquely, so profound a sense of individual dignity that they are continually being compelled to pass judgment upon the very modernity they are so sensitive to, to pass judgment from the certain truth that every Greek is as much on his own as Odysseus, and Oedipus and Antigone, and as jealous of his capacity to confront all change.

But here surely it is not only the tradition of Byzantine arrogance and of Orthodox majesty that sustains them, the language also does with what it brings over from the past. The word man for an American is just a word; for a Greek it is andros and anthropos, words Odysseus and Elpenor and their long lines of descendants have known. A certain intimacy with the past thus saves Seferis from as complete an alienation from history as afflicted his masters, Pound nificance they continue to attach to their own existence, as often draw despair from their reflections as hope. This is often the doubtful conclusion for Seferis. Much as he takes comfort in identifying his adventures with those of the Argonauts, or in identifying himself with Elpenor, or in imagining himself a witness of the Assumption, he is stricken by the knowledge that generation after generation races to its destiny. The constant measure of the hateful destiny is war. Poems glance at the German invasion of Crete, at exile in Alexandria and London, at fighting in the streets of the cities, and it comes down to this—the German tanks are but the descendants of the chariots on the plains of Troy with wheels bearing whirling scythes to cut down all in their way:

*those who saw down through the mist of death
or, in wild solitude beneath the stars, felt upon them the huge dark eyes
of total disaster;
and those again who prayed*

The influence of Eliot upon Seferis can hardly be exaggerated—the focus on the poet questioning himself, the turns of phrase mingling the commonplace with reminders of the heroic age, the elevation of the trivial by the mere music of conversation. Without Eliot one might wonder how he could have become a poet. And the obligations to Pound are nearly as impressive; he has been his best pupil in adopting his lucid way of forming pictures, without epithets, without expansion, simply by a certain syntactical sparseness in merely naming names—

Between two bitter moments you don't have time even to breathe between your face and your face the tender arm of a child that takes shape and vanishes.

But when one compares Eliot's and Pound's ideas of the waste of modern life with Seferis' idea of the annihilation of all promise, one sees a very different counterbalance in the Greek poet:

*I am sorry for having let a broad river pass through my fingers without drinking a single drop.
Now I'm sinking into the stone.
A small pine-tree in the red soil is all the company I have.
Whatever I love vanished with the houses
that were new last summer and collapsed in the autumn wind.*

The spirit of Greek religion, whether ancient or modern, continues its assertions more insistently than do the more nostalgic evocations of Eliot:

*So I continued along the dark path and turned into my garden and dug and buried the reed
and again I whispered: some morning
the resurrection will come, dawn's dew will glisten like trees in spring,
and sea will be born again, and the wave will again fling forth Aphrodite.
We are the seed that dies. And I entered my empty house.*

As I see it, Seferis has extended what he has brilliantly learned from the inspirations of Eliot and Pound and the surrealists into a sustained conception of a rather vaster scene of human history, asserting a more insistently individual note to the music of his speech, a firmer strength in the sound of the verse that communicates the idea of something nearly indestructible in mere individuality. He relates his idea of annihilation as the eternal preoccupation of history not merely to the tyranny of brute force but to the tyranny of the divine, and he ends by falling back upon himself, which for him means to fall back upon the Greek conception of the majesty of the individual—whether or not it is an empty house he is entering.

This edition with Greek and English on opposite pages is splendidly made.

CONSENSUS®

CONSENSUS is a game of strategy (not chance) based on the electoral college system of electing the President of the United States.

No dice, cards, spinners, or other chance devices are involved in the game.

In CONSENSUS, players compete to become the leading candidate in individual states and also to win the support of major voter interest groups, such as Catholic, Negro, Farmers, Southerners, the Military-Industrial Complex, etc.

The 14-color playing board represents actual population distributions, economic factors, regional forces, ethnic groupings, and other voter interest groups that are of importance in presidential and other elections. The statistics on which the game is based are from the latest Federal Census, and other political and historical sources. The Voter Interest Groups include White Collar, Blue Collar, Agriculture, Negro, Catholic, Foreign, Bible Belt, High Education, the Military-Industrial Complex, Oil, the Mid Midwest, Bell-Wether, Appalachia, and the South.

CONSENSUS is for 2-4 candidates

SCIENTIFIC GAMES

Box 427

Ann Arbor, Michigan 48107

Please send _____ copies of CONSENSUS at $7.95 (add 4% if Michigan resident)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP

AN ELEGY FOR THE POET
MORGAN BLUM

*Morgan the lonely,
Morgan the dead,
Has followed his only
Child into a vast Desolation.
When I heard he was going
I tried to blossom
Into the boat beside him,
But I had no money.*

*When I went in to see him,
The nurse said no.
So I snuck in behind her.
And there they were.
They were there, for a moment
Red Jacket. Robert Hayman,
H. Phelps Putnam,
And sweet Ted Roethke,
A canary and a bear.*

*They looked me over,
More or less alive.
They looked at me, more
Or less out of place.
They said, get out,
Morgan is dying.
They said, get out,
Leave him alone.*

*We have no kings
In this country,
They kept saying.*

*But we have one
Where the dead rise
On the other shore.
And they hear only
The cold owls throwing
Salt over
Their secret shoulders.*

*So I left Morgan,
And all of them alone.
And now I am so lonely
For the air I want to breathe.
Come breathe me, dark prince.
And Morgan lay there
Clean shaved like a baby
By the nurse who said no.
And so a couple
Of years ago
The old poets died
Young.*

*And now the young,
Scarlet on their wings, fly away
Over the marshes.*

JAMES WRIGHT

THE WELL-DWELLERS
(Lomas de Atzingo)

*The hawk hangs in its fathoms over the wild fig tree,
where Doña Porfiria sits in her clerestory of leaves with an apron of shade and a pasta of wool on her knees.*

*Turning the wool
on the square and her spindle of nails, she weaves skin of the sky on the nude and carnivorous colors from a ravel of threads on her lap.
A parakeet sharpens its quill on the tin of a cage.
A fig shows its flint and the ripe avocado picks its green marzipan under a nap of enamel.*

*The hawk looks the other way:
a thread in the skein leads to the gravel-pits, the tar-paper splints and the dove-cotes of Atzingo's well-dwellers, the undesperate poor
whose courts are the floor of the mines—a ceramic of pumice
when the Falls of Saint Anthony lowers its twine in the drought; or floating its coops and geraniums in midsummer mud that drops from a cut in the stone and colors the rooftops with blood.*

Doña Porfiria sleeps in the bomb-burst of figs and ripe avocados. The ball on her knees rolls away to the edge of a precipice where the barrio, caught in its deathly siesta, immobile as bone, glows on the flint of the square.

*There is red on the spikes
as the hawk strikes.*

BEN BELITT

AMERICA

I keep trying to read this book entitled America.

The author died an unknown dreamer more than a century ago, plotting the absurdities of a hero who never reaches the western shore.

*It is a story of blood and deprivation,
of disenchantment because one horizon never flowered like the memory of another.
Of waterholes watched
by laughing skulls,*

*prairies seeded with bones,
and clouds that refused to acknowledge the evening.*

*Perhaps it is not a book at all,
and I hold in my hands
a bundle of riddled pulp saved from a shipwreck.*

*But it is the only book I have,
and I go on trying to read it:
to lean back at the end,
exhausted, half-convinced that neither the author,
nor the country,
nor the hero, ever existed.*

JOHN HAINES

THE SECRET MEANING OF THINGS

A touch of old surrealism today at a stoplight in La Jolla Lotte Lehmann
 on the car radio
 singing in German 1919
 sounding like an old newsreel
 of a drowning valkyrie
 A Blue Rider appears & the light changes to tomorrow on the blue grass of Reinhard Lettau's backyard listening to Marlene Dietrich moan
 "Johnny" she sings in smokey German "Johnny when your birthday comes
 I'll be your guest all night
 Johnny I love you so much
 If you only had a birthday every day
 How about coming some afternoon at half-past four?"
 During the song I go to the phone and call my half-sister
 We have never been very close yet we have
 I make a date for lunch and the song ends
 in a Berlin cellar
 Reinhard in his Jean-Paul Sartre glasses and Véronique his Berlin chick with the deep black eye-circles and a Mao Tse Tung button go with me for lunch to a straight sea food place near the airport
 My sister orders Blue Fish and after some debate
 we get Marine Bowls looking like frozen dead aquariums of shrimp squid scallops stuck in mayonnaise they can't swim thru
 We succeed in eating them with conversations about frozen Siberia

Check Point Charley and the Berlin Hilton
 My sister's mother
 also comes up distantly
 like a beautiful white iceberg seen off the port bow closer than one had expected
 yet still unapproachable
 We skirt the subject carefully knowing that most of the story is underwater
 yet uncertain where it ends
 (She is in fact at this moment approaching us on a South Seas cruise ship, soon to dock)
 We end up at the airport where I emplane alone
 for San Francisco
 In the upper air there are no white icebergs and also no Blue Angels
 What is this place
 where no sea maid's song may reach us
 and what is the secret meaning of this poem adrift in air
 Everyday the news get more surreal
 Dark crowds still flow over London Bridge even as it is transported stone by stone to Arizona
 And every day
 a line of love's battleships is sunk
 by invisible fish
 And there are days
 when I see all too clearly
 And there are days
 when I am everyone I meet
 A cold goddess in miniskirt collects my ticket
 & adjusts my seat

LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI

IF YOU WILL

Shall I pull the curtains against the coming night?
 No, there is still a fine sun in the tree tops; let them be.
 All right; now it is darker; shall I now
 Close out the dark? You will close out the light.
 All right; how quick the dark comes. But see the moon
 Flood as it floods the earth even this room.
 Moonlight is time to sleep; shall I draw now
 Curtains against the cold? It's summer weather.
 Shall I? If you will; and light will pass
 Beyond your life that stands beyond the glass.

JOSEPHINE MILES

Public Intimacy

AFTER EXPERIENCE. By W. D. Snodgrass. Harper & Row. 92 pp. $4.95.

GALLOW SONGS. By Christian Morgenstern. Translated by W. D. Snodgrass and Lore Segal. Illustrations by Paul Klee. University of Michigan Press. 124 pp. $7.95.

JEROME MAZZARO

Mr. Mazzaro is in the English department at the State University at Buffalo. He is the author of a book of poems, Changing the Windows (Ohio University Press) and of The Poetic Themes of Robert Lowell (University of Michigan Press).

Reading the poetry of W. D. Snodgrass is a humanizing experience. Each poem enlarges the sensibility to turmoil and loveliness so that, when finished reading, one is more likely to risk intimate feelings publicly. However doomed these feelings may be in a world of hostile technology, their expression enlists the prospect of a lovelier world—assuredly for oneself, possibly for others. In the growing massive brute force of technology, that is a risk worth taking. This was the experience of Heart's Needle when it appeared in 1959; this is also the experience of After Experience and Gallows Songs, the last a translation of Christian Morgenstern in collaboration with Lore Segal. Yet the method of achieving this humanizing sense in the face of possible total cultural extinction is not by moral but by precept. One envies the universe through which Snodgrass moves, and this envy, not moralizing exhortation, prompts the emulation. In addition, this ability to work positively—to suggest emulation—separates Snodgrass from many of his contemporaries and goes far toward explaining his peculiar successes with confessional poetry.

The usual method that one encounters for gaining and preserving humanity has been to separate inner and outer selves so that while, like a Walter Mitty, an outer self conforms to the impacts of technology, the inner self rages unchecked in a secret life. That was the way of Robert Lowell in For the Union Dead, and typified the approach of a generation weaned on Batman, Superman and Captain Marvel. It was certainly the approach of Saul Bellow in Herzog and described so vividly by him in Recent American Fiction:

“Laboring to maintain himself, or perhaps an idea of himself (not always a clear idea), he feels the pressure of a vast public life, which may dwarf him as an individual while permitting him to be a giant in hatred or fantasy. In these circumstances he grieves, he complains, rages or laughs. All the while he is aware of his lack of power, his inadequacy as a moralist, the nauseous pressure of the mass media and the weight of money and organization, of cold war and racial brutalities.

But this is not the method of Snodgrass, who in “Orpheus” defined the role of the poet actively as a futile but necessary attempt at rescuing Euridyce (vision) from a world ruled “by graft or debt/Within whose mortgage all men live.” As such, he anticipated in Heart's Needle Timothy Leary's advice that if one wished to remain humane, he “tune in and drop out,” and like Leary's, his “dropping out” is a collective rather than an individual action. It results not in a tragic vision where the individual mythically confronts the Other but in a social underground of rescued rejects. This underground is rife with weirs, bars and cages, and seeks to define that “only reality which a man,” according to Snodgrass, “can ever surely know”—“that self he cannot help being.” But unlike Leary's, Snodgrass' method of tuning in has never been to acid or to pot. It has been a refusal to compromise dreams, particularly as they relate to those closest to him—his girl, his daughter, his wife, his son.

Rather than professionally based, his refusals to compromise dreams stay on a domestic plane where one's most primitive and most lasting experiences occur. To emphasize this sense, Snodgrass chooses a colloquial tone, incorporating the clichés and cadences of ordinary conversation. He also uses basically conventional stanza forms, shifting from the narrative quatrain to song forms and occasionally to free verse; but only once, in “Van Gogh: ‘The Starry Night,’” does he attempt the kind of experimentation in “field” poetry advocated by followers of William Carlos Williams.

Snodgrass is aided in his intent by his own seemingly miraculous embodiment as an individual of the age's stereotype. Contemporary experience seems to become a part of him. We know from his writings that he is a college professor writing poetry at a time when poets and poetry readers are in the colleges; he lives in suburbia, drives a Volkswagen, puts about the garden; he has an unsympathetic wife, overbearing parents, behaved children, experiences the clandestine one-night stand at a motel; and then undergoes the typical nasty divorce and psychoanalysis. In a nation of beauty contests, one of his wives has a minor beauty queen, and he has all of the fashionable interests in folk song, lutes, guitars, the Beatles, belly dancing, etc.

Nor are these faked experiences or interests. Consequently, by writing honestly of them, Snodgrass is able to touch a part of everyone. His confessional mode thus takes on a universality in its particularity—it its very detail—that Lowell's, for example, only occasionally achieves. Lowell has to stand outside himself to become part of the age; Snodgrass does not. There is, as a result, less irrelevant poetry by Snodgrass and less strain in writing, for his own urgency touches the urgency of his readers.

But this typicality hardly makes the job of writing easier; writing honestly of one's self offers more obstacles than not to good poetry. It runs the risk perpetually of leaving things unsaid and obscure or false or overstated. As Snodgrass indicates, the only hope lies in the artist's continually asking himself: “Am I writing what I really think? Not what is acceptable; not what my favorite intellectual would think in this situation; not what I wish I felt. Only what I cannot help thinking.” This honesty of self also invites a singularity of voice since the “sincere self” it projects resists the possible multiple voices of the dramatic form. Moreover, since by Snodgrass' own admission this “self” is known “through its interactions with the world around it,” there is already a taint of other-directedness present in it.

These obstacles require that Snodgrass adapt at least Rainer Maria Rilke's

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 9-16-68
221 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $18
☐ Two Years, $34
☐ 6 Months, $8

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name
Address
City
State Zip No.

advice in The Notebooks of Malte Laurids Brigge: "To write one line, a man ought to see many cities, people, and things; he must learn to know animals and the way of birds in the air, and how little flowers open in the morning. One must be able to think back . . . but it is not enough to have memories. One must be able to forget them and have vast patience until they come again . . . and when they become blood within us, and glances and gestures . . . then first it can happen that in a rare hour the first word of a verse may arise and come forth." "Heart's Needle," for example, began on the back of a program where Snodgrass had scribbled during a piano concert on November 18, 1953: "Child of my winter, born/When the new soldiers died/On the ice hills, when I was torn."

In Heart's Needle, the process of the book was one of wresting the self from money and the impingements of technology; in After Experience, it is a struggle to preserve this rescued self against new onslaughts. As "A Visitation" suggests, some of the mass guilt, which in Eichmann in Jerusalem Hannah Arendt indicates obtains to all who have killed for the benefit of bureaucratic superiors, is visited upon the speaker situated historically amidst a Vietnamese conflict. In the ghost of Adolf Eichmann, the poet sees himself doubly as the opposite and image of the mass murderer. Likewise, in "After Experience Taught Me . . ." the "futile and vain . . . ordinary/Surroundings of social life" oppose directions for killing a man when "you get caught without a knife." In "Lying Awake," through the image of a moth, Snodgrass illuminates the apathy of people to the violence about them, as his lovers learn to "take things as they are."

Thus the whole movement of the first volume is reversed. Where its poems had begun with harsh images that turned mild, the poems here begin with mild images that turn harsh, and nowhere is this alteration more evident than in the volume's five poems based on Impressionist and Post-Impressionist paintings. There "that great revolution," Snodgrass detects, "in the arts and sciences which began about 1850 and whose central aim was the dissolution of form and matter in every area (artistic, physical, intellectual, emotional, political, religious, domestic)" is embodied in the very forms of the poems "wherein a person is one with all things; that is, where all matter is dissolved." The poems conclude with "Van Gogh: The Starry Night," which, by juxtaposing poetic forms, attempts to use space as an escape from time.

Even the translations of Morgenstern, done jointly with Lore Segal, are an extension of his own reactions to a hostile technology in the personae of Palmstrom and Korf. Like Oscar Wilde's, Palmstrom's own attitude is that "Art is our spirited protest, our gallant attempt to teach Nature her proper place. . . . Life imitates art far more than Art imitates life." He is contrasted to "drop-out" Korf, who in "The Questionnaire," when sent a bureaucratic form, responds:

Death Camps of the Free World

THE LICE. By W. S. Merwin. Atheneum Publishers. 79 pp. Paper $1.95.

ROBERT HASS

Mr. Hass is a poet who teaches at the State University at Buffalo. His poetry has appeared in the anthology The New American Poets (Follett).

The best of W. S. Merwin's new poems have a strange kind of disembodied intensity, as if someone had taken a volume of smooth, knowing, confessional verse and shaken out of it real poems of fear and wonder. Merwin has been associated with those American poets who have turned to European and Latin American masters for a poetry of deep images and a will to liberate the unconscious in American poetry. Insofar as he is working in this vein, the shock of Merwin's book lies in the haunted and uncertain creature that he liberates. The reader gets, not an infusion of new life but the pale vision of a convict whose knowledge of death and the nature of authority is intimate:

New ghost is that what you are Standing on the stairs of water

No longer surprised

Hope and grief are still our wings
Why we cannot fly

What failure still keeps you
Among us the unfinished

The wheels go on praying

Merwin's procedure is often the same—lines bare and unpunctuated on the page, abrupt shifts from stanza to stanza, the suppression of any firm sense of the poem's occasion—and the effect, in the most successful poems, is a remarkable urgency of movement coupled with an odd feeling of disorientation. Without commas and periods to anchor the statements, Merwin's diction skitters with an apparent randomness and a sense of quickened fear. The last part of "The Hydra" which takes up the idea of "us the unfinished" is a good example:

A long time ago the lightning was

"My dear most high commissioner,
The undersigning herein certifies

That after a personal inspection
He has the honor to present himself
Non-existent under the Legislation
..."

In the Snodgrass-Segal translation, the poems are surrounded by a world of Dada animals and illustrations from the work of Paul Klee.

practicing
Something I thought was easy

I was young and the dead were in other

Ages
As the grass had its own language

Now I forget where the difference falls

One thing about the living sometimes a piece of us
Can stop dying for a moment
But you the dead

Once you go into those names you go on you never

Hesitate
You go on

This poem is about the fear of death, but more than that it is about Merwin's sense that life is a nameless hurtling toward the fixed identity of death—which the rudderless movement of the poem accurately conveys. The images which seem strange at first are also accurate. "The piece of us" that can stop dying for a moment is like lightning, and the fact that it seemed to be "practicing" underscores the illusory nature of any hope of final illumination. The reader supplies such connections in most of the poems and in doing so he enters the affective life of the poet.

One of Merwin's best known poems from an earlier collection, "The Drunk

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT

MUTUAL REAL ESTATE
INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: To invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing in all.

► Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram, Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
111 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

in the Furnace," describes the noises issuing from a furnace in a littered vacant lot. In a comic way it announced the existence of the unconscious life, but it seems to me now to be a suburban genre poem of the fifties which comes out on the side of nonrational life without telling us anything about it. The point of view of the poem is that of an observer and its manner is descriptive. The impressive thing about The Lice is that it tries to take us inside the drunk inside the furnace and to tell us how things feel from there. This is especially successful in the poems about politics or about authority. Robert Creeley has remarked that certain kinds of descriptive poetry tend to perpetuate the evils they describe. Merwin's poems like "Unfinished Book of Kings," "I Live Up Here" and "Caesar" have the value of describing from the inside the irrationality of the political world and the way in which authority has become a form of internal coercion. "Caesar," which is frightening but touched by a sort of gallows wit, is worth quoting in full:

*My shoes are almost dead
And as I wait at the doors of ice
I hear the cry go up for him Caesar
Caesar*

*But when I look out the windows I see only the flatlands
And the slow vanishing of the windmills
The centuries draining the deep fields*

*Yet this is still my country
The thug on duty says What would you change
He looks at his watch he lifts
Emptiness out of vases
And holds it up to examine*

*So it is evening
With the rain starting to fall forever*

*One by one he calls night out of the teeth
And at last I take up
My duty*

*Wheeling the president past banks of flowers
Past the feet of empty chairs
Hoping he's dead*

The most curious poem in the book is, perhaps, "The Last One." A narrative about an attempt to destroy a shadow which grows until it consumes the destroyers, the poem is done in a Buster Keaton mask—"Well they'd made up their minds to be everywhere because why not"—with end-stopped lines which create the effect of an idiot sequential logic, as if Faulkner's Benji were describing a horror movie:

*Well the next day started about the same it went on growing.
They pushed lights into the shadow.
Where the shadow got onto them they went out.
They began to stamp on the edge it got their feet.
And when it got their feet they fell
down.
It got into their eyes the eyes went blind.*

There is nothing very tricky about such a parable, although the shadow could be seen as guilt or the fact of death or the denied range of the instinctual life. What makes it eerie is the passivity of tone. The epigraph to the book glosses both the subject and the tone of the poem. It is taken from Heraclitus who tells how Homer was deceived by boys catching lice. They said to him, "What we have caught and what we have killed we left behind, but what has escaped we bring with us." The lice Merwin brings with him are guilt, time, death, all the things we feel and cannot know. His effort in this book is to articulate what he cannot catch, what has caught him, the parasites to which existence is a host. Speaking in the voice of a widow, he says: "Everything that does not need you is real."

Finally it should be said that, despite the successes, many poems in the book are formalistic. The technique of the best poems like "Is That What You Are" and "The Hydra" is repeated throughout, giving one the uneasy feeling that Merwin has discovered not a voice but a method. The haunted voice, when it is convincing, depends on the pressure of psychic necessity which forms a substratum for the rapid shift of images and the rush of new sentences begun without signal at midline. When that does not occur, the result is either the strain of seeing a poem willed into being, as in "It Is March," or easy magic and sentimentality, as in "Glimpses of the Ice."

In the latter poem, the trouble is simply loose, unearned association. The poet sees a moth beating against the window in a cold climate and wonders "if death will be silent after all/Or a frozen cry in another age." In another age Tennyson saw the flower in the cranny and thought of God, not much different and not much worse.

Merwin is capable of lavishly bad writing

*As the string of the great kite Sapiens Cuts our palms
Along predestined places
Leaving us
Leaving
While we find reasons*

but generally he strikes off good lines with felicity and assurance. Quoting them, one becomes aware of the extent to which wit has been an instrument of survival. He writes: "Silence the last of the liberty ships had come up the river"; "I remember my homeland the mountains of chaff"; "The night disappears like bruises though nothing is healed"; "And morning the carpet bagger arrives with news of victories."

This gift of Merwin's for surprises and the peculiar emphases his form allows ("The dead were in other/Ages") make these poems look like a different kind of breakthrough than, in fact, they represent. Without an air of instant relevance and without self-dramatization, he has written, from a peculiar depth, American poems of fear, timidity and helplessness in the face of violence and death. They are a poet's poems in the sense that saying is their justification. But in a few of them, one has the strange sense that Merwin with a new freedom has begun to write about the concentration camps of the free world.

PUBLICATIONS

OLIVER JONES by Jack Korshak

HAVE YOU A 7-9 YEAR OLD NIECE OR NEPHEW troubled by the world "integration"? Then give him or her a copy of the beautifully full-color illustrated rhymed story "OLIVER JONES" to read and show his teacher. My husband wrote it for our children. Send me $3 for postpaid shipment. (Hardcover). Full refund if you are disappointed.

BETTY KORSHAK
1123 Asbury Ave., Evanston, Ill. 60202

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound"—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists upon bargains. Hard backs too. Harco. Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

THE CIA IN ALBANIA, first printing, durable Beckett Text. $2. Available from the author: Gary Kissick, Box 334, Iowa City, Iowa 52240.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Ave., N.Y. Bin Dir Woor calls on President Johnson to immortalize and transfigure his Administration by calling together "a permanent WORLD CONGRESS, of the elected heads of all nations (for one purpose only), to seek to arbitrate or prevent all present and future wars. Readers contact President Johnson.

MY name is Richard. I write books—publish them myself and sell them for $1. Want one? Send your $1 to: Richard Liebow, 948 Market, #514, San Francisco 94102.

LITERARY SERVICES

LITERARY "handyman." Talent for humor. Will help enliven your play, speech, report. Piecework, line, paragraph, page. Box 617, c/o The Nation.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74¢ a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-4000

Crossword Puzzle No. 1263

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 See 9 down
- 6 Post on which to put the collar of a horse. (4)
- 10 In the main, release from pressure. (4, 3)
- 11 Rub the wrong way, with disputes possibly caused by dirty digs. (7)
- 12 and 27 Smooths defeat, commonly, perhaps marking the wreckage. (3, 5)
- 13 Explained how Mad Lucie gets taken out. (10)
- 15 Holmes seemed to agree to tear tattered ones down. (7)
- 16 It's plain in Greece where capital in Washington comes from. (7)
- 17 Exclusive gathering? (2-5)
- 20 City-dwellers do, but certainly not out of costume. (7)
- 22 Extreme distances. (4, 3, 3)
- 23 Dock strike? (4)
- 25 Ulysses was more likely to be a New Yorker than CIA-oriented. (7)
- 26 Automation loses out fast, it could be! See 12 across
- 28 Cast in which characters are assassinated? (10)

DOWN

- 1 Mimi? Not in this opera! (3, 8, 4)
- 2 How some might consider 28. (7)
- 3 Doubtful as to the language or the home of the brave? (4)

- 4 Envelops. (7)
- 5 Up-to-date product of Barth's factor. (7)
- 7 Dance appearing in more than one stage representation. (3-4)
- 8 But the game of the deuced player needn't continue to be so unfortunate! (15)
- 9 and 1 across When your days are numbered, this might be considered 8, by some (6, 3, 10)
- 14 One probably doesn't know if he has it. (9)
- 18 Concerning diagrams. (7)
- 19 A false step, and they'll jump on you!
- 20 Claim to be a husband in the territory of a religious leader? (7)
- 21 Not quite courageous at a party or show. (7)
- 24 Do they engage in illegal activities in dives? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1262

ACROSS: 1 Brave New World; 10 Neglect; 11 Cleamed; 12 Retention; 13 Ambit; 14 Please; 16 Windlass; 19 Disowned; 20 Shekel; 22 Local; 23 Ill-at-ease; 25 Frazzle; 26 Adamite; 27 Brassicaceous. DOWN: 2 Right; 3 Viennese Waltzes; 4 Nitwit; 5 Wagon-lit; 6 Open-and-shut case; 7 Lamp-black; 8 Undraped; 9 Adit; 15 Easy chair; 17 Silvered; 18 Beriberi; 21 Alpaca; 22 Loft; 24 Aduie.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60632.

PERSONALS

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled Pro editor-writer aids authors in revising Mss. for publication. Box 612, c/o The Nation.

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY CAMPUS: unique lecture notes. Hundreds of courses, taken directly in class by professionals from world-famous teachers. $1.34. Send for free catalog. Pybate Lecture Notes, Dept. N, 2440 Bancroft Way, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

RECONSTRUCT THE SELF through communal, experimental education. Blake College, 200 N. Jefferson, Eugene, Oregon 97402.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $2.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

The Fervent Years

Like the 1960s, the Depression was an era of awakening and struggle. Social, political and economic crises shook America. Yet the commercial theatre tried to remain aloof from the deep antagonisms cleaving our country.

The Group Theatre (1931-41) challenged the irrelevancy of Broadway and worked to heighten the social consciousness of its members and audience alike. An experimental theatre, it attempted to integrate writing, acting, producing, costumes—even living. Today's repertory theatre continues its tradition.

In The Fervent Years, Harold Clurman, originator of the Theatre, now writing for The NATION, reveals the Group's development—from its inception to its dissolution—and discusses its continuing impact. The book will be a free gift to all new subscribers to The NATION who act now.

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free Harold Clurman's The Fervent Years.

☐ I'll try you for # months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N9-16

RUSSIA'S 'PRIVATE SECTOR' MARGARET MILLER

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 23, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
SEP 23 1968
LIBRARY

ARENA OF GOLD

Europe Defies the Dollar

MICHAEL TANZER

PATCHWORK QUILT OF PROTEST

PAUL BOOTH

IS THERE AN ETHIC IN THE HOUSE?

FRANK J. DONNER

Kierkegaard's Journals PAUL ZWEIG

$-69R PL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

suing Daley's cops

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: The Illinois Division of the American Civil Liberties Union is planning to take legal action because of the unlawful activities of the Chicago police during the week of the Democratic Party's national convention. To aid its research, statements from victims of or witnesses to acts of police misconduct are desired. Statements should cover place, time, who was involved, and what was seen, heard, smelt or felt. Still photos or movie film of police misconduct are also needed. The ACLU will reimburse photographers for the cost of their prints. Write to the Roger Baldwin Foundation of ACLU, 6 South Clark Street, Chicago, Ill. 60603. Jay Miller, Executive Director

no surprise

Van Nuys, Calif.

DEAR SIR: The news media almost unanimously—the commentators, the columnists, the reporters, the editorialists, the cartoonists, the executives, the labor unions and the professional fraternities—have registered shock and indignation at the police-state brutality, police-state intransigence and police-state authoritarianism of the Chicago forces of "law and order." . . .

The national news media should not have been so surprised. This is exactly what happened in Oakland (Calif.) a few months back. In both places the existence of police brutality and police-state methods were brought into the citizens' living rooms via TV. This puts the forces of "law and order" in a bad light. After the Oakland case, L.A. Chief of Police Tom Reddin and his alter ego, District Attorney Evelle Younger, attacked the press (as "inciting to riot") for doing its job—in this case, exposing police brutality.

Chicago Mayor Richard Daley said his police use "no more force than necessary." TV viewers the country over know otherwise. In Los Angeles on the same day Chief Reddin said the same thing about his police. Ghetto dwellers and Century Plaza demonstrators know otherwise. . . .

Nita Narr

Penta-go-round

Northridge, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Charles Rabb's "Military 'Software'" (The Nation, July 22) overlooked an even more expensive aspect of Pentagon-sponsored research—the duplication of studies. Since reports on many of the projects sponsored by the different branches of the Defense establishment are either classified or distributed in restricted quantities, and are only occasionally published in scholarly journals, there is a great deal of wasteful overlap.

Several years ago when I was a participant in a Navy-sponsored project, I was put in contact with many people engaged in Defense studies, most of which were classified. Recently I attended a seminar (Defense Department-sponsored) and found studies of almost exactly the same type being commissioned by another branch of the armed forces and even by the Navy itself. Apparently all the earlier studies had been buried beneath the mountains of red tape or the sponsors were unhappy with the previous conclusions.

At any rate, almost none of the present researchers were aware that much of what they were doing had been done before by others on sponsored projects. As a result I have the feeling of being on a merry-go-round in which the same things are researched over and over, but the results are

(Continued on page 277)

EDITORIALS

Warm-Up

The nominees were warming up last week, with trial runs, issue- and technique-testing, saluting the flag, doing obeisance to the American Legion and B'nai B'rith, and so on through all the maneuvers of the quadrennial political circus. By and large, all three ran true to form.

HUMPHREY: Off to a well-nigh disastrous start. The Philadelphia effort was a disappointment by any test. Once again Hubert demonstrated his penchant for "instant sincerity," for trying to please any group he happens to be addressing; once again he demonstrated his utter faith in the efficacy of a quick "I love you," turned on like a spigot. He apparently fails to realize that such high-pressure amiability does not suffice to win over people in a campaign as rancorous as this one, and that he has so overused it as to make himself ridiculous.

His offer in Philadelphia to lay down his life for peace in Vietnam was vintage Humphrey and completely absurd; if peace is so precious to him, why didn't he lay down his life (if only politically) by opposing the escalation of the war? He followed this up with the equally amazing statement that he could have accepted, "with some elaboration," the minority plank on Vietnam. By the time he reached Los Angeles, he had second thoughts, perhaps remembering the ogre in the White House, and backtracked sufficiently to confuse the reporters about his real position—if a candidate so mercurial could be said to have one. His talk of a possible troop pull-out late in 1968 or some time in 1969 was promptly knocked down by Rusk and the following day by the President himself, who ended a bellicose speech before the Legion by expressing everybody's yearning for the day when the men will come home, but "no man can predict when that day will come. . . ." Of course, we have a lot of clerks, laundrymen, pastry cooks, engineers' building officers' clubs, and so on who could be spared right now without affecting the war, but Humphrey's talk about a serious reduction in combat forces boils down to off-the-cuff demagoguery.

All in all, a bleak week in the aftermath of the disaster in Chicago.

NIXON: He came on strong and bland. To be bland in politics is to look like a winner and take none of the chances that might make one a loser. Tanned, relaxed, smiling, he appeared in the mask of the Statesman, leaving the hatchet work to his running mate Agnew. Everywhere he went, he had Sen. Edward W. Brooke in tow, to make it appear that he, Nixon, was the black man's friend. True, Senator Brooke was reported to be dismayed by the candidate's emphasis on law and order and thinly veiled criticism of the Supreme Court, but his dismay did not approach disaffection.

The differentiation of function between Agnew and Nixon became clear. Whatever votes can be diverted from Wallace by redbaiting and the other dirty political tricks of which Nixon is a past master, Agnew will now strive to attract. At least for the present, Nixon is above such chicanery.

Agnew's redbaiting covers the full spectrum, from the kids who demonstrated at Chicago to Humphrey himself. Humphrey, he said in Washington on September 10, has been "soft on inflation, soft on communism, and soft on law and order over the years." Such is the reward of the man who, as a Senator, was largely responsible for the Communist Control Act and who can justly claim to be one of the stoutest and most persevering "anti-Communists" of the century. Agnew has not yet learned that in national politics rabbit-punching is a delicate art, and he was promptly rebuked by those Republican pros, Senator Dirksen and Representative Ford. The incident gave Humphrey a chance to show some mettle by challenging Nixon's advice that the Senate should punish Russia's Czech aggression by delaying approval of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

For Nixon it was a rather auspicious beginning, though hardly striking. The crowds, if big, were not enthralled. In Santa Clara they were "not worked up," in Chicago they were "more curious than enthusiastic." Nixon is said to be beefing up the end of his basic speech so as to overcome the fatigue induced in even the most fervid followers by his long exposure to the public gaze.

WALLACE: He has, of course, the easiest course to run, since he appeals to a particular constituency, narrower and more precisely definable than his opponents'. Essentially all he has to do is come on loud and clear, lambasting Reds, eggheads and crime in the streets. He obviously has the "cop vote," the Birchites and most of the near-Birchites, as well as the disaffected of the Right generally. The fact that the Hon. Happy Chandler would not go along with him is further proof, if any were needed, that Wallace is indeed the racist everyone has always known him to be. His appearance at the stock car race in Darlington, S.C.—just the right audience for him—had considerable symbolic importance. He yelled about sending certain politicians "to the pit," and carried on his baleful talk about the "overeducated, ivory-tower folks with pointed heads looking down their noses at you and me."

For Wallace it was not the opening week; he has been saying the same thing for weeks. He may peak soon and begin to drop, as some, including Nixon, expect. At present, however, he is in second place in electoral votes, behind Nixon but ahead of Humphrey.

The Forgotten?

It is a relief—for the moment—to be told precisely who will decide the 1968 election. Richard M. Scammon, former Director of the Bureau of the Census, has performed this task for us. The great mass of voters this year—voters, those who will actually vote, not those eligible to vote—will be in Scammon's phrase "unyoung, unpoor and unblack." He pinpoints it even further: this all-American voter, '68 style, will be in his early or middle 40s, white, earning from $9,000 to $11,000 a year, perhaps a shoe salesman or someone on that vocational level, living in the suburbs in a home costing perhaps $16,000, or a good deal more in some neighborhoods.

Nixon and Humphrey and, coming down a peg or two,

IN THIS ISSUE

September 23, 1968

EDITORIALS

258

ARTICLES

262 Managers and Customers:
Russia's "Private" Sector

Margaret Miller

264 Patchwork Quilt of Protest

Paul Booth

266 Rebel Caucus:
Political Science Discovers Politics

David K. J. Morris

268 Arena of Gold:
Europe Defies the Dollar

Michael Tanzer

273 Politics Tomorrow:
The New Coalitions

William L. Abbott

BOOKS & THE ARTS

278 Is There an Ethic
in the House?

Frank J. Donner

280 The Ventriloquist (poem)

Robert Huff

282 Day-Glo & Light Nights

Joel Lieber

283 A Genius for Unsavoriness

Paul Zweig

286 Book Marks

Sara Blackburn

287 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KIRBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ASHLE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y., and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 9

Wallace, have read, assimilated and accepted this thesis of the common denominator—low, though not the lowest. Nixon has given it the typical Nixon treatment. His campaign is addressed to the “forgotten” Americans, those splendid, generous, supremely virtuous, God-fearing, honest, aspiring, patriotic citizens, who feel terribly put upon by all the evils which afflict their society but for which, by their reckoning, they are in no slightest degree responsible. They are not shouters, demonstrators, protesters, racists (although school busing does enrage them). They are not “sick” or criminally inclined (no mention of white-collar crime). In his shining self-image, polished to a higher gloss by the praise of the candidates, this Forgotten American, with his wholly decent instincts, wants only to go about his business and by honest toil to support his family, pay the monthly interest and principal on his mortgage, and buy a color TV set. He wants his children to be as good as he is and in one respect even better—they should earn more money. He is beginning to be impatient with all the turmoil which, without any cause that he can see, is tearing the country apart. He wants only to be “left alone,” especially by the federal government. What unites all these good Joes is a sense of decency as they construe it, a sense of continuity, and the conviction that the best country in the world must stay the way it is. That is what good old Dick, himself elevated from this very stratum, is going to give them. He says.

Humphrey makes essentially the same assumption and will pitch his appeal to the same group—the big Middle Sector, expanded by twenty years of cold-war prosperity. This Nixon-Humphrey duet is what makes it difficult for any real differences on the issues to emerge. And Wallace, down there, adheres to the same strategy.

In an editorial manfully titled “What the Campaign Issues Are,” Business Week (September 7) starts to explain but quickly runs out of gas. There do not seem to be any salient differences: both parties have “an essential similarity of approach.” Business Week, accepting what it calls “the centrist tradition” in American politics, fears that Wallace will upset that tradition, but it does not despair: “There is still enough glue left in U.S. society to leave hope that the broad centrist tradition . . . can be preserved.” In this quietist view, the threat to the social fabric is not real. In other times and in other countries, a gap between aspiration and accomplishment, which in the view of Business Week is what afflicts us, “has been the stuff of revolution.” But not here, it prays God.

How Cohesive Is the Center?

In our view, Business Week, and others who see the current political scene from the same angle, have strayed from reality. A “centrist tradition” must be based on a broad, legitimate center whose elements are bound together by values held in common. But how broad and how consensual is the center to which Scammon, et al., refer? We think it is neither as broad as they imagine, nor as monolithic. [See “The New Coalitions” by William L. Abbott, page 273.]

First of all, there is the difference which the polls have shown for some years in attitude and outlook between the younger, better educated, more sophisticated, salaried upper middle class and the older, less educated, less open-minded middle class. The polls have shown a sharp divergence on a variety of issues between these elements, on civil rights, civil liberties, foreign policy, etc.

Second, a parallel divergence involves what Joseph Kraft calls the “genteel suburbs”—upper middle class, white, sophisticated, ready (up to a point) for change, and able to tolerate the idea of change because they feel relatively secure in terms of status and income. Opposed to this group are the industrial suburbs of the lower income, more recently arrived lower middle class, less secure (in status terms) and often with no more than a blue-collar education (through high school at the most). Often these latter suburbs are inhabited by groups with a common “ethnic” and religious background.

The “genteel suburbs” provide most of the young radicals and activists, detested by the blue-collar suburbs. The first group contains many “swingers”; the second almost none. The London Times Literary Supplement (August 29) said that “the whole American bourgeoisie wishes to join the avant-garde.” This is inaccurate: only the upper-income section does, and not all of that. The first type of suburb provides strong support for politicians of the type of McCarthy, Rockefeller, Percy, Hatfield, Lindsay; the second does not. The truth is that a kind of cultural civil war is being waged between these two sections of what we once called the middle class. Or, as Kraft puts it, there is “antagonism between the rising middle class of upper-income whites and the archaic middle class of lower-income whites. . . .” The first type feels excluded because none of the candidates appeals to them, they are not in their style, not in their idiom, not on their wave length, and so these dissidents may abstain from voting in large numbers this time.

Similarly, we have no means of measuring the changes in consciousness which have occurred and are occurring. There is a totally new awareness in many of the young—and not in the young alone. This is what Eugene McCarthy was getting at when he spoke about “new national constituencies of conscience.” The parties appear to be unaware of such changes and are trying to pretend that nothing much has happened; but, like it or not, a great deal has happened.

At the same time a new under-class, in Gunnar Myrdal’s term, has formed at the base of society. It is composed of rural poor whites and of ghetto blacks, disaffected, disenchanting, some not likely to participate in the election at all, others only at half-strength. These groups find themselves in a compressed stratum beneath the massive lower middle class, which resents the efforts of the under-class to make it in its turn. In times past a minority group at the bottom could work upward, not easily, to be sure, but at least not against the weight of such an enlarged and obdurately resistant middle class.

So, if one tots up the number of Americans who, for many reasons, feel outside the political process, it is arguable that the centrist tradition, so called, may be declining center. In that case the danger is not that the centrist tradition will be upset but that it is no longer representative—it excludes too many. Stability is threatened precisely because broad segments feel themselves "outside" the system. How serious that threat is we shall discover only gradually, after Nixon or Humphrey takes the helm and tries to navigate by a compass that on these premises has lost its magnetism.

The Difference

According to the rules of "blame theory"—the moral equivalent of the games beloved of the think tanks—the Russians are to be condemned for their August invasion of Czechoslovakia, but their arcing of a MIRV missile (if that's what it was) from Tyuratam to the Kamchatka in the same month is only to be deplored. In the former case they deliberately savaged a friendly neighbor and thus exacerbated international suspicions the world over; in the latter, they did no more than zig to our zag on the escalator to Armageddon.

Of course, the two events are related, as are all events in this computer-sensitive world (you cannot have a riot in Kansas City these days without affecting the political balance of Outer Mongolia). Because tanks rolled in Prague, Congress will no doubt drag its heels in the matter of the nuclear nonproliferation treaty; because party leader Dubcek was taken to Moscow in handcuffs, the summit meeting on limitation of anti-ballistic missile systems is indefinitely delayed. The August aggression was "conventional," but nuclear pressure mounts.

It might be said that the Russo-American missile race has now entered the area of superstition or nationalistic ostentation (like the excessive deployment of skulls and thigh bones in tribal display), since both nations have long since passed the point where either could attack the other with nuclear weapons and expect to survive until sundown. Does it matter how many Minutemen we have? We have more than enough. Does it matter how big the Soviet rockets are? They will reach twice as far as Pittsburgh. Does it matter (except to the hardware merchants) whether we build a thin defense against China or a thick defense against Russia? Both will filter, but neither can stop, the rain of final annihilation.

Yes, it does matter. The proliferation of nuclear threat strains ever more agonizingly the accommodations which allow nations to tolerate one another. The burden of knowing what is aimed at you, the frustration of having each of your new ingenious umbrellas made obsolete, the exhaustion of holding the finger ever tense on the trigger is more than flesh can bear. Somebody will eventually crack.

The break will not necessarily come in nuclear form—man does not die by the atom alone. Without for an instant mitigating it, the assault on Czechoslovakia can also be seen as part of the missile tension. But though everything pulls on everything else, the next step up seems always to take a nuclear form. The one impending is the MIRV (the Multiple Independently Targeted Re-Entry Vehicle) vs. the ABM (anti-ballistic-missile system). It will cost billions, it will be a stand-off, it will increase the awful itch to end the waiting.

If we cannot talk with the Russians today because of Prague (and because God alone knows what squabbles are currently wracking the Kremlin), we should be calculating when is the first date on which we may hope to talk. Nuclear escalation has passed out of the realm of military logic into that of Doomsday symbolism, and de-escalation would be similarly symbolic, since neither side is going to bare its chest to the other. It would, however, be a symbol of life, not death. That makes the difference.

The Bird

Hope never dies in the Saigon officers' clubs—there must, there just must, be some magic way to win this war. The latest potion is something called by the Yanks Phoenix and by the Vietnamese (we hope with no tinge of irony) Phung Hoang or All-Seeing Bird. It is an intelligence/extermination program designed to locate and eliminate members of the Vietcong infrastructure (VCI), the political and administrative leadership of the fighting enemy. (It was described in a story by Peter R. Kann in The Wall Street Journal, September 5.)

Somewhere in the Mekong Delta a funeral has been planned for a senior Vietcong official. During the ceremonies, a "counter-terror" team of mixed U.S. and Vietnamese killers sweeps in and executes the mourners. By such methods, some 6,000 VCI have been captured or killed since the offensive of last February. The infrastructure is thought to number about 80,000, so the rate of elimination—if indeed important VCI are really being eliminated—is not yet decisive. As one American on the scene has observed, it's like "trying to root the Republican Party out of Kansas."

Partly for this reason and partly because the several intelligence agencies of the Vietnamese government and the military profoundly distrust one another, the All-Seeing Bird hasn't attracted much support from the locals. This bothers the Americans, because they have great difficulty in telling a VCI from a schoolteacher or rice harvester, and also because it is hoped that Phoenix will continue its job of digging out the Vietcong nest when the great day dawns and we all come home.

Meanwhile, we coordinate the snooping and organize the kidnapping and killing. Bombing hasn't worked, napalm hasn't worked, pacification has become a mockery, and the prognostications of our military leaders have been singularly far from the mark. But we must press on to something that can be made to look like a victory of might and morality, so we now sneak in with a quick twist of the knife.

When the military mind is cornered, it resorts to bizarre expedients: under such circumstances Hitler launched the buzz-bomb; we unleash the assassins.

Viewing the Remains

It is a natural impulse for some, and a duty for others, to take a last look after the mortician has exercised his art. This used to be a formal, lugubrious occasion. Both the dead and the living were dressed in their best, and the latter gazed on the former, perhaps with tears. It also took time from a busy life. One had to drive to the funeral

"parlor," park the car, perhaps walk a few blocks to make the inspection and remark how natural he or she looked, or deliver some other appropriate observation.

All this is changed for the better. You can now view the remains at a drive-in mortuary, the same as cashing a check or eating a cheeseburger, without getting out of your car.

The Roanoke (Va.), World-News credits this innovation to an Atlanta, Ga., mortician by the name of Hirschel Thornton. The idea came to him one night in a flash of genius, and he is now building five windows, each over 6 feet long, in an extension of his funeral home located off a busy street. Each window will contain a body in a coffin, with a name plate, wall-to-wall carpeting, and drapes, no doubt in decorator colors. "The deceased," the inventor explains, "will be lying in a lighted window, sort of tilted toward the front so they can conveniently be seen." Thus you may view not only your own departed but four others, comparing both the corpses and the coffins. You may come by at any hour of the day or night, dressed as you came from work or on your way to a cocktail party.

"The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away . . ."; but the ingenuity of man passeth all understanding.

MANAGERS AND CUSTOMERS

RUSSIA'S 'PRIVATE' SECTOR

MARGARET MILLER

Miss Miller is the author of Communist Economy Under Change (Andre Deutsch) and Rise of the Russian Consumer (Institute of Economic Affairs, London).

This year is crucial for Russia's economic reforms. Already 40 per cent of its industrial production comes from factories operating on the new system based on profit and material incentives, and the remainder are scheduled to switch over before 1969. Among the many obstacles being encountered in this tremendous changeover, the most important is the continuing shortage of consumer goods. It is no use giving workers more money for better work if they cannot find commodities on which to spend their additional rewards. If incentive fails, the hoped-for benefits of the managerial reforms will not be realized. It is increasingly being urged that only the restoration of the market principle and the recognition of the value of small-scale production will provide an effective answer.

Before the revolution, the work of individual craftsmen and small cottage industries gave the then overwhelmingly agricultural population practically all the manufactured articles it required for domestic and production needs. In the important woodworking industry, for example, more than ten times as many workers were thus employed than in the large state-directed industry. The range of goods produced by private enterprise was enormous, and varied according to the raw material found in different localities: wood, stone, clay, bones, textiles, etc. Many of these rural crafts were of high artistic merit and achieved international recognition.

Stalin's policy of forced industrialization and forced collectivization of agriculture disrupted this situation after 1928, and it was not until the 23rd Congress of the Communist Party met in the spring of 1966 that the state once more recognized the continuing value of small-scale industry in the economy, and gave instructions for its restoration, the main goal being an increased flow of consumer goods.

An article in Voprosy Ekonomiki early in 1967 took a close look at this aspect of Stalinism. The writer compared the average size of industrial undertakings in the USSR with that in other advanced industrial countries. On the face of it, differences were immense. The number of employees per factory was, for example, twelve times higher in Russia than in the United States. In machine building and metal working the average size of Russian plants was thirty-five times larger than their American equivalents; it was almost twenty times larger in the garment, footwear and fur industries. Small factories, those employing up to fifty workers, made up only 15 per cent of the industrial undertakings in the Soviet Union; they accounted for more than 80 per cent in the United States.

The author thought that these figures might be misleading because, on the Russian side, they included only industrial units that produced their own balance sheets. A great many small industrial units had, in fact, survived even under Stalin's "command economy," but as auxiliaries of large- and medium-sized undertakings, performing for the latter services that they could not profitably undertake themselves, e.g., the provision of components and other necessary items in small quantities. The true situation in Russia was thought to approximate much more closely to that in other industrialized countries than official Soviet statistics suggested, with the economically undesirable differences that (a) the small businesses were carried on the books of the large concerns to which they were attached, making it impossible to measure accurately the efficiency of their operations; (b) the small concerns had largely ceased to be consumer-oriented, and (c) a lively but unofficial private enterprise sector had grown up, with the producers satisfying directly the insistent demand for consumer goods, often using government materials for this purpose, and paying no income tax on their earnings from this activity.

The writer's conclusions were forthright. It was time not only to admit that small units had a vital role to play in a Socialist as in a capitalist society, but also that they were unsuited to state ownership and centralized controls,

They should operate on an independent basis, be given the right to set prices for their own products, and be subject only to government regulations on taxation, profits, lease of premises and equipment and the like.

This was in accordance with the terms of a government decree which had been reported in Izvestia on October 9, 1966, and which firmly reiterated the principle that these industries should primarily serve the consumer and should be under the control of the responsible local bodies. The decree also emphasized the government's interest in arresting the decline that was becoming apparent in a proportion of Russia's small urban communities. Half a century ago Russia was a nation of villages, with only a handful of large towns. Stalin's industrialization drive brought millions of peasants into urban areas, necessitating the expansion of existing towns and the building of many new ones. The 1959 census listed 300 towns with populations of 50,000 and over, as compared with ninety such towns in 1926. But according to official statements there were plenty of small towns left, more than 5,000 of them, the majority having 20,000 inhabitants or less. They were said to account for approximately one-fourth of Russia's town dwellers, now numbering more than 120 million. In 1966 their social and economic problems became a national issue, when the 23rd Congress instructed the planners to divert the building of new factories to medium-sized and small towns, rather than to large industrial centers.

There have been many obstacles to the fulfillment of these orders. Planners and designers retained mental attitudes typical of the Stalin era, notably an obsession with size as such, and were reluctant to concern themselves with the quite different problems of small-scale production. This attitude was reinforced by the practical advantages of siting new factories in the large centers, where the existence of good rail and road transport, building materials, construction equipment, etc., offered savings. Another factor was the dictatorial attitude of higher bodies, which preferred to assign industrial construction to established centers rather than meet requests from local councils in small towns for funds to provide worker housing, shops, access roads, clubs, laundries and other necessary adjuncts to daily life. This conflict often seriously delayed an industrial project, or shelved it altogether.

To overcome such difficulties, national measures were proposed, such as encouraging large concerns in big cities to set up special branches in surrounding small towns, following the example of Moscow's largest car-building factory which had already established a flourishing aluminum works in nearby Mtsensk. The revival of ancient crafts was also thought to be of particular significance. One of the experts studying the situation based his conclusions on a book published in 1913 in what was then the province of Orlov. He lashed out against the stupidity of a policy which had neglected or destroyed the precious skills of the past without putting anything in their place. These skills had been many and various. Lace makers, embroiderers, brick makers, jewelers, coopers, glass workers, had abounded before the revolution. In many cases their products commanded an eager market abroad as well as at home. When they were pushed into decline, the prosperity of the small towns and villages which depended on them was undermined, their inhabitants were forced to uproot themselves or to engage in private activities. Those who could not do so—women house-bound by domestic responsibilities, pensioners, farmers who were unemployed in the winter months—remained without work; large-scale industry could not or would not employ them.

Two Izvestia correspondents reported in the same vein from Kirov Province. Before the revolution, out of half a million peasant homesteads in the area, more than 50 per cent had practiced crafts in a wide variety. But these had been allowed to fall into decay, and on one farm where 700 workers had been thus employed a decade ago, less than 100 now remained. An agronomist writing in Pravda in the autumn of 1966 referred to the flourishing jewelry crafts previously carried on by the rural population in the province of Kostroma, but now neglected to the extent that none of the responsible officials even knew what was being done. It would be easier, he said, to get full information on the occupations and incomes of farmers in the pre-revolutionary and pre-collectivization years than at the present time.

To correct this, a government decree was passed in September, 1967, aimed at utilizing local raw material and reducing rural unemployment in the winter. Farms were given a legal right to establish subsidiary industrial enterprises and revive rural crafts, together with full freedom to draw up their industrial plans (higher bodies were specifically denied the right to supervise these), and to dispose of their products at market prices.

This legislation will certainly receive powerful support from consumers, who have long ceased to be the meek recipients of what officialdom chooses to hand out to them. Reports from the Crimea show that holiday makers snap up the handmade souvenirs offered them by independent local craftsmen, and ignore the plastic fir trees thought good enough for them by the superior powers. The large and well-equipped Kaliningrad amber combine, processing 80 per cent of the country's supply of that material, had been dutifully turning out its quota of "planned" objets d'art, only to find that nobody would buy them because they did not meet contemporary standards of taste. Press commentators had no doubts that the situation could be remedied only by freeing craftsmen and private entrepreneurs from the strangle hold of state planning and permitting them to operate independently on a defined legal basis.

A similar, although less widely publicized, movement is going on in Soviet agriculture. During the past three years or so, there has been a significant growth of "mechanized links" on farms all over Russia. Each link consists of some four to six peasant households, to whom their farm allocates a given amount of land, along with the necessary equipment, fuel, etc., and a "technological chart" of work to be done each month. The group is then left alone to do the job in its own way and reap the reward of good work. The results have been spectacular, and this release of private initiative on the land has increased production two to six times in the links as compared with the results from communal work on the farms. Here also it is reasonable to predict that well within the next decade, the structure of farming in Russia will be transformed, with state planning confined to the main crops, and greatly increased autonomy accorded to those responsible for production at local level.

This phenomenon is not confined to Russia. Reports from Yugoslavia a few months ago indicated that private enterprise under the guise of "tourism" was being much more successful in promoting the exchange of consumer goods between East European countries than were the official trade agencies. Unlikely items such as electric ovens were included among the "souvenirs," along with more conventional commodities like nylon shirts, coffee, chocolates, raincoats, etc. One official was quoted as admitting that individual entrepreneurs noticed more quickly "and with an assurance of reliability greater than that of any institute specialized in marketing problems" what people need.

It is not to be expected that central planning in Russia or in Eastern Europe generally will be dismantled overnight, nor indeed would it be desirable for such a vast change to be made so quickly. But a free sector is certain to emerge in their economies. It is being pushed ahead by economic needs that are being widely recognized in responsible quarters, and by pressures from below no less strong than those that forced the adoption of major economic reforms after 1962. The new sector may well remain small from the quantitative angle for some time, but may be expected to exercise beneficial effects out of all proportion to its size. It will enlarge the area of free decision making, confine the planning bodies to duties they can profitably perform, get rid of the innumerable tensions and distortions created by the present unrealistic system, and contribute to the continuing rise in living standards by expanding opportunities for remunerative employment.

PATCHWORK QUILT OF PROTEST

PAUL BOOTH

Mr. Booth is a former national secretary of SDS, a board member of the National Conference for the New Politics, and is currently chairman of Voters for Change, an independent political organization in the 2nd Congressional District, Chicago.

Chicago

The Committee for the Formation of the New Party, which has been trying to fulfill the promise of its title for several months, came close to that goal at a meeting in Chicago the day after the conclusion of the Democratic convention, but it adjourned empty-handed. The committee's theoretical requirements—principally a social base numbering in the millions—were delivered to it on a silver platter by Chairmen Bailey and Daley of the National and Cook County Democratic Committees, but it lacked the practical ingredients that would have made its promise into a powerful political reality.

The "Fourth Party" movement met for six hours on August 30, and the 500 founders, mostly veterans of the McCarthy drive, garnished with representatives of two dozen state New Party committees, spent the day attempting to determine the structure of the national party, naming some of the members of its steering committee, and giving that committee responsibility for finding a suitable candidate. The term "suitable" wasn't defined because almost the whole group yearned to draft Eugene McCarthy, and knew in their heads what their hearts wouldn't admit—that he would shortly take his name out of consideration. On Tuesday, September 3, he did so, leaving the Fourth Party movement in disarray. In fact, if the country weren't in such disarray itself, this brief episode would now be a closed parenthesis in modern American history.

But the sighs of relief from Democratic Party politicians are premature. Take the case of Indiana. The New Party there staged a three-day blitz and met the petition requirements for getting on the November ballot by the deadline, which fell one day after McCarthy had removed his name in Iowa. Though McCarthy was not required to consent to his name being placed on the Indiana ballot, he intervened and had his name dropped. But the party is now a legal entity in Indiana, free to put forward some other name; today it is a legal shell, but there is a significant movement throughout the state that could fill that shell tomorrow. Governor Branigin and Senator Bayh realize that few McCarthy supporters quite share their unquestioning loyalty to the Democratic Party, but they underestimate the extent to which disloyalty is being transformed into a break with their party machine.

The New Party around the country is a patchwork, and the situation will probably continue to be confused through the November election. In a few of the twenty states where New Party groups have qualified, or soon will qualify for the ballot, it is legally possible for them to run non-candidate McCarthy. A number of these states where New Party groups have qualified, or taintly be set back and possibly abandoned in the wake of Senator McCarthy's withdrawal. But despite confusion and disorganization, the New Party will have something on the ballot (unpledged electors, or McCarthy's name or a "favorite son") to attract protest votes—in many cases enough to play the role of spoiler, and in a few others write-in campaigns will be organized in his behalf.

In addition, two black candidates are filing in a number of large industrial states, and they intend to wage vigorous, radical campaigns. Novelist Eldridge Cleaver, Minister of Information for the Black Panther Party, has been selected the candidate of a half dozen Peace and Freedom Parties, the strongest of which are the pioneer group in California, with 70,000 registered members, and those in Michigan and New York.

Dick Gregory is the candidate of Peace and Freedom in Pennsylvania and Virginia, and a drive for him is getting under way in New York. His backers hope to convince parties that have already qualified in New Jersey and Utah to place him on the ballot, and they are beginning now to seek the endorsement of New Parties throughout the country. It is barely conceivable that Gregory could win enough backing to emerge as a truly national fourth candidate, even at this late hour. The more likely outcome is a confusing picture of protest campaigns and candidates that will vary from state to state. For example, the Alabama National Democratic Party, which was refused a place at the Chicago convention, is deciding its course of action. And petition actions of one sort or another are proceeding in a dozen states.

The most nearly national of all such efforts to date is the New Party, which was generated by a squad of activists who abandoned the Democratic Party in late June. Specifically, affiliates of the New Party committee have won a ballot line in Indiana, Arizona, Colorado, Oregon, New Mexico, North Dakota, Iowa, Minnesota, New York, Montana and Tennessee. Vermont, New Hampshire and Washington will be gained shortly. In Illinois and Rhode Island the party awaits legal challenges, but stands a good chance of success.

In a grisly way, the emergence of this patchwork quilt of protest is fascinating. It displays several qualities of American protest movements, some compelling, some unsettling. The tenacity of these movements, growing out of a deep commitment to turn the country around, shows itself in the activity which persists when "realists" say that effectiveness is impossible. But a frightening naïveté, a hangover from the euphoria of the McCarthy bandwagon, allows the activists to continue in the same beaten path of petitions and conventions and buttons and fanfare without any re-examination of the long-term or even medium-term prospects for their activity. The Vietnamese War has given birth to such widespread sentiment of protest that it continually bubbles up in an amazing variety of awkward forms, despite the lack of clear-headed leadership, of strategy, even of an ability to think one month in advance. There is something inherently ungainly about state campaigns for candidates for the Electoral College (an obscure office if there ever was one) pledged to vote for a candidate who not only won't campaign for them but repudiates them.

New political forces cannot be organized overnight. George Wallace has been barnstorming as hard for more than a year, just to get on the ballot, as Nixon and Humphrey will campaign in October. A well-organized political movement, with candidates already selected for the state assembly, school boards, Congress and tax assessor might just risk waiting until August or September to name its national candidate; the New Party obviously cannot do so. Its coordinators—Marcus Raskin and Martin Carnoy—have been so completely engrossed during the two months of its infancy in trying to get on the ballot in twenty-five states that they have been totally unable to crystallize its differences with the major parties (a job George Wallace has certainly attended to), to set up a democratic decision-making structure, or even prepare for the eventuality that McCarthy would prove undraftable. No wonder the New Party is still more a Committee for the Formation than a real party.

There is still, however, an opening for real politics in the country, but it is not an opening forced by the political activists after years of steady persuasion and recruitment. On the contrary, it is the maneuvering space between the two major parties of law and order and the forces of peace and freedom, which have been confronting each other in the streets as the death toll in Vietnam has mounted and the problems of the ghetto have compounded. The difference between a protest party and a political party is that a protest party merely registers the disaffection that has already been created by other social developments, whereas a political party generates more and more demands, organizes them, and seizes the initiative in order to shift the balance in its favor. A clever group seizes on a local issue in which a neighborhood discovers it has been shortchanged by the state legislature

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

or the county commission, and by leading a fight on this somewhat narrow point, draws to its more general program a batch of new recruits. The national spokesman for a political party unveils a job of muckraking to identify the private interests that have prospered from the confused policies of the whole country. From the county courthouse to Washington, D.C., a political party must be on the offensive, setting the timetable, rather than letting Larry O'Brien set it.

The major parties, forced to choose sides on the key political issues of law and order and the war, have dumped a sizable section of their following out in the middle of the lake—in effect challenging them to climb back in the rowboat or learn to swim to the other shore. It is impossible to say whether the New Party developments are simply a lot of splashing, after which the participants will return to the Democrats for another four years of boring from within. Some radicals are already camped out on the far shore, and their activity, despite its erratic, unplanned appearance, remains the most telling opposition to the war and the war system. It has always been, and still is the case that a combination of liberals who decide to seek the roots of the problems they confront, with radicals who seek to be relevant to the grievances of the majority of the people, is the brightest formula for opening up the country to the possibility of substantive social change. The next months will test the New Party activists to see if they can create enduring movements that will grow through competition with the old parties.

REBEL CAUCUS

Political Science Discovers Politics

DAVID K. J. MORRIS

Mr. Morris is an Associate Fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies, Washington, D.C.

Washington, D.C.

In certain respects, and among some of its people, the United States is becoming increasingly sophisticated in its analysis of the evils of our society. In the early sixties, Bull Connor was the archetypal evil man, his dogs and fire hoses the weapons of oppression. More recently, the evil has been McNamara, typical of the national security managers who use propaganda and the myth of democracy to oppress the people. It has become clearer that, as Hannah Arendt wrote, the worst evil resides in the banal bureaucrat who runs the system, that cosmically evil individuals are no longer in evidence.

We are obliged to recognize a new target of attack. Since the "system" has replaced individuals, we must now be concerned with the operators of that "system," with the technicians who provide the knowledge for its elites and who rationalize its existence. Thus the academic associations are coming under attack. Recently, the American Sociological Association and the American Psychological Association formed within their organizations caucuses of people, who are determined to debate the implicit values and assumptions upon which these associations rest. But perhaps the best example of this new trend occurred in the American Political Science Association, during its convention in Washington, D.C., during the first week of September.

Political science, notorious for its conservative stance, has become, over the past few years, a discipline to be avoided by activists or those concerned with policy making. [See "The Battle for Relevance" by Marvin Surkin, The Nation, September 2.] Two resolutions were proposed at the annual convention in 1967 to bring the association (if not its individual members) out of its somnambulism.

One called for the dismissal of the APSA's executive director, Dr. Evron Kirkpatrick, and its treasurer-counsel, Mr. Max Kampelman, because of their involvement in Operations and Policy Research, a CIA-financed organization. A second resolution called on the universities to withhold from HUAC membership lists of campus groups.

However, both resolutions were side-stepped. The first was never discussed; instead, a report by four ex-presidents of the association concerning the officers' activities was adopted as part of an omnibus resolution setting up a committee to investigate ethical problems. The second resolution was ruled out of order as requiring a constitutional amendment. (The existing constitution prohibited action on political issues and in the context academic freedom was interpreted to be a political issue.)

The profound dissatisfaction caused by the failure of the association to act on either resolution, coming on top of discontent over convention programs, led to the creation of a splinter group within the association, called Caucus for a New Political Science. The caucus was given a mandate by the 200 people who participated in its founding to set up a series of panels for presentation at the 1968 convention, to introduce a constitutional amendment that would permit the association to encourage the study of controversial issues, and to urge the association to poll its members on their attitudes concerning the war in Vietnam.

During the following year, and especially throughout the week of the annual convention, it became evident that the caucus had simply stated the obvious: it had declared the emperor naked, and most were quick to find him so. The majority agreed that the program was dull, irrelevant, often trivial. They acknowledged that it was ludicrous that a political science association had never held a contested election for president. They agreed that no association concerned with the study of politics should tolerate in its constitution a provision disavowing any organizational interest in the most divisive issues of the day.

By the time the political scientists were converging on Washington, the association had begun to remove its more blatant irrelevant features. But the debate begun by exposing the surface problems of the association was not to be stopped. As one member of the council of the association said to me at the end, "This week has gone from bad to worse."

At the business meeting on Wednesday night the distance between how far the association had gone and how far it might go became evident. A constitutional amendment giving the association the right to pass resolutions concerning freedom of speech and academic freedom "by and within the association" was passed. But an amendment that attempted to eliminate that intramural phrase, thus broadening the impact of the resolution, was voted down.

On the other hand, the caucus' constitutional amendment asking that the APSA encourage "research in and concern for significant contemporary political and social problems and policies" passed overwhelmingly. In addition, a resolution to prohibit employees and officers of the association from engaging in covert activities also passed, although it was obviously aimed at the activities of the executive director and the treasurer-counsel, and in spite of the fact that the council had unanimously recommended referral of the resolution to a standing committee on ethics (which would have deferred action for at least another year).

The business meeting drew 900 people, an extraordinary number considering, as the president noted, that it has not been uncommon in the past for members to be pulled in from the hall to make up a quorum. A discussion of the previous year's budget and the rubber-stamp election of a president were not what interested the remarkably large group. It was expecting controversy, and was not disappointed.

The business meeting broke up during a discussion of several resolutions concerning the possibility of withdrawing the 1970 convention from Chicago, as a reaction to events there during the Democratic convention. Although it was soon evident that the association would do so, many members felt that the wording of some of the resolutions soft-pedaled the issue—that moving to another city was not enough if Mayor Daley and his police force were not formally condemned at the same time.

However, there was never any debate on the alternative resolutions, partially as a result of forty minutes of parliamentary maneuvering, primarily because everyone seemed eager to get to bed. Political scientists evidently refuse to discuss questions of major importance after 11 o'clock. Citing the lateness of the hour, the chair ruled that there would be no debate on six of the resolutions concerning Chicago. When I and others attempted to appeal the ruling of the chair (a procedure always in order, according to parliamentary procedure), we were not recognized. Parliamentary considerations aside, the similarities between that scene and the scene on the floor of the Democratic convention should have been clear to everyone—the microphones were cut off, no one on the floor was being recognized, no debate was going on, and resolutions were being railroaded. As a matter of fact, at one point in the proceedings one member of the association began walking up to the podium screaming, "Albert, Albert, Albert," in mocking reference to the arbitrary procedures of Carl Albert, Oklahoma Congressman, when he held the gavel at Chicago.

Despite the unhappy parallel with Chicago, the great majority of the audience disapproved of anyone who interrupted the chairman by yelling or who acted less than decorously. As it became evident that the chair was not going to respond to any voice from the floor, about seventy people walked out of the meeting, causing its premature adjournment. These, joined by another 100 after the adjournment, met in an adjacent room and continued the debate which had been smothered at the regular meeting.

That Wednesday business meeting was the turning point of the convention. The hotel hallways began to boom with discussions on the merits of civility in the presence of injustice, the ethics of the association's officers and the biases of political science. People at a convention were at last talking about real problems in a real way.

The panels presented by the caucus drew large turnouts, even though most of them were held after the regular convention had ended. They proved that political scientists can, and should, use their specialized knowledge to study broad social problems and propose innovative solutions. John McDermott declared at one of the panels that the greatest problem facing this country was the maldistribution of knowledge. To him the political scientist might be not only irrelevant but even dangerous, since he studies the oppressed for the oppressor and influences younger students to follow his corrupt ways. Marcus Raskin suggested on another panel that the social scientist should study the hierarchical and authoritarian nature both of our society and of certain types of knowledge. Lee Webb on a panel dealing with Chicago, suggested that political science was irrelevant because economic forces determine political alignments.

By Saturday night, when the caucus held its own business meeting, the effect of these panels, and the new ideas they presented, was felt by everyone. Although registration for membership in the caucus was begun only on Wednesday, 500 people had joined by Saturday. The association had promised to give the caucus prime space on the 1968 program and had tentatively agreed that a new journal oriented toward questions of policy should be created.

Yet many in the caucus felt that not enough had been done, that the biases of political science had not been effectively challenged. To them, the strong support given the caucus by the very people who were deemed to have the strongest conservative biases was a sign that the purposes of the caucus were being misinterpreted. To others the fact that 500 people had joined so readily meant that quite a few members thought only the program needed to be enlivened.

However, the caucus was changing even as its radical members began expressing doubts about it. On Saturday it adopted a resolution requesting the parent body not to include a subscription to the regular association journal in its dues, thus permitting each member to decide whether or not he wants it. If approved at next year's business meeting, this could well mean the demise of the American Political Science Review. A resolution concerning the Paris negotiations on Vietnam was proposed and would surely have passed but for an amendment asking that all members of the caucus be polled by mail. Commissions were set up to investigate why women and blacks are insufficiently represented in the association. Another commission manned by graduate students was created to study graduate education in political science.

The elections to the executive committee of the caucus indicated a strong commitment to pushing the association still further into the real world. John McDermott, Howard Zinn, Michael Parenti, Theodore Lowi, Alan Wolfe, Marvin Surkin and Alex Gottfried were on the list of twenty-one. My conduct at the Wednesday business meeting did not preclude my election, and Sandy Levinsohn, Paul Minkoff and Mark Roelofs joined me from the original executive committee of the caucus.

The change within the association over the past year, and especially during that September week, has been profound. By next year the caucus will have more than 1,000 members and possibly its own journal; it will be a permanent organization. There is even talk of running—and electing—a slate of APSA officers.

The success of the caucus, and the way in which it changed its nature as it began to investigate the discipline in which it was involved, suggests a wider trend among the nation's scholars. In more and more professional associations, caucuses will examine the myths and distortions of the various fields, and will organize within the organizations to elect their own officers. It is a growing conviction that, in order to create a radical policy in America, it is necessary to unfetter the brilliance of the many social scientists who are now restricted by bias, myth and misperception—all cloaked in the garb of objectivity and scholasticism.

ARENA OF GOLD

EUROPE DEFIES THE DOLLAR

MICHAEL TANZER

Mr. Tanzer is a Harvard-trained economist who works as a consultant in New York City. He has wide corporate and international experience, and has written for various economics journals, among them The Review of Economics and Statistics.

Within the last year traditionally staid international monetary markets have been rocked twice, first by devaluation of the British pound, and then by a gold panic. For the first time since the 1930s world attention has riveted on the esoteric centers of finance in London, Zurich, Geneva and Paris, with the pulse of the world's economy being measured daily by foreign exchange rates and gold prices. Right now all eyes are on the annual fall meeting of the International Monetary Fund, to be held in Washington September 30-October 4, where decisions taken may affect the lives of U.S. workers, French peasants and Vietnam combatants alike. For behind the dry statistics and the apparently mysterious workings of the international monetary system major forces are engaged in a great power struggle. My aim here is to shed light on the operation of these forces in response to recent events, as well as to suggest prospects for the future.

Since space is limited, my analysis must necessarily be somewhat dogmatic. I shall develop three major ideas: (1) The United States and continental Europe are engaged in a titanic subsurface economic struggle, primarily over the role of U.S. investment in Europe. The outcome may determine whether Europe can survive as an independent entity. (2) The respective roles of gold and the dollar in the world economy are at the focus of this struggle. (3) The mechanics of the struggle are such that its resolution may be determined in the end, not by the nations involved but by individual speculators on both sides of the Atlantic, with potentially disastrous consequences for all.

First, some historical background. In the 1930s, as a result of the Great Depression and the specter of war, capital fled from Europe to the United States, which built up an enormous gold hoard. This stock of gold rose from $10 billion in 1935 to $22 billion in 1940, at which time the United States held the bulk of the world's gold. World War II physically destroyed the economies of all the European powers but Great Britain, which it vastly weakened. At the same time, the economic and financial power of the United States was greatly increased; its gold holdings reached a peak of $25 billion in 1949. The Marshall Plan helped to rebuild Europe, but partly at the price of increasing U.S. penetration of Europe and former European colonies. [See "The Dollar Invades Europe," The Nation, September 18, 1967.] The book value (basically the original cost) of direct U.S. foreign private investment rose world-wide from $12 billion in 1950—the order of magnitude at which U.S. overseas investment stood in the 1930s—to $33 billion in 1960, and more than $60 billion today. And everyone agrees that these figures greatly understate the real value of the assets the United States has accumulated. (As an example, the whole of U.S. Middle Eastern oil investment is carried on the books at $1.5 billion, but this figure excludes the value of the 150 billion barrels of oil proven to be in the ground; that is one reason why the reported rate of return on Middle East investment is more than 50 per cent per year.) Thus, what these figures really show is not the absolute level of investment but its rapid rate of growth.

At the same time, in almost every year since 1950, the United States has had a balance of payments deficit. This means that, including our foreign investment overseas, we have spent more abroad than foreigners have spent here. How have we paid for this deficit? The answer, of course, is to be found in the historic willingness of foreigners to accept dollars or gold in exchange for giving the United States real economic assets. Up until 1957 foreigners were willing to take dollars, and the U.S. gold hoard stayed at about the 1950 level. From 1958 on, however, foreigners began increasingly to demand gold, and the U.S. gold stock has shrunk to about $10 billion.

Why the shift? One reason is that, despite current U.S. assertions to the contrary, gold is still the only universally accepted currency. The ultimate strength of the dollar as an international currency lay in the huge supply of gold available to reclaim any unwanted dollars presented at the U.S. bank window. As the supply of dollars in the hands of foreigners grew increasingly larger than the value of U.S. holdings in gold, the creditors naturally became increasingly suspicious of our ability to pay their claims in the only currency they really trusted.

A second reason was the drive, particularly by the French, under de Gaulle, to slow down U.S. investment in Europe. This investment has risen from $2 billion in 1950 to $6 billion in 1960 and to $20 billion today. The theory was that if Europe demanded gold, the United States would have to curb its dollar outflow in order to maintain its gold stock, and ultimately would have to cut its foreign investment. Put another way, as long as Europe was willing to pile up dollars, the United States could go on building and buying real assets in Europe (as elsewhere in the world).

The French foreign trade secretary, on visiting the United States, presented the position as follows:

Jones. Toronto Telegram (Canada)
"PSST"

We could permit a much larger American presence in our economy as the Germans are doing, and it would be easy politically. There would be more jobs and faster growth. But to be politically responsible to the generations to come, we have to see that these generations have the weapons to defend themselves—economic weapons. If we did nothing, in a few years we would have the same problems as Latin America has. The idea has taken hold in American financial circles that the way to take care of the United States' favorable balance of trade with France is to export capital. This is a policy whereby we could become a medium developed country in the future. This explains our attitude on gold. We don't want to take America's gold, we just want to stop the overabundance of American capital in France. (Wall Street Journal, February 24, 1966; emphasis added.)

The United States on the other hand has strenuously resisted these efforts to curb its overseas investment. The whole history of the approach to reducing our balance of payments deficit—from the first attempts to decrease loans to foreigners down to recent talk of taxes to reduce overseas travel—shows the desire to find other solutions, short of seriously constraining the growth of U.S. foreign investment.

On a theoretical plane it has sometimes been argued that there is nothing inherently wrong with the deficit. This view was well stated by three leading U.S. economists, Emile Despres, Charles Kindleberger and Walter Salant, writing in the London Economist (which dubbed their position "the new nationalism"):

The dollar is the world's standard of value. . . . An annual growth in Europe's dollar holdings averaging, perhaps, $1.5 to $2 billion a year or perhaps more for a long time is normal expansion for a bank the size of the United States with a fast-growing world as its body of customers. (February 5, 1966; emphasis added.)

Now, if this whole struggle were merely between the United States and France (or between the United States and a de Gaulle obsessed with power, as it is sometimes portrayed), then it would have only fleeting historical interest, thanks to the United States' far greater power. But it seems clear that de Gaulle and the French do not stand alone, that they have strong if quiet support in continental Europe. In the arena of money, actions speak louder than words. Back in the late 1950s most of the continental governments held little gold. Today, while France holds about $4.5 billion worth of the metal, West Germany has $4.5 billion, the Benelux countries $3 billion, and Italy $2.5 billion. Thus the Common Market countries together hold about $15 billion in gold, which accounts for almost two-thirds of their international reserves. Lest one think that this merely reflects nervousness on the part of all foreign governments as to the redeemability of the dollar, note that the proportion of gold to total reserves for the rest of the world is reversed. The United States' best customer on the basis of holding dollars is Japan, which keeps less than one-fifth of its reserves in gold. Japan, however, restricts U.S. investment directly.

To sum up, in the last ten years the increasingly dominant factor in U.S.-European economic relations has been the growth of U.S. foreign investment. It has caused the dollar outflow which, as these dollars are cashed for gold, has led to the gold crisis in the United States. Where do we go from here? The situation is now critical and something must give.

To see what is likely to give one has to examine the balance between two basic sets of economic forces. The first set is the real economic forces, involving the control of production and profits. The second set is the financial forces, involving control of money and gold.

As to the real forces, the most important fact of current international economy is the enormous U.S. position overseas. The view from Europe on this situation has been dramatically summarized in a recent European bestseller, The American Challenge, by Jean Servan-Schreiber: "In fifteen years the third industrial power, after the United States and the USSR, could well be not Europe but American industry in Europe." This is true despite the fact that less than 10 per cent of European industry is now controlled by U.S. corporations. While still relatively small, this investment is growing much more rapidly than the indigenous investment. Also, U.S. investment is heavily concentrated in the key growth industries—computers, electronics, chemicals, etc. These are not only the high-profit industries but also the high-technology industries that all agree will dominate the future economy. Moreover, the simple arithmetic of foreign investment must also disturb Europeans: with U.S. investment in Europe earning 10 to 15 per cent per year, while the European economies grow at perhaps 5 per cent a year, the United States could steadily increase its share of industry in Europe merely by plowing back profits made in Europe. Using European labor and European markets, American industry could grow toward domination of Europe without sending an additional dollar from the United States.

For the same reasons—high profits plus great growth potential—U.S. industry has a strong interest in increasing its European investment. In addition, U.S. industry wants a heavy investment in Europe in order to profit from its investment in raw-material production in the underdeveloped world. For example, there would be far less value to the enormous U.S. oil investment in the Middle East if that oil couldn't be pumped into European refineries or marketed to European customers, as is now done on such a huge scale.

While many Europeans have pointed out the dangers of U.S. domination of their industry, they face for several reasons an apparent dilemma in dealing with it. For one thing, the separate European nations are too small to generate consistently companies as large and powerful as those that have grown up in the vast U.S. market and are now invading Europe. Size gives major advantages, not only by allowing low-cost mass production but also by providing the huge resources needed to invest in new developments, particularly those of technology, in training management and in other intangibles. (Thus U.S. international companies have benefited most from the European Common Market because since its inception they have set up operations to compete in the whole market rather than in single countries.)

Another problem for those who would curb the Americans is the disunity of the Common Market countries. The fact is, as de Gaulle learned several years ago, that if France says, "No we will not allow a U.S. auto firm to put a plant in France," the company can outflank him by building it in a neighboring country (in this case, Belgium) and exporting to France.

A more fundamental problem is that if the Common Market countries adopted a united front to constrain further U.S. investment, but took no other steps, they would fall further and further behind technologically. But machine breaking, sabotage, will work no better now than it ever has in the past, and one way or another Europe will "acquire" the new technology. If U.S. firms cannot bring it in outright through investment, they will "smuggle" it by embodying it in U.S. exports. Thus the new technology incorporated in cheaper and superior U.S. goods would not only capture markets in Europe but also in the rest of the world and thereby render impotent a European economy heavily dependent on trade. Rather than suffer this catastrophe most Europeans would probably choose direct U.S. investment. The end of that road might be a psychically painful Canada-type satellite economy with the bulk of industry owned by the United States, but at least the standard of living would be relatively high.

The solution which most Europeans would obviously prefer is for Europe "somehow" to create its own resources for overcoming the "technology gap." The major snag is the investment, huge relative to Europe's resources, required not only for building new factories but for research, education, etc. For example, the French Government had to allocate $80 million, as an initial sum merely for research, to launch an all-French computer company which it is hoped will be a viable competitor to the U.S. giants.

If money is the main obstacle, the key to obtaining resources for European self-development may lie in Europe's vast gold hoards. In a sense, what is needed is a reversal of the basic exchange which has underlain U.S.-European economic relations for two decades. During this period the U.S. has built up enormous real economic power in Europe by investment in factories and business organizations. In exchange, Europeans have accrued enormous financial power, in the form of hoards of gold and dollars. Up to this point it has been a poor trade for the Europeans because the gold and dollar hoards are essentially sterile; the gold earns nothing and the dollars, even when held in U.S. Treasury notes, earn only a few per cent a year. U.S. foreign investment, on the other hand, is far more profitable and can grow rapidly simply by profit plowback. Moreover, while the purchasing power of the dollar declines in the current inflationary period, the value of the U.S. investment rises.

The Europeans cannot catch up now simply by disgorging their gold and dollar hoards, because this would encourage the United States to accelerate its investment. After all, it is only the Europeans' increased appetite for gold that has forced the United States to make any attempt to slow down its overseas investment program. But Europe now has an opportunity to attempt to recoup some of its losses through a world-wide devaluation of the dollar along with all other currencies, i.e., by a big jump in the price of gold.

A world-wide devaluation of all currencies by the same percentage would not change their relationship: one U.S. dollar would still exchange for four German marks or five French francs. Hence no country would gain a trade advantage over any other. The primary beneficiaries would be the major gold-producing countries—South Africa and the Soviet Union—plus countries with large hoards of gold, that is, most of continental Europe. The Common Market countries alone hold $15 billion in gold officially, and private accumulations tucked away in mattresses and Swiss safe deposit boxes may be on the order of $10 billion. Thus, if the price of gold were doubled, the Common Market countries would enjoy a “windfall profit” on the order of $25 billion, or more than the book value of U.S. investment in all of Europe.

Such an enormous windfall could go a long way toward making Europe a great independent industrial power. Some of it might be used to buy out at premium prices the European plants of U.S. firms, or even in certain key industries to purchase the complete operations of smaller U.S. firms with good technological prospects. More important, most of this money could be spent to improve education, support basic and applied research, and promote European firms in the crucial growth sectors. Such efforts would be greatly assisted by the fact that the bulk of the windfall would accrue directly to the European central governments. While the governments could either set up state (or even interstate) companies or liberally subsidize private firms in the crucial industries, the fundamental point is that the money would be initially concentrated where presumably there would be a will to use it.

The United States Government is completely opposed to such a world-wide devaluation. Still, it is conceivable that the European governments could force the issue, either by threatening to “bankrupt” the United States by demanding gold in exchange for their dollars, or by concertedly devaluing their own currencies and thus threatening the U.S. trade position. Therefore one may well ask why, if a jump in the price of gold would be so enormously profitable for the Europeans, they have not taken either of these steps toward a devaluation in their currencies.

One deterrent must be the fear that any massive change in the value of currencies could so shatter confidence in international finance and money markets as to wreck international trade and bring on a world depression. Second, the windfall benefit would be unevenly distributed among the European powers. France would benefit by far the most, and West Germany, the strongest European power, might fear such a boost to its neighbor's position. Finally, and probably the most important reason for European caution, is that even if Europe were united on this strategy it would probably provoke an open and violent struggle with the United States, which has a tremendous stake in not letting Europe simply buy out investment that has been built up over twenty years, or in allowing Europe to develop the kind of rival economic base which would threaten the profits of U.S. firms.

One weapon the Americans might use, and which they have hinted at, is the countering of a European run on their gold supply by refusing to have anything further to do with gold. According to these quarters, the value of Europe's gold hoards might then shrink drastically since only the willingness of the U.S. Government to buy and sell gold at $35 an ounce keeps the price that high. Lacking that support, it is said, gold's price would sink toward its use value as an industrial metal, estimated by some at less than $10 an ounce. While Europeans may doubt the ability of the United States to abandon gold, as well as the consequent drop in price if it did, the situation is sufficiently uncertain to signal caution. For one thing, U.S. abandonment of a fixed gold price would mean freely fluctuating exchange rates, which in turn might prove a serious barrier to international trade.

All parties agree that something must be done soon about the precarious situation. The United States sees a long-run solution in the ultimate elimination of gold's role (and implicitly the triumph of the dollar's role) in the world monetary system. In fact, U.S. monetary experts sometimes talk about the gold problem as if it were caused by a psychological hang-up on the part of those who so tenaciously cling to the yellow metal; the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board even refers to it as a “barbarous relic." The immediate U.S. aim is to push through at the forthcoming International Monetary Fund meetings the tentatively agreed-on creation of IMF special drawing rights (SDRs), sometimes called "paper gold." As for the technology gap, the U.S. position seems to be that Europe is foolish to worry, since U.S. control of European industry will bring with it a rising standard of living. But if Europeans insist on indigenous control of industry, then a "United States of Europe" should be formed, with Great Britain as a key component. (See U.N. Ambassador George Ball, The Discipline of Power.)

The European response varies within and among countries, depending largely on particular self-interests, with the French being the most hostile. But there is certainly a general agreement among the Europeans, who for two decades have provided the United States with billions of dollars worth of factories in exchange for millions of ounces of gold, that now is no time to "forget about" this barbarous relic just because it has little "intrinsic" value. (By analogy, the rest of the world might tell the United States to forget about its overseas factories and mines, since its claim to them rests in ownership certificates which are just worthless pieces of paper that cannot even be used to fill teeth; such is the subversive logic of those who would consign gold to the monetary scrap heap.) Europeans must find this U.S. attempt to downgrade gold particularly irritating because twenty-five years ago at the Bretton Woods Conference the United States rejected Keynes's proposal for an analogue of the current "paper gold" plan precisely because it insisted on the supremacy of metallic gold. At that time of course the United States held two-thirds of the world's supply.

As to the immediate financial crises, Europeans also generally agree that the U.S. balance of payments deficit must be reduced as a first step. It now seems clear that, at the historic Basel meeting of last March, where the two-tier gold price system was established and agreement was tentatively reached on the outlines of the SDRs, this agreement was coupled with an understanding that, at a minimum, the United States would not escalate its commitment in Vietnam. But how much additional pressure the European governments would be willing to exert today is not at all clear. The whole Basel package of hastily constructed financial agreements seems so unworkable in the long run as to suggest that it is a stalling tactic on the part of everyone to cool down the situation, while further struggles and bargaining go on behind the scenes. After all, something was necessary at that time, since the international money markets were running wild and panic was rapidly setting in.

Regarding the proposed U.S. solution for overcoming its real economic lead, France at least seems unalterably opposed to letting Great Britain into "Europe," viewing it as a Trojan horse for the Americans. Since France takes this position there is little need for the other European countries to show their hands. (As with many problems involving delicate relations with the United States, de Gaulle serves as a convenient "lightning rod" for other European governments.) In any event, none of the Common Market countries wants Great Britain to come in without resolution of its sterling problem, which leads back again to the financial crises.

In an ultimate sense the crucial question would seem to be whether European capital is really prepared to slug it out with U.S. capital for supremacy in Europe, and ultimately for a significant position in the underdeveloped world, or whether it is prepared to accept the subordinate role of running the relatively stagnant and less profitable traditional industries such as textiles and steel. Given the rate at which technology is developing, a decision must be made soon before the U.S. lead becomes virtually insurmountable. Undoubtedly there are strong groups within Europe that would be content with a subordinate position. For example, the Belgian steel producer who can have his profits improved by computerization may be eager for IBM to come in with the best equipment available. Again, European executives of U.S. firms, or the indigenous suppliers of these firms, may be eager for further U.S. expansion.

Nevertheless, the Common Market countries have not reached the point (as Great Britain probably has) where their capitalist class as a whole is so weak as to be unwilling to fight for these new markets. Many competent European companies are holding their own in the face of fierce U.S. competition. Moreover, there is beginning a wave of European mergers which can help strengthen their financial ability to move into the new industries. Thus if the European governments felt they had a reasonable chance to pull off the kind of financial coup discussed earlier, they would probably ultimately attempt it.

However, in the last year the financial crisis has so accelerated that the final resolution may no longer lie in the relatively cool and carefully calculating hands of European and U.S. governments, but rather in the hot and recklessly greedy hands of the world's monetary speculators. International finance has become the world's most widespread crap game, with potential quick profits which make the rewards from speculation in cats and dogs on the American Stock Exchange look feeble by comparison. Bets are placed either by selling short on a specific weak currency which might have to be devalued (and can thereby be bought back later at a lower price) or by buying gold in the hope of a universal currency devaluation.

The first case which whetted the appetites of the world's "hot money" gamblers was last fall's successful raid on the British pound, which ended in devaluation. This was not only enormously profitable to the speculators but also showed such speculation to be a favorite sport for a much larger number of people than ever before. A Wall Street Journal report (November 22, 1967) neatly captures the flavor of the game:

Some of the boys in Youngstown, Ohio, found the stock market too erratic for their taste last week, so they looked for something safer—like a raid on the British pound sterling.

The group—eight to 10 doctors, lawyers, and other professional men with a sophisticated bent for speculation—made their decision Friday to plunge into the murky waters of international finance. By 2 P.M. (E.S.T.) when the time difference cut short their trading, they had borrowed and sold short 70,000 pounds.

"We thought we'd have time to sell more pounds short

Monday," says one of the group, but Britain's abrupt devaluation Saturday night ended the foray. Selling short 70,000 pounds is small compared to operations of bigger speculators and bear raiders in Continental Europe. But it was enough, with the devaluation, to assure the Ohioans collectively a profit of more than $23,000 on the $20,000 cash they put up to go short on sterling valued Friday at nearly $196,000.

The second round of speculation centered on private purchases of gold in the open market, which this spring drove the price of gold up to $45 an ounce. Further, it forced the U.S. and European governments to close down their international gold pool which had previously successfully stabilized gold at $35 an ounce. While gold's price declined to the $40 level, speculators who had bought at the official support price of $35 and sold at $40 realized a few hundred per cent profit on their investment in a short time (most of the money to buy gold is borrowed from banks, thereby "leveraging" the speculator's own money). Since spring, the free market price of gold has been fluctuating around $40, indicating that speculators still hope for a world-wide devaluation. (So too does the government of South Africa which has been refusing to sell enough gold on the open market to drive the price back to $35.)

The very activities of monetary speculators can help to make the rumors of world-wide devaluation a self-fulfilling prophecy. For one thing, the difference between the free market price and the official price of gold is a naked index of world confidence in paper moneys. As the gap—which is itself stimulated by speculative buying—gets wider, governments may begin to panic and turn in their dollars to Washington for gold, thereby bringing on a monetary breakdown. Then, as the gap grows smaller, central banks, which can legally cash their dollars for gold through the U.S. Treasury at $35, may be tempted to resell this gold secretly on the private market, at perhaps $50 per ounce, and then seek more gold from the United States at $35. As an economist connected with a European government put it, "There are a lot of crooks around, and some of them are central bankers" (Wall Street Journal, March 18).

Finally, in a period of increasing monetary uncertainty, speculators jump on any currency that looks weak, and sell it short. Since this is a game where he who stumbles gets kicked again to keep him down, such speculative pressures can themselves be the deathblow. Any devaluation now of a major currency could force a self-protective chain reaction ending in universal devaluation. This is important because, even after its recent devaluation, sterling is under renewed speculative fire, as is the franc because of the social upheaval in France.

It is interesting that, while the latter event has weakened de Gaulle's position somewhat, the net effect may yet be to hasten a world devaluation. For one thing, the gold which France has lost since its "revolution" has largely filled the coffers of the other European governments, thereby giving them a greater direct stake in an increased gold price. Moreover, if France is forced to devalue (or chooses to act as if it were) this might bring on the world-wide devaluation.

Given the underlying conflicts of U.S. and European interests in the international economy, the upshot of all this wild speculation could turn out to be a chaotic rout for all. Financial markets could collapse, international trade and investment dry up, and internal economies be badly depressed. The growing brinkmanship between the United States and Europe is thus an extremely dangerous game. However, it would not be the first time that nations in pursuit of their "vital interests" have miscalculated and fallen into the crevasse. The events unfolding at the International Monetary Fund meetings in Washington this time will be studied all over the world for clues as to whether we are moving closer to the edge.

POLITICS TOMORROW

THE NEW COALITIONS

WILLIAM L. ABBOTT

Mr. Abbott, who served on the Steering Committee of Volunteers for McCarthy, was Education Director of the United Rubber Workers from 1960 to April, 1968. He is currently a specialist in labor-management education at the University of Hawaii.

The Humphrey victory at the Chicago Democratic convention may well be the last hurrah for the Liberal-Labor-Negro coalition which has served this nation moderately well since the beginning of FDR's New Deal thirty-five years ago. The times are fast changing and younger Americans are looking for a new kind of politics, as the candidacies of McCarthy and Kennedy so well illustrated.

Louis Harris noted "deep undercurrents of change" in those he polled during the primaries. "Shaping up in this country," he said, "are two new political coalitions: one advocating change and one resisting change." The new coalitions have been created by three major issues. One is the question of Vietnam and America's mission as a world power. This is a moral or conscience issue, as is the second issue of "whether some 20 million black people in this country are going to be able to obtain the freedom to achieve equal status with the whites." The third issue dividing the American people Harris sees as the generation gap. He asserts that youthful nonconformists "now want to change radically the colleges, the Federal Government, the arts and the style of life to meet their contemporary tastes and standards."

Harris groups the "Change Coalition" into "Negroes, Spanish-speaking and Jewish people, the young, the affluent and educated." The "No-Change coalition" is the "Deep South whites, low income whites in Northern industrial centers, conservative suburbanites and older people."

The old coalitions were based primarily on economic interests and possessed an economic orientation which is missing to a great degree among the affluent middle class, who in the words of Eugene McCarthy want "to be more rather than to have more or use more." This is a qualitative change from the New Deal economic liberal who was preoccupied with the production of material goods. John Kenneth Galbraith said of him: "... production did more than impress the liberal. It became his program, and it established something akin to a monopoly over his mind. . . . Increased production solved, or seemed to solve, all of the social problems of the day." But the new liberal or radical cannot be satisfied by aspiring to things he inherited at birth. Young people never knew the Great Depression; they had no crying need for material possessions so valuable to their fathers; because of the sacrifices their fathers made for them they could now behave in terms of conscience and individual life styles.

These are the people supporting men like Eugene McCarthy. In New Hampshire, McCarthy lost the older voters but carried those under 35 by a 49-to-41 margin. While he lost the high school educated voter, McCarthy won the college educated Democrat by 51 to 42 per cent.

The mathematics of the situation show that the college educated middle class is gaining rapidly in numerical strength and will become the major political factor of the future. Thirty per cent of our total population is now in school and 6,100,000 are in college. College enrollments have increased by 70 per cent since 1960 and they are expected to rise to between 9,700,000 and 11,800,000 by 1985.

The median family income for 1965 was $6,900 or more than double the figure for 1947. The gains in real income are up by 61 per cent. Those earning more than $10,000 a year have increased from 7 per cent in 1947 to 25 per cent of the population in 1965.

Thus American society is becoming richer and better educated. The old conservative coalition and the Liberal-Labor-Negro coalition are being held together more or less artificially by the convention actions of the two American political parties.

Richard Nixon is trying to make sure of the no-change group by writing off the black vote and appealing to the white backlash. One illustration of Nixon's potential power is Milwaukee's Polish South Side, which has successfully barred Negroes from the area, and whose residents in 1967 viciously abused Father Groppi and his open-housing marchers when they ventured across the 6th Street Viaduct separating the North from the South Side. In the past, this heavily unionized area has voted solidly Democratic, but neither the unions nor the Democrats may be able to hold the line in an ethnic area of upward striving people who feel the need to look down on somebody lower on the ladder.

A survey of union members by John Kraft showed that 46 per cent of all union members earn between $7,500 and $15,000 a year. Nearly 50 per cent are less than 40 years old, and they support the economics of the welfare state by a hefty 3-to-1 margin. However, as far as open housing is concerned, only 43 per cent of these same unionists supported the idea. Nixon is in a position to capture a sizable portion of the labor vote if he can project a more liberal economic image while appearing opposed to social change. He has competition from George Wallace's crusade against "the preachers, the professors, the judges and the newspaper editors who've been looking down their noses at you and telling you they know better than you do how to run your life." Samuel Lubell feels that the Wallace rebellion promises "the same kind of recognition [for the nouveau riche redneck] that Al Smith stood for to the Catholics in the 1920s" and that it is "a kin cousin to the militancy of the Negro."

In pure numbers the middle class will replace the working class as the political muscle for the new coalition. So all labor is divided into at least two parts: the conservatives led by George Meany, head of the AFL-CIO, who want to maintain the status quo of unionism; and the progressives, led by Walter Reuther, who want change. When labor could unite on economic matters it was indeed a force to be reckoned with. Its Committee on Political Education is at present composed of knowledgeable, able personnel under Al Barkan who must certainly be rated as one of America's most masterful political organizers. But COPE's propaganda strategy is to terrify the union leaders with pictures of what the Republicans will do to unions once they get in power. COPE uses this appeal because it is far and away the most effective one with aging unionists—and the young are not often around to hear the message. But it is a conservative appeal for maintaining things as they are.

Reuther will undoubtedly support Hubert Humphrey, but he has formed with the giant Teamsters union the Alliance for Labor Action which will undertake joint organizing, community and political efforts. On each of these levels cross-fertilization could occur with allies in the change coalition, and unionists who have Reuther's general orientation must (with pleasure, it is hoped) learn to groove with ghetto blacks and middle-class intellectuals.

For a start, communication has to be re-established with the young worker who constitutes about half the entire labor movement and who is in revolt against the labor establishment, expressing his disapproval often irrationally by rejecting many excellent contracts negotiated by his union leadership. But the union means little to him because his values, as a product of affluence, are different. He doesn't appreciate the sacrifices the old-timers made to give him the benefits he takes for granted; he doesn't value pensions and other benefits as glorious gains dearly won. He sees the union clique and wants to know why it is so difficult for young people to get into office. He wants action and he sees an old-timer debating society. He wants an association which will point to a better way of life, and all he hears about is seniority. He is no longer on the job very long and he has become home-centered; he doesn't see the union doing very much for him in the community arena where his interests are concentrated.

There are also formidable anti-change forces within the house of labor, from George Meany to the union shop steward. While they could join a coalition for economic change, one is not likely to see even the average union leader allied with white intellectuals, student activists and ghetto blacks. A 1963 survey of one of the most forward-looking international unions in the nation showed typical union leaders favoring national economic planning by 61 per cent, National Health Insurance by 82 per cent and school integration by 78 per cent. But 41 per cent believed that Barry Goldwater should be barred as a speaker at union meetings, 36 per cent believed that no Republican should teach social sciences, 48 per cent said that no Socialist should teach social sciences, and 61 per cent would not permit Communists to speak in public at all. Intolerance of dissent has been an unfortunate mark of the labor movement, which still considers itself a garrison holding off hostiles at gun point.

George Meany has set a pattern of intolerance by saying that a meeting of more than 600 labor leaders who met late in 1967 in Chicago to protest American policies in Vietnam was "planned in Hanoi." He had student anti-Vietnam protesters expelled as "kooks" from the San Francisco convention, and in the 1968 Indiana Presidential primary he ignored the vote of the Indiana State AFL-CIO not to endorse any candidate and, according to Walter Reuther, "intervened massively" on behalf of the Administration candidate, Gov. Roger Branigin. The battle scars from such arbitrary actions are bound to endure; labor faces a future of political division.

If labor is no longer united, the Negro is also going through the throes of change. Bayard Rustin, who is on the speaking circuit for the AFL-CIO, urging unionists to forget their differences over Vietnam and support the "Liberal-Labor-Negro coalition" for the sake of survival, has identified himself with the old politics of Hubert Humphrey, so old in fact, that a recent piece of Humphrey campaign literature discussed the Vice President's record and ideas on both foreign and domestic policy and failed to mention the war in Vietnam even once! The old politics means that you gloss over the issues of division and concentrate on those which unite. But what if the issue is a moral one and looms so large it will not go away? Can the politics of a happy face replace the problem?

Something like that happened in civil rights. White liberals and the black middle class combined to preach the gospel of tolerance for other races. Tolerance would lead to understanding, which would lead to brotherhood, which would lead to blissful integration. Organizations like the National Conference of Christians and Jews put on Brotherhood Dinners where whites and blacks smiled politely at each other, and awarded a brotherhood award to a local newspaper publisher who would give them a good play in his paper.

Liberal mayors formed civic unity committees composed of blue-chip citizens who could be counted on not to create unpleasantness. If some troublemaking group like the Congress on Racial Equality complained about police brutality, the committee would ask the chief of police if his men were brutal. Upon the chief's shocked denial, it would issue a press release saying such slurs on the noble men in blue were completely unfounded.

Conflict was the enemy because it bred disharmony. Liberal programs of urban renewal displaced the blacks of the slums, destroying their community and crowding them into new and worse slums. The War on Poverty scattered some money for the poor to fight over, and 10 million Americans went to bed hungry each night despite the gilded words of the New Deal, Fair Deal, New Frontier and Great Society.

The Spirit of '76

Then in Alabama conflict began and young people rode South as freedom riders. Martin Luther King began to march and young blacks rediscovered manhood as they sat in at lunch counters, faced jail and dogs and cattle prods to win their rights. The U.S. Supreme Court decision desegregating the schools was a sham without local battles and sacrifices to force the white community to obey the law. Civil rights bills lacked muscle on the local level. The old smiling politics of harmony had been used to keep the community power structure unchallenged and undisturbed. No wonder young militants were antagonistic toward their middle-class elders and their white allies. They didn't try to change society by smiling at people and saying "Yassa boss" with a Harvard accent, but built power centers and cultivated their own strength. They went into battle on the battlefield they chose—that of direct action, of confrontation. They built their own community unions, renters unions and cooperative factories. They formed their own associations, not fraternities and sororities like the Negro middle class, aping the worst of the white world. Theirs were associations with concrete identity and militant solidarity.

Many of these young freedom riders had white skins, and as the civil rights movement colored itself more and more black, the whites began to turn their protest against the war in Vietnam. They began to demand more of a voice in the conditions under which they worked, in most cases, the university. Hippies rejected the life styles of their parents. The neatly groomed organizational man with his two-car garage and picture-window house in suburbia became a despised symbol of the craven age of McCarthyism and conformity.

Above all, the youthful activist was motivated by conscience. He agreed with Henry David Thoreau: "Must a citizen ever for a moment, or in the least degree, resign his conscience to the legislator? Why has every man a conscience, then? I think that we should be men first, and subjects afterward. . . ." He saw the Vietnamese War in terms of an immoral American attempt to impose its will on a small defenseless country. And he asked why the United States supports right-wing military dictatorships and calls them members of the "free world." All was hypocrisy. And then Sen. Eugene McCarthy challenged President Johnson's war on moral grounds, and politics took on a new dimension for idealistic young people.

Like any social phenomenon, McCarthy's success didn't just miraculously appear, although a number of pollsters, politicians and newsmen probably thought so when the thunderbolt struck. The McCarthy story, which is the rise of the programmatic liberal with a conscience (probably a more apt description than "intellectual"), is an evolutionary one which began with the World War II veteran who returned determined to build a better world.

In Wisconsin in 1946, the Progressive Party voted to join the GOP in a desperate effort to save its leader, Robert M. LaFollette, from defeat. The result was a national catastrophe, because Joseph McCarthy beat LaFollette and knocked out what was left of the old agrarian protest movement. The field was open for a new kind of idealistic urban liberal and, with an indefatigable full-time organizer, Patrick Lucey, this new breed formed the Democratic Organizing Committee to take the party away from bumbling, ineffectual ward-heeling types. Young liberals like Henry Reuss, Gaylord Nelson and William Proxmire read thoughtful papers on social and economic reform to one another, and with the aid of newspapers like the Madison Capital Times they began to create a new ideology that was slow in coming to the fore because their kind were still too few in numbers.

In New York City, Reform Democrats began to challenge Tammany Hall. The Independent Voters of Illinois was formed as a liberal alternative to the Chicago Democratic machine. In California, Democratic clubs proliferated and became a liberal focal point. And there were similar developments in other states, Massachusetts for one. The candidacy of Adlai Stevenson served as an important stimulus for the organization of urban liberals throughout the country.

According to James Q. Wilson, who studied Democratic clubs in depth, all had certain common characteristics. Differentiating the "amateur" from the "professional politician," Wilson said: "The amateur politician sees the political world more in terms of ideas and principles than in terms of persons"; whereas "the professional . . . is preoccupied with the outcome of politics in terms of winning or losing. Politics, to him, consists of concrete questions and specific persons who must be dealt with in a manner that will 'keep everybody happy' and thus minimize the possibility of defeat at the next election." Written in 1962, this statement aptly describes the division between Eugene McCarthy and his supporters and the Johnson-Humphrey consensus.

These "amateurs" are young, well educated, middle class, often highly mobile, and their clubs contain a large percentage of women. Because they deal more in ideas than in personalities they tend to polarize on issues—the liberals going more toward the left and their conservative, well-educated, middle-class counterparts in the Republican Party going more toward the right.

The new liberal believes that political parties should be issue-oriented and internally democratic. Hence, his outrage over the selection of delegates in a state like Pennsylvania where the voters chose McCarthy and the bosses chose Humphrey supporters to go to the convention. The emphasis on "participatory democracy" means more to the new liberal than simple integration into existing institutions; it really means democratic control for the purpose of effecting change.

In 1937, a study of "Steelport" showed that a CIO municipal victory did not mean any fundamental change for the city. Labor wanted more equality of opportunity for upward mobility; it wanted to join the power structure, not to overthrow it. In a rough sense the CIO-PAC of the 1930s was like the Democratic clubs of today—with one big exception: programmatic liberals want to form or enter associations to change fundamentally power relationships and therefore society.

The Lynds' famous study of "Middletown" showed that as the middle class grew in numbers, so did local associations. Lloyd Warner statistically showed that while 72 per cent of the upper class belonged to associations, only 22 per cent of the lower-lower class were represented. The upper classes were joiners because "associations aid them to control the social life of the community."

Because he is middle class, the programmatic liberal builds his associations with the goal of winning control to bring about change. If he cannot have a full say in the party structure, he has his clubs to keep his identity, and power base.

The single, most important factor of 1968 has been the mounting power of the educated middle class. Because its sets of values differ from the values of those who guide the old Liberal-Labor-Negro coalition, it must form a dynamic new coalition with union dissenters, black-power organizations, and young people. Called "mean" and accused of using "rule-or-ruin tactics," by the partisans of the old coalition, the men and women of the New Politics are pointing to present-day realities: the younger and more educated Democratic voter prefers the style of a Kennedy or McCarthy to a Johnson or Humphrey, and the American population is becoming younger and better educated every day. The census is on the side of the new liberals.

The old coalition is too badly split ever to be revived as economic liberals oppose liberals of conscience, union conservatives oppose union progressives, Negroes oppose blacks. The professional politician will make overtures in the way Gov. John Burns did when he asked the Hawaii Volunteers for McCarthy to support whatever Democratic team the convention selected because, as he said, the worst Democrat was better than the best Republican. The McCarthyites had a mass meeting and decided to enter the Democratic Party as a separate entity, running their own candidates, and keeping their organization on a permanent basis as the voice of new liberalism in the Pacific.

It would be a disaster if those organizations formed to support New Politics candidates disbanded or allowed themselves to be used by the old political machines. Even when campaigning for established candidates, the organization should insist on its separate identity. One very practical reason for such an action is that official party organizations are hollow shells whose patronage-centered adherents haven't pounded a pavement in the precincts for years, if indeed they ever did. And labor usually has to pay lost time to its political troops to get them into the wards. The manpower this year has come from the McCarthy-Kennedy organizations, and the more these new liberals see how they can get volunteers to work, the more inclined they may be to take over the party. This is already beginning to happen in Michigan, where irate McCarthyites are out to capture county Democratic units and have succeeded in doing so in Lansing.

A more feasible alternative to a new party would be a National Democratic Organizing Committee, possibly headed by McCarthy manager Pat Lucey who performed some genuine political miracles in Wisconsin. This is something that the UAW-Teamsters political alliance could eventually join, whereas a new party might be too far out for members of this union bloc to accept. A national Democratic Organizing Committee would coordinate all New Politics groups and help them keep their identity; it would also serve to weld together the new coalition of the fast-growing liberal middle class, the labor dissenters from the George Meany establishment, and the restless and angry racial, linguistic and economic minority groups.

Thoreau had a word of advice for this situation: "A minority is powerless while it conforms to the majority; it is not even a minority then; but it is irresistible when it clogs by its own weight." And we're not even sure we are the minority any more!

LETTERS (Continued from page 258)

filed somewhere in the vast labyrinth of the Pentagon never to see the light of day again. . . .

Vern L. Bullough, Professor of History
San Fernando Valley State College

make peace, not hate

Altamont, Tenn.

DEAR SIR: The peace movement in this country seems to be falling into the hands of certain reactionary elements of the so-called New Left. Is there no way we can eliminate the obscurities of the "Americong" and other such hate mongers from our cause? . . .

As far as I can determine, the purpose of the peace movement is peace. However small the chances are of achieving this—and chances are very small indeed—is our purpose advanced by showing how much we hate this country? What is possibly gained by showing that policemen, too, are violent? Hell, that's their job. At least, that's what they are told their job is.

One thing is certain: you will never convince Americans that the Vietnamese War is horribly wrong by carrying "enemy" flags. . . . Would it not be better to carry American flags, if we need carry any at all? What would happen if thousands of Americans carried our flag in a march on Washington or any place else? Would the police dare attack people carrying American flags?

But I forget, the New Left does not want peace, they want revolution. So we must suffer it.

Leslie V. Tischer

new bricks

Ithaca, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: Readers of the article "Lobster Land: A Traveler in China" by Alberto Moravia [The Nation, Aug. 19] might be interested in knowing that one of the most prominent and influential modern Chinese writers met the problem of the Great Wall in much the way Mr. Moravia might wish. In regard to the importance of this writer, the following is a quote from Mao Tse-tung: "All Communists, all revolutionaries, all revolutionary literary and art workers should learn from the example of Lu Hsun . . ."

This is the short thought of Lu Hsun:

Our wonderful Great Wall!

This engineering feat has left its mark on the map, and is probably known to everyone with any education the whole world over.

Actually, all it has ever done is work many conscripts to death—it never kept out the Huns. Now it is merely an ancient relic, but its final ruin will not take place for a while, and it may even be preserved.

I am always conscious of being surrounded by a Great Wall. The stonework consists of old bricks reinforced at a later date by new bricks. These have combined to make a wall that hems us in.

When shall we stop reinforcing the Great Wall with new bricks?

A curse on this wonderful Great Wall!

Lawrence H. Ravlin

cheap laugh

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Citing titles without discussing contents is a common practice of opponents of research and scholarship, both in the Congress and outside. It is a cheap way to gain a laugh, perhaps, and to score a point. Having subscribed to The Nation for twenty-two years, I am surprised to find this same technique now used in its pages. If Mr. Roszak [review of The Annotated Sherlock Holmes, The Nation, Aug. 19] knows the works he mentions to be trivial, it is because he has examined their contents, not their labels. He ought to know that trivial and even meretricious research in the social sciences and humanities often carries the most resounding titles. One wonders if, coming upon it by title only and for the first time, The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte might not receive the same scorn.

Dell Hymes, Professor of Anthropology
University of Pennsylvania

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Is There an Ethic in the House?

THE CASE AGAINST CONGRESS: A Compelling Indictment of Corruption on Capitol Hill. By Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson. Simon & Schuster. 473 pp. $5.95.

ABOVE THE LAW: The Rise and Fall of Senator Thomas J. Dodd. By James Boyd. The New American Library. 352 pp. $6.50.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

There is something old-fashioned about concern with the venality of Congress. Even the rhetoric of this concern is a weary echo of yesterday's futile crusades: "lobbies," "corrupt practices," "special interests," "a public office is a public trust." These issues have largely exhausted American liberalism. After all, it is now sixty years since the publication of David Graham Phillips' Treason of the Senate, forty-three years since the passage of the still unamended and now obsolete Corrupt Practices Act, and twenty-two years since the enactment of the Lobbying Act, a statutory placebo, comforting but ineffective. A long time in which the basic evils of corrupt politics have continued to fester. And the new radicalism, swirling in the immensities of history, could hardly care less about the debauchery of Congress by big money. Why belabor the obvious?

Yet the problem irresistibly thrusts itself upon us. The tradition of Jacksonian grab has always burned brightly in Congress. Today's venality, if less crude than that of the past, is more dangerous because it is becoming institutionalized. The struggle to influence the decision-making processes is conducted by powerful private interest groups whose ties to government are multiplying at the very time that disillusionment with the political process is spreading. Politics has become big business; campaign spending in this year's national and local elections is expected to reach $250 million. To an extent only vaguely grasped by most Americans, the electoral process has become the pawn of powerful special interests, the "big donors."

Beyond this, the campaign contribution is the key that opens the door to legislative largess, the lingua franca of the influence seeker. It is an ideal instrument because it masks the purchase of legislative power as the exercise of a civic duty. It is legitimized by the fiction that the contributor is an altruist and the contribution a quid for which no quo is expected to return. (How Phillips raged against this fiction in Treason of the Senate? "Who pays the big election expenses of your congressman . . . ? The bulk of the money for the 'political trust' comes from 'the interests.' . . . Do you imagine those who foot those huge bills are fools? Don't you know that they make sure of getting their money back, with interest, compound upon compound?")

Supplementing the campaign contributions are other equally safe ways of persuading the reluctant or rewarding the cooperative law maker: testimonial dinners, legal fees, honorariums for lectures and speeches (a lecture bureau in Washington specializes exclusively in booking legislators), office expense funds, poker winnings, insurance and real estate commissions, jobs for relatives and outright gifts of money, goods or services (the use of corporate aircraft, for example).

Paralleling the once unique structure of oil politics, which protects the oil depletion allowance by subsidizing the campaigns of Southern Congressional candidates and lightening the burden of their needy colleagues elsewhere, defense industries are parlaying local jobs together with campaign contributions and related forms of persuasion distributed through subcontractors strategically selected for their influence on key legislators into super-hawkish, self-perpetuating baronies of privilege which thwart Congressional opposition to the Administration's Vietnamese policy.

Theoretically, this one-sided access to Congressional power (the average voter of course cannot make the kind of contribution which would insure his access to legislative power) is banned by statutes outlawing corporate and labor union contributions to federal election campaigns. But this prohibition is a huge joke; corporations and unions routinely evade the law and are solicited to evade it. And corporations regularly cooperate with candidates and campaign committees in dodges which compound their law violations by disguising their contributions as tax-deductible business expenses. The campaign contribution breeds deception and hypocrisy because it forces the legislator to handle money the origin of which he cannot officially acknowledge. As the late Phillip Graham, publisher of The Washington Post, put it:

We force the able man entering public life to launch his career with an initial act of blatant hypocrisy, and to endure this indignity every time he runs again. Even putting the best possible face on the situation, it can be described only as morally squalid, ethically shocking and spiritually revolting.

The Bobby Baker, Powell and Dodd cases have renewed public concern with legislative corruption. The question of campaign subsidies has now been officially recognized as a problem in Executive and Senatorial proposals for democratizing campaign financing as well as in a proposed updating of the Corrupt Practices Act. We have even finally seen the emergence this spring of ethics codes for both chambers.

Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson have indeed made a Case Against Congress. Their devastating and timely indictment is the fruit of three decades of crusading exposé journalism. Leading representatives of our militant muckraking tradition and the authorities on Congressional corruption, they have made of it a lively journalistic speciality through their Washington Merry-Go-Round, a column syndicated in more than 600 newspapers with an estimated readership of 40 million.

Stiff with names, dates and facts, their book is an encyclopedia of the use of legislative power for private purposes. The authors' gusto carries them over an enormous territory which includes: abuse of privilege, conflicts of interest, the operations of the military-industrial, oil, banking and savings and loan, medical, drug, real estate and housing, transportation, communications, farm and other lobbies; the pay-offs disguised as legal fees, the armed services' lobby of legislators who "double in brass" as commissioned reserve officers; the irresistible power of the pork barrel; the foreign aid and sugar quota lobbyists and their Congressional collaborators and the honorarium racket.

But their angry sweep of the field—a Populist outrage that grabs the reader by the lapels and never lets go—inevitably results in a distortion in scale. The authors never distinguish between the goose and common stealers, between the petty cheaters who enrich or indulge themselves by converting to their own use the perquisites of office, and the "respectable" institutionalized corruption of the decision-making process in vital areas of our national life by venal legislators, many of whom would never stoop to stealing geese. (The anonymous 18th-century epigram protesting the Enclosure Act reads: "The law doth punish man or woman/That steals the goose from off the common,/But sets the greater felon loose/That steals the common from the goose.")

No matter—it isn't hard to separate out of this God's plenty the "greater felon" from the lowly buck chaser. Top billing, of course, goes to Sen. Thomas J. Dodd, the Prince Charming whose kiss finally awakened the Senate's sleeping conscience. Other case histories include Congressman (now Judge) Multer's exploitation of his position on the House Banking Committee to accept legal fees for services to building and loan associations, plus his fees from organizing a Swiss-style bank and lottery in Bermuda in evasion of the U.S. laws, and from real estate deals and the ground-floor purchase of banking stock; Senator Dirksen's profitable love affair with the drug industry, sealed by campaign contributions; Adam Powell's junketing, expense account and payroll manipulations—(vitruvian goose stealing condemned by a committee which included some seasoned common heisters); the recently retired Texas Congressman Rogers' passion for the communications and advertising industries; the offer to Congressman Mike Kirwan of a job for his son, to induce him to change his mind and authorize, after an initial rejection, a $91 million dredging project for the benefit of U.S. Steel; and the labors of the late millionaire oilman, Senator Kerr (who most resembles the magnificent Senatorial spoilsman of the 19th century) on behalf of the oil depletion allowance.

These heavies and a half dozen others are presented in detailed biographical sketches; Dodd's and Dirksen's are especially revealing. The authors use the same technique to demonstrate the relationship between corruption and the power of committee chairmen, automatically elevated by seniority to posts for which they are unfit.

The full treatment is also accorded a group of super lobbyists and operators including Clark Clifford (the Defense Secretary emerges as a man of formidable talent; in the 1960 election he "sat solemnly at the strategy councils of the three leading Presidential contenders, advising each how to wrest the nomination from the other two") and Julius Klein, Dodd's Rasputin.

A survey of lawyer-legislators illuminates a highly important area of Congressional corruption—the use of legal fees to reward legislative favors. Of the 535 members of Congress, more than 300 are lawyers and many of them continue an active practice while serving in Congress, or draw income from their firms. The authors' study of fifty law firms with Congressional partners concludes that clients are "the vested interests of America: the banks, insurance companies, gas and oil interests, great corporations."

The authors have somehow overlooked my favorite lawyer-legislator, Sen. Sam Ervin, Jr., of North Carolina, the Claghorn's Hammurabi. Senator Ervin is a member of the Judiciary Committee, whose jurisdiction includes the courts and qualifications of judges. No labor expert, Ervin nevertheless accepted a retainer from a perennial federal labor violator for a 1964 Supreme Court argument of a case involving the law's meaning. He received a fee for his services, a violation of the spirit, if not the letter of the Corrupt Practices Act.

He subsequently defended himself against criticism for this conflict of interest by pointing to the example of Sen. Daniel Webster, but neglected to mention that Webster's legislative venality on behalf of his private clients is a well-documented part of the historical record: Webster charged the Second Bank of America for his legislative services in support of a charter renewal measure and asked the bank's president, Nicholas Biddle, to burn his correspondence. After Ervin lost the case in the Supreme Court, he conducted a hostile investigation of the Court's alleged violation of the separation of powers principle and is now leading the fight against the confirmation of Abe Fortas as Chief Justice, and continuing his attack on the Court under the banner of constitutional purity.

Ervin's citation of historical precedent is part of an extensive canon of Congressional self-justification whose modern Urquell is Nixon's 1952 "Checkers" speech in defense of his slush fund. The most common ploys: the charges are the work of political enemies, especially the Reds (Rivers even blamed Pearson's grave charges against him on the ADA); the legislator had no knowledge that the challenged conduct was wrong; everybody does it—why pick on me; the money was accepted without strings and thus gave the recipient the means to stay honest by refusing more compromising offers; George Washington had a stepson on his staff at Yorktown (Senator Yarborough in defense of his nepotism). Junketing, an abuse which generates the most diverting excuses, has been defended on the ground, among others, that it is "broadening" (even for lame ducks). Racist District of Columbia

Chairman McMillan, a tireless foe of self-government for the District, justifies his trips to Paris on the ground that he wants to understand how urban self-government works in the event that the District (over his dead body) attains that status.

Since 1951, concerned members of both Houses have pressed for ethical codes only to be systematically frustrated by parliamentary ruses or the insistence that further study is needed. At the root of much of the resistance is the myth that the legislator has a part-time job, that he is a modern Cincinnatus who has dropped the plow after spring planting, rushed off to Washington on his horse, planning to return home for the harvesting. It is his private activity which assertedly makes him a true representative of his constituency, a notion which is at odds with the legislator's spiraling responsibilities, his lengthening political life expectancy, the amount of his compensation and his steadily improving pension rights.

Those who insist that the legislator's right to make a buck on the side is integral to his function are equally adamant in resisting financial disclosure requirements which might illuminate con-

the Humanist

A JOURNAL OF HUMANIST AND ETHICAL CONCERN WITH A MODERN VIEWPOINT

Topics treated in recent issues:

legalized abortion	the future of integration
conscientious objection	issues of world law
civil disobedience	marriage and the law
the sexual revolution	church/state relations

Contributors to recent issues:

Leslie Fiedler	B. F. Skinner
Allen Ginsberg	Benjamin Spock
Martin Luther King	E. E. Schattschneider
Charles Frankel	Barbara Ward
Kenneth Boulding	Stratford Lind
Corliss Lamont	Sidney Hook
Algeron D. Black	Edgar Friedberg
Dick Gregory	Bertram Wolfe
Willard Wirtz	Harold Taylor
James Farmer	A. A. Berle
Louis Shon	and many others

THE HUMANIST is a publication of the American Humanist Association

Please enter my name at once to the growing numbers of Humanist subscribers.

To: THE HUMANIST

Dept. 923N, 4244 Ridge Lea Road,
Amherst, New York 14226
... payment enclosed ... one year ($4.50)
... please bill me ... two years ($8.00)

Name _____
Street _____
City _____
State _____ Zip _____

flicts of interest. They complain, as Pearson and Anderson tell us, "it's not fair to deprive constituents of a voice on a vital issue simply because their elected Representative has a stake in it himself."

The Code of Ethics finally adopted by the Senate is a pathetic confession of failure. The House code is an improvement over the Senate's but still falls far short of what is realistically required. And apart from the substantive weaknesses of both codes, it is questionable whether either chamber can effectively police itself through its own committees.

Such housekeeping responsibilities are traditionally delegated to Snopesish clubby types, past masters of the art of not making waves. The collective cover-up is an indelible part of the folkways of both chambers which operate on the principle that the sin is not in cheating but in getting caught. Self-policing is defeated by the prevailing bipartisan "guild ethics" (the schlock ethics of Senatorial courtesy), a reluctance to alienate voting support by challenging practices which are widespread, and by the fear of reprisal. Each chamber can point to its official scourges. Catos who specialize in denouncing goose theft. They are the ritualistic budget shearers for whom the evil of corruption is not so much moral as fiscal.

The Dodd case illuminates the extraordinary tenderness of the Senate toward its own. The Stennis committee held no hearing until six months after the Dodd charges were aired—and then only because of the pressures generated by Pearson and Anderson. The charges and hearing ignored the documented evidence of Dodd's wholesale acceptance of "gifts" from persons and interests he was charged with investigating on the curious ground that censurable misconduct "might be difficult to prove" because "questions of judgment" were involved. In short, it embraces the thesis of the "quid without a quo," even though uncontradicted evidence showed that Dodd gave full value to his benefactors.

In its zeal to confine the case to the narrowest possible grounds, the Stennis committee even refused to act on any conduct which might also constitute a law violation. As James Boyd puts it, "The committee adopted the curious position that when a violation of ethics turned out to be so serious as to constitute a violation of law, the Senate must cease to pursue it."

The committee was content to characterize Dodd's squalid manipulation by Julius Klein as "indiscreet." With an eye to its own interests, it even took care to denounce the four employees whose disillusionment had led them to turn over incriminating documents to Pearson and Anderson. And the whole Senate could not bring itself to uphold the double-billing ground of censure—although the documentary record showed a pattern of even triple billing. (What a contrast to the treatment and punishment of Powell both by the investigating committee and the House—a difference that can only be explained by the special lust that inflames influential sections of the House whenever it is confronted with claimed wrong-doings by blacks. And when Powell was re-elected last year, more than 130 Congressmen demanded that he be prosecuted for the acts for which he was originally excluded and, indeed, the report of the Celler committee contemplated the possibility of such dual punishment.)

Dodd committed the deadliest of all of the legislative sins—the sin of excess. What the Senate establishment feared most was that Dodd's greedy overreaching would endanger its own questionable practices; would in its view,

*Break ope the locks o' th' Senate, and bring in
The crows to peck the eagles.*

James Boyd's account of the Dodd affair is well written and sensitive. Boyd, Dodd's former administrative assistant who blew the whistle on the Senator, tells his dramatic story with admirable fairness and balance. This is a curiously gentle, almost impersonal, book, wholly free of the strident self-justification which frequently mars the disclosures of the disillusioned defector. For Boyd, an inspiring father figure failed him—an experience to which he responds with grief. But those readers who are familiar with Dodd's background are not likely to

THE VENTRILOQUIST

(In Memory of J.P.)

*Four years ago, dear old ventriloquist,
Your outcast voice, as pickled as von Zell's,
Buzzed chandelier, bounced off the hamster cage,
Balked, cracked, and broke out cackling
From your frozen daiquiri
To charm my daughter toward your dentures propped
Across the room (The posh part of the skull!),
An eerie death piece on the radio.*

*Before it died your throat had such control
That my ears now can't tell who's listening.
Today, they say, this foxglove in the park
Tells me your father couldn't understand
Why marriage was for you against the law.
One orange poppy, overweight, intones:
I drank to get myself away from me.
A model sailboat whispers: Cutty Sark . . .
Hart Crane and I loved crew cuts, liked to park,
Liked green, long, sun, deep, seals, beds, loved the dark.*

*Comes then from a motel in Florida—
Via this bobbing lily or the gills
Of some deep-feeder sheephead, carp—
Your last cast as the final unclear sound
Your body must have tried to make your voice
Become its echo, emptying the tub
Of all but what remains. Found you that way.
Still buoyant, said the clerk: your belly
Full of blood, the doctor said, internal Hemorrhage; no teeth in your head.
They too submerged beside an empty bed.*

*Dear lonely creature, kind ventriloquist,
You had a trick of playing with your mouth
Right to the end—I hear it in this park,
Tuning me in before you flew down South,
Speak through the blighted chestnut: Was a lark.*

ROBERT HUFF

Choose ANY ALBUM FREE

with your first selection as a member of the

THEATRE RECORDING SOCIETY

The greatest actors of our time in the greatest plays of all time

Imagine receiving, free, your choice of any one of the magnificent theatre albums shown here! At retail, they cost as much as $24.80 each. But now you may have any one as a gift, to welcome you as a trial member in the Theatre Recording Society.

Magnificent performances — yours to enjoy whenever you wish

As a member, you can enjoy in your own home, great works of the theatre through the most brilliant performances ever recorded. The range is wide and wonderful — from Aristophanes to Ionesco. The players are superb. A Broadway producer can rarely even hope to assemble on one stage the distinguished artists who perform for you, regularly and exclusively, through the Society.

For example, Paul Scofield, Cyril Cusack, and Patrick Magee in Murder in the Cathedral . . . Hermione Gingold and Stanley Holloway in Lysistrata . . . Glenda Jackson and Patrick Magee in Marat/Sade . . . Ralph Richardson and Anthony Quayle in Julius Caesar . . . Lynn Redgrave and Joan Greenwood in The Importance of Being Earnest. These are typical of the productions available to members. Each is full length . . . without cuts or modifications.

Members save 33 1/3 %

Though the Society's recordings sell for up to $24.80 per set at retail . . . as a member, you pay only the low price of just over $4.00 per record, plus a small shipping and handling charge. Your only obligation is to accept as few as four plays over the next year from the many offered. There is no extra charge for stereo.

Claim your free album now

Mail the coupon to receive, free, your choice of any one of the great theatre albums shown above . . . plus your first Society selection (which you also choose from the albums shown). If you're not completely delighted, you may return the shipment within 10 days and your trial membership will be cancelled without obligation. There's no risk. For thrilling hours of great theatre right in your home, mail the coupon today!

TRS 310 DEATH OF A SALESMAN—
Lee J. Cobb, Mildred Dunnock,
Dustin Hoffman, Michael Tolan,
Gene Williams
3—12" LP's $18.85

TRS 311 SAINT JOAN—Siohban
McKenna, Donald Pleasence,
Felix Aylmer, Robert Stephens.
4—12" LP's $24.80

TRS 306 CYRANO DE BERGERAC—
Ralph Richardson, Anna Massey,
Michael Gwynn, Peter Wyngarde.
3—12" LP's $18.85

TRS 303 UNCLE VANYA—Laurence
Olivier, Michael Redgrave, Joan
Plowright, Sybil Thormicle.
2—12" LP's $12.90

TRS 228 ROMEO AND JULIET—
Claire Bloom, Albert Finney, Edith
Evans. 3—12" LP's $17.85

TRS 320 ANTIGONE—Dorothy Tutin,
Max Adrian, Jeremy Brett, Eileen
Atkins, Geoffrey Dunn.
2—12" LP's $12.90

TRS 301 THE GLASS MENAGERIE—
Montgomery Clift, Jessica Tandy,
Julie Harris, David Wayne.
2—12" LP's $12.90

TRS 232 HAMLET—Paul Scofield,
Zena Walker, Diana Wynyard,
Wilfrid Lawson, Roland Culver.
4—12" LP's $23.80

PLUS a Special Bonus Gift

Act now and your prompt reply will bring you whichever of these two free gifts you prefer. Even if you decide to cancel your membership and return your albums after the 10-day free trial, the bonus gift is yours to keep.

SHAKESPEARE/SOUL OF AN AGE. The life of the bard, with readings from the histories, comedies and tragedies by MICHAEL REDGRAVE and RALPH RICHARDSON. A $6.95 retail value.

INGRID BERGMAN'S remarkable recording of Jean Cocteau's THE HUMAN VOICE, a stunning portrait of a tormented, desperate woman. This 12" LP is a $5.95 retail value.

THEATRE RECORDING SOCIETY

505 Eighth Avenue, New York, New York 10018

(Dept. TN-77)

Please enroll me as a trial member. I have indicated below, by number, the album I wish to receive FREE; and the album I want as my first selection, for which you will bill me later. I have also checked the extra bonus gift I wish to receive free. In addition to my first selection, my only obligation is to accept as few as four plays over the next year at the Society's low price of just over $4.00 per record plus shipping and handling. If not completely delighted, I may return my introductory shipment (keeping my free bonus gift) within 10 days and my membership will be cancelled without obligation.

Send me free: ☐ Send as my first selection: ☐

Send me my extra bonus, free (check one):

☐ Shakespeare/Soul of an Age ☐ The Human Voice

Send my records in (check one): ☐ Mono ☐ Stereo

Name (Please Print)

Address

City State Zip

Please note: Canadian and foreign prices slightly higher.

view the Senator's disgrace as a Great Fall; he is closer to the stage of Arthur Miller than of Sophocles.

If there is bitterness in the book, it is only toward the smug lords of the Senate who took such pains to screw the lid on the case and to avoid issues which might broaden into a demand for basic reform. In the meantime, the law-enforcement agencies (the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Justice) whose superior claims gave the Stennis committee a pretext for limiting its charges, seem to have lost interest in the whole affair. The Senator has announced his intention to run again in 1970 and predicts an easy victory.

These books sour faith in representative government. They should be especially depressing to the pluralists among our political scientists who argue that out of the interplay of contending interest-centered private groups emerges a self-regulating politics that is rational and just and what's more delivers us from the asserted horrors of mass movements and extremism threatened by a politics based on the public interest. The books demonstrate that corruption is a handmaiden of pluralist politics because private interest-centered groups buy power for a price which is determined by intergroup competition in the influence market.

Can the dispossessed who are now clamoring for inclusion in the decision-making process achieve their objectives without the capital needed to buy access to legislative power? It is not too farfetched to propose that their leader-lobbyists be supplied by the government with slush funds sufficient to buy the favor of powerful legislators. Think how the heartbreak of Resurrection City might have been avoided by campaign contributions where they could "do the most good." Maybe a huge testimonial dinner tendered by the poor to selected key committee chairmen could even now do some good.

they are, there's not going to be anything to apologize about. What we are, we're going to wait with on this whole trip."

The world divided into those who have had the experience and were out front and were on the bus—and those who hadn't, and weren't.

In 1964 that $1,500 bus was wired so sophisticatedly that inside you could record outside, and vice versa, broadcast over, replay it instantly and, frantically, cut the variable time lag between past action and present sense of it to one-thirtieth of a second. Was it fun? Wow! Did they feel bad about Stark Naked, poor gal, going stark raving mad from a bad trip? No! Didn't they later learn to give someone having a bad trip Total Attention, to sympathize, feel with her, and thus bring her out? Wasn't it, in fact, like being in a rolling, drug-induced state of Esalen-type group therapy, a roaring, joyous, record-breaking, mind-sharing, group-feeling Marathon Encounter? Yes, it was very much like that.

Day-Glo & Light Nights

THE ELECTRIC KOOL-AID ACID TEST. By Tom Wolfe. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 413 pp. $5.95.

JOEL LIEBER

Mr. Lieber's latest novel is Move! A new novel. The Chair, will be published early next year (both David McKay).

No atheist can properly understand or really explain the belief of a thoroughgoing believing Catholic: that's what I thought when I read Albert Goldman on rock music in New American Review #3 and Benjamin DeMott on the same subject in The New York Times Magazine. You can't get across the emotional, body-responding, Dionysian, mentally charged thing with the kind of erudite academese they brought to the subject—even though they were intellectually accurate in most of their explanations. The rock movement and the scene it grew out of—drugs, hippies, dropping out—is anti-intellectual. Its emphasis is on feeling, on the physical and the sensual.

What Tom Wolfe has done in The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test is come as close as seems possible, with words, at re-creating the entire mental atmosphere of a scene in which one's understanding is based on feeling rather than verbalization. His book on Ken Kesey and the origins of the psychedelic movement is nonfiction told as experimental fiction; it is a genuine feat and a landmark in reporting style.

Kesey—a small-town boy from Oregon, most likely to succeed in high school, athlete, actor and diamond-in-the-rough novelist (Sometimes A Great Notion and One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, both Viking)—was introduced to drugs in 1959. He was paid $75 a day to take drugs experimentally at the Veterans Hospital in Menlo Park, Calif. Although the doctors treated him like a laboratory animal, Kesey discovered that he was no longer shut off from the world, that doors opened in his mind that he never knew existed; he found "intuitively that, he experienced the, well, it was difficult to put into words."

A clique gathered around him, the Merry Pranksters, and he became its spiritual navigator. He felt himself becoming a superhero, charismatic leader, mythological chieftain, fabulist, wizard. The group pushed further on; they bought an old school bus, wired it with sound and movie equipment, and took off with 400-horsepower energy, with tons of elaborate Ampex recording equipment, movie projectors, gallons of Day-Glo paint and, of course, whatever drug or chemical made them feel more intensely, more magically the "things" of themselves and mid-20th-century America they had previously been closed to.

Everybody went "right out front" on that bus. He could say: "I'm sorry I kicked you in the ass, but I'm not sorry I'm an ass-kicker. That's what I do, I kick people in the ass." Everybody is going to be what they are, whatever

What started out as being a fun trip became a mission and the mission became a religion, a religion totally dedicated to Now, the ecstasy of living in the present. It was a devotion to capturing the unknown present experience exemplified by the desire to "wire the place so you can hear a flea fart." Kesey became the prophet, experiencing that prophetic flash of ecstasy just like Saul on the road to Damascus, Mohammed near Mecca. It wasn't that, in breaking with life's ordinary pursuits, Kesey was coming on as an "ethical prophet of conduct." Rather, he was an exemplary prophet, his own life an example for his followers. And his followers developed their own symbols, vocabulary, cultic practices, art forms and music—an entire life style.

On they roared, alert, alive—Neal Cassady monologuing while flipping sledge hammers, the others catching and throwing rubber balls to prove their competence, recording themselves and America's gas-station attendants. The Pranksters visited Leary at Millbrook and laughed at the group. They had turned their backs and were living in the dead past, in a meditative 3,000-year-old thing on some hillside in India; but we're alive, now, in mid-20th-century, neon-plastic-chrome-electronic America, and it's fantastic!

They were uninterested in the standard intellectual pursuits, in books, movies and politics. They spiked a Vietnam Day parade. They were the first to rediscover and dig Hermann Hesse's legendary trip, Journey to the East. And Kesey, footing the bill for everything, spent $103,000 of his own money on Intrepid Trips, Inc. Along the way they got busted on possession-of, played at zany Chaplinesque cops-and-robbers chases, got through to the Hell's Angels, and influenced the Beatles' music (Wolfe clearly suggests that the Beatles got to Sgt. Pepper via their California-born LSD experiences and that they plagiarized the Magical Mystery Tour bus idea from Kesey's Day-Glo bus trip.)

The Acid Tests themselves—orgies of strobos, dancers, projectors, drugs, acid-rock music, amplifiers and sound mixers—turned the world onto their discoveries, introduced the styles and cults that became the Haight-Ashbury era of 1966, setting all the styles of hippies, psychedelia, and the whole anti-cerebral Probation Generation.

Kesey, felon and fugitive, slips in and out of Mexico, is chased by the federals and the FBI, appears and disappears like the Scarlet Pimpernel, finally emerging again but only after internal friction and cruelly directed Acid Tests have crumbled the Pranksters' oncemystical unity. I'm going further, said this new Kesey, beyond jail and beyond drugs, without drugs, to . . . where? It's not clear, he doesn't quite say, and either Kesey is keeping it a secret or he said it and Wolfe didn't understand it.

One finishes the book, wondering: who was Ken Kesey? Did Wolfe quote Kesey enough, really analyze the man who brought middle-class kids to hippiedom and psychedelia? I think not. Somehow, Wolfe's amazing gifts of perception fell short of capturing Kesey. And beyond being "a madonna of the hill country," who was Kesey's wife, Faye, and how did she feel about sharing him with Mountain Girl and Black Maria? How do their children fare living in this world of the ecstatic present? Never a word about it. Couldn't the book have been 100 pages shorter? Yes, yes, YES:: :::: as Wolfe would say.

But you get excited reading this history. Its words reach as close to the feverishness of the thing itself as possible. The Pranksters recorded and preserved their own images and actions and pandemonium; then Wolfe, the Contemporary Historian, recorded that pandemonium, using such equipment as word-of-mouth, tapes, movies, letters and his own eyes and ears, probably some drugs, a sense of wonder and empathy and of life, and a beautiful, special kind of talent.

A Genius for Unsavoryness

SOREN KIERKEGAARD: JOURNALS & PAPERS. Translated and edited by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong. Indiana University Press. Vol. 1. 539 pp. $15.

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig is a poet who teaches at Columbia University.

It is no longer necessary to defend Kierkegaard, or to apologize for still another translation of his work into English. Thirty years after Walter Lowrie's first courageous efforts on his behalf, Kierkegaard is no longer debatable. The National Book Award is given to his translators; at a proper age (no later than adolescence), we are taught a healthy familiarity with his favorite words: existence, anxiety, the absurd. To be sure, his language is often eccentric, his style arrogantly complicated at times, and his feud with Hegel (or a ghost of Hegel) costly because of all the exhausting terminology he takes over from his enemy. But one is willing to forgive Kierkegaard these blemishes. He has a place on our cultural family tree: one of those who stirred the life force, and in his own angry way helped give birth to what (and how) we value.

Yet the more I read this interesting new edition of his journals and papers, the more I would like to defend Kierkegaard. Not his curious mastery of style or the genius he had for conceptualizing his own (and our) most difficult experiences. Here Kierkegaard needs no defending.

I would prefer, rather, to defend his unsavoryness, his unusual gift for being disagreeable. I would like to remember the many times I have found him to be an irascible, cruelly brilliant man who worked at suffering the way some men work at making money: day and night, especially if there was a prospect of making others as ill at ease in their lives as he couldn't help but be in his. Often enough I find myself giving in to the temptation that Kierkegaard himself dangled willfully in front of all eyes: the temptation to taunt him; to laugh at his ridiculous trouser legs and his ruthless polemical mind. Kierkegaard did not think that he was easy to get along with. If anyone found him so, and there were indeed few, he was apt to think the man a fool.

The passages in his Journal which deal with his betrothal to Regina, for example (they are not included in this first volume of the present edition), are almost unbearable. When Kierkegaard was in his mid-20s he fell in love with Regina

One of America's most incisive political commentators examines the origins of the Middle East crisis—and explores the prospects for peace

"James P. Warburg's approach is a rational, cool-headed one. It will win few hosannas among those who seek one-sided writing. . . . He attempts to place in its proper historical perspective the conflict between Israel and the Arab nations. . . . His book is not crippled by the bias that has made many books on the subject appear ignorant of the fact that not all countries and world leaders wear black hats or white hats."

—Cleveland Plain Dealer

"Comprehensive and readable. . . . The author of this well-written book contends that the tragic conflict between Jew and Arab was created by 'Western intrusion'."

—Publishers' Weekly

James P. Warburg
CROSSCURRENTS
IN THE MIDDLE EAST

$6.50, now at your bookstore

Olsen, the very young daughter of an acquaintance. Following several months of surprising happiness, during which time he was engaged to Regina, Kierkegaard became convinced that the affair was a mistake. He loved the girl but felt, compulsively, that he could never make her happy: that life with him would indeed be a hell. The impossibility of marriage obsessed him. He came to think of himself as a kind of cripple, calling this inability to lead a normal life his "thorn in the flesh." The affair was a torment to Kierkegaard, and in the Journal it becomes a torment to the reader, as slowly Kierkegaard begins to chide Regina for being weak and sentimental; for lowering herself on at least one occasion when she actually begged him to return. In the end he hits upon a fine plan to "detach" Regina from him. He lets it be known in Copenhagen that he is an unscrupulous playboy. Every night for a year he shows up at all the fashionable theatres, and intimates to Regina how much he values his erotic freedom, though perhaps some day, when he is tired, he may settle down with a young girl.

That he chose to suffer so much and to inflict suffering in the name of his spiritual integrity is rare and admirable. I have no doubt. But it cannot be waved aside as an eccentricity of genius. In this affair Kierkegaard was a cad: not only did he humiliate Regina and her family but the Journal betrays a curious fascination with the power his decision gave him over the young girl. An unwholesome business to say the least. Yet it is worth mentioning, for Kierkegaard, in one form or another, made it the subject of his most popular works: Either/Or, Fear and Trembling, Repetition. The affair with Regina established a pattern for his life which he repeats and conceptualizes into his most characteristic philosophy.

It is a philosophy of the disagreeable; a philosophy of discomfort; and the word he used to express the discomfort—anxiety—has become part of our household vocabulary. "Anxiety is the first reflex of possibility," he tells us; loneliness and above all disagreement are like spiritual talismans. The important thing is to live accused, and to deserve the accusation: for "only a person who is bitten by men becomes an apostle." When there is no one to revile your quirky (by public standards) behavior, it is a sign that, in all probability, you have sold your soul.

Several years before his death, in the midst of a single-handed polemic against the entire establishment of the Danish church, he noted in the Journal: "Action expressing personal integrity never makes a hit at the time; instead it offends people. But when twenty years have gone by, for example, and the person is still living, and if by this time he has also become a windbag, then he is recognized for that action. But only on the condition that by this time he has become a windbag, for otherwise he will be about to initiate new character-action and so recognition fails to appear."

Kierkegaard was no windbag. He took his precautions, and knew how to discourage anyone who was tempted to admire him too frankly, without the discomfort which he felt was inseparable from self-discovery. In his literary style, he developed the art of ironical obscurity, partly because of the obsessive reticence he felt about revealing his thoughts and emotions, and partly (as he intimates above) by design, in accordance with his theory of "indirect communication": a policy of skillful annoyance destined to keep the reader disoriented, and at least partly convinced of his own stupidity. In this anxious condition, the coup de grâce of spiritual insight can be administered with verve and rhetorical elegance. But in his life also, Kierkegaard observed the uncomfortable policy of keeping people at a distance, just far enough away to revile him, to "bite" him as he says. "It seems to be forgotten that to be an author is action"; and that to maintain the flow of action one must "gesticulate with his entire personal existence." To prevent one's ideas from being "taught" and "recognized," one must rub the entire world of readers the wrong way, fascinating them, and drawing them, thought by thought, suffering by suffering, into knowledge of themselves. This was Kierkegaard's life project, but it was also his character. He chose to wield his "thorn in the flesh" and to draw blood with it. And he succeeded.

I would not have liked to live with Søren Kierkegaard; and I'm not sure I'd have wanted him as a friend. I must admit that when he talks about the courage of "isolation" and the purgative virtues of anxiety, there are times when I feel like going to a movie. I admit also to other days when the uneasy humility Kierkegaard induces feels all too much like a necessary touch. Surely he understood more about "isolation," and the secret landscape of "inwardness" (another word he taught us to use), than any man of his century.

One is therefore glad—and a bit impatient—that a very ample selection from Kierkegaard's papers and journals is at last being published in English. When the present edition is complete it will run to five volumes. The translation itself is lively and remarkably faithful to the range of styles (from clumsy to incisive to elegant) which characterizes Kierkegaard, especially in his voluminous private writings. The Honges have resisted the temptation to smooth over Kierkegaard's notations, remaining faithful to the spirit he himself assigned to the Journals: "to let the thoughts come forth with the umbilical cord of the original mood, and to forget as much as possible all regard for their possible use. . . ." The result is vigorous, and as engaging as Kierkegaard allowed himself to be, even in private.

I was disconcerted, however, by the Honges' decision to group the material of the Journal and Papers not chronologically but according to subject matter. This first volume, for example, goes

INTEGRATED HOUSING
AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT MUTUAL REAL ESTATE
INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

► Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name: _____

Address: _____

Zip: _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

221 East 42nd Ave., New York 10017

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage
for Canada; $3 foreign)

Name: _____

Address: _____

City: _____

State: _____ Zip No. _____

DON'T FORGET CHICAGO!

Chicago proved that a nation cannot fight an illegal and immoral war overseas without practicing Gestapo measures at home. More than 600 people were arrested, thousands were savagely beaten or gassed. The club-swinging police pursued demonstrators into hotels, local neighborhoods and even private homes. One of their shouts: "Kill, kill, kill!"

Chicago proved that beneath the facade of democratic rhetoric the totalitarian mentality has made great inroads on the American nation.

The National Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam, which organized many of the protest activities in Chicago as well as the various big demonstrations of the last few years, has been saying for some time that we in America are in danger of losing our democratic rights.

Chicago proved it! It brought to the surface the viciousness that lurks below in Establishment ranks. It wasn't just Mayor Daley and his police who went berserk. The majority of the Democratic Party convention (except for the McCarthy-McGovern wings) stood with Daley in Chicago and with Johnson and Humphrey in Vietnam. Humphrey issued a statement a day later defending Daley's brutalities against "revolutionaries."

DON'T FORGET CHICAGO! HELP NOW!

MORE IMPORTANTLY—DON'T FORGET VIETNAM, where hundreds of Americans and thousands of Vietnamese are being slaughtered every week the war is allowed to continue.

1. Offer your services, in whatever capacity you can, for future activities to end the war in Vietnam.
2. Send telegrams of protest to Mayor Daley and Vice President Humphrey demanding that an amnesty be granted to all arrested, including Sidney Peck, Tom Hayden and Jerry Rubin.
3. Contribute funds desperately needed for legal defense and for ongoing antiwar activities of National Mobilization.

THE NATIONAL MOBILIZATION COMMITTEE TO END THE WAR IN VIETNAM

Chairman: Dave Dellinger; National Coordinator: Prof. Robert Greenblatt; Co-Chairmen: Rev. Ralph Abernathy, Al Evanoff, Prof. Donald Kalish, Sidney Lens, Lincoln Lynch, Prof. Sidney Peck, Rt. Rev. Charles O. Rice, Cleveland Robinson, Dagmar Wilson, John Wilson; Treasurer: Eric Weinberger; Project Co-directors: Tom Hayden, Rennie Davis

National Mobilization Committee
5 Beekman Street
New York, N.Y. 10038

I herewith enclose $..... for legal defense and ongoing antiwar activity.
(Please make out checks or money orders to: National Mobilization Committee.)

- ☐ I am willing to organize a group in my area to work for National Mobilization's objectives to end war and racism.
- ☐ I am willing to do office or organizing work.

Name

Address

City State Zip Phone

alphabetically from "Abstract, Abstraction" to "The Extraordinary, The Exception." The others will follow suit, and the final volume will group entries related to Kierkegaard's personal life. There is no doubt that such an arrangement is useful in many ways, especially to readers who are already quite familiar with Kierkegaard. What we have is a vast encyclopedia of Kierkegaardiana. When in doubt, flip open the dictionary of Kierkegaard's private mind; avoid the discomfort of a meandering, chaotic, multi-threaded discourse.

I do not mean to quarrel with the Hongs's choice of subject headings, or with their selection of the material to go under each heading. They have labored with delicacy, grasping the many notes of complication which Kierkegaard introduces endlessly into his thoughts. But, in the end, they have given us their Kierkegaard. Between us and the difficult, perhaps disorderly self-invention of the man, they have interposed their own admittedly worthy, understanding.

I would have preferred to be alone with Kierkegaard, painful as that sometimes is. To be exasperated by his coyly involute sentences, shocked into recognition by his sudden pathetic brilliance; happy to discover for myself the interruptions and innovations which the man came upon in the daily work of his own idiosyncrasy. True the chronology is often difficult to establish, but surely no more difficult than this division into subject headings which, at best, is an affair of opinion since any number of items could, with perfect ease, fit into half a dozen of the categories.

The very idea of a Journal, no matter how conceptualized and apparently distant from life it may be, implies disorder, tentativeness. There is, after all, a pleasure which disorder procures for us, and it was a pleasure Kierkegaard did not feel ashamed to give himself as he recorded his vanishing moods and reflections. Such, we may say, is the shape of our mind: it is not pretty, but understanding grows from it, and I am planted in it for better and for worse. That is the pleasure the Hongs have chosen not to give us in their edition of Kierkegaard. To recall Kierkegaard's own words, they have cut "the umbilical cord" and ruffled the "original mood," by having too much regard for the "possible use" the Journal might have.

We must, however, be grateful to the Hongs for their enormous labor. Even in alphabetical order, Kierkegaard's Journals and Papers are worth having for angry days, or "inward" days; especially when they have been translated in as lively and sensitive a manner as are the texts in this first volume.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

A MARRIED MAN. By Benjamin DeMott. Harcourt, Brace & World. 153 pp. $3.95.

Mr. DeMott has here written the contemporary American novel about a married man's affair with a younger woman. Although neither of his main characters is particularly likable—he's a worldly, successful and uneasy intellectual, and she is a debutante—"communications" type full of maddening superficialities—Mr. DeMott manages to make both enormously sympathetic as he takes them swiftly through their embarrassed meeting, their ecstatic love-makings, and the final decision to part which proves almost literally unbearable for both. The author's depiction of the tension and panic that grip people who find themselves unprepared for where their lives have gone is particularly acute, as is, in a very brief section, his touching portrait of his hero's wife. In making the various aspects of their pain and their love for each other so tangible, DeMott has expanded his characters from the slick stereotypes which they at first seem into substantial human beings.

WELCOME TO THE MONKEY HOUSE. By Kurt Vonnegut, Jr. Delacorte Press. 298 pp. $5.95.

I was about to say that this volume reads like a collection of old Collier's stories when I noted that seven of them did really appear in Collier's. Mr. Vonnegut writes that they are all "examples of work I sold in order to finance the writing of the novels." With very few exceptions, they are slick formula tales, each with its own little twist, so that the twist becomes a predictable part of the formula after a while. This refinancing seems unfair to Mr. Vonnegut's large audience of readers, who should hereby be warned to purchase his novels in larger quantities so that their author is not driven to prepare news releases or want ads.

J C SAVES. By Robert Gover. Trident Press. 191 pp. $4.50.

In a note that deserves to serve as epilogue to this novel, the man from The New York Times Book Review was put out recently that Mr. Gover and Kitten, of all people, should turn up as the voice of reason. Kitten and J. C. meet again during a riot in the very black neighborhood where Kitten was peddling her gorgeous wares along with the rest of the "hoes." In this third installment (One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding, Here Goes Kitten) of the adventures of Kitten and J. C., Gover's wonderful alternating descriptions (by Kitten and white, maybe-not-so-hopelessly square J. C., now married to a suburban harpy) take us through the police-instigated "riot" near Kitten's whorehouse to J. C.'s beach house, where he has dreams of installing Kitten as a maid if he can stop making love to her long enough to work out the details. Kitten turns J. C. onto LSD, and he's finally brought out of his J.C.-dom into the dazzling knowledge of just what Kitten's been talking about through his three-book tryst with her. Will J.C. have to go crazy again to get out of the hospital he's landed in? Because Gover seems to think that Kitten might help him to stay sane this time.

DAYBREAK. By Joan Baez. The Dial Press. 159 pp. $3.95.

Joan Baez wants to give her audience as much of herself as she and they can bear; in this elliptical autobiographical memoir, she does it, and often beautifully. Very little is said about her singing career except as mention of it occurs naturally among her other concerns here: nonviolence, draft resistance, her relationship with her family, and a general struggle toward openness. The scenes in which her father appears, and a collage of impressions from the time she spent in jail for draft-resistance activities, are particularly vivid. Some readers may feel that much of it borders on the goody-goody, or that Miss Baez's unresolved childhood fears about aggression make her belief in nonviolence more emotional than philosophical. That such questions occur at all is exactly because she has allowed them to in this artless and revealing memoir.

THE EXAGGERATIONS OF PETER PRINCE. By Steve Katz. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 281 pp. $6.95.

Steve Katz may be a good writer, but it's hard to tell from this doggedly vacant novel, in which intentionally comic-strip characters undergo an intentionally stupid series of (intentionally) wildly boring adventures, intent on attracting negative reviews. Every once in a while Mr. Katz drops his guard and lets in something that's really funny, but not often enough to make me believe that anyone but its proofreader has been able to read through every one of its beautifully designed pages. The book contains maps, photos, three-column simultaneous narratives, and all kinds of typographical games, but they're so carefully zany that they seem to be right out of Creative Playthings.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1264

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 Did he question what twists an early gardener's back? (10)
- 6 See 1 down
- 10 and 13 Evidently the executives are candidates for what the pursuing police no longer stand on. (7, 5)
- 11 Construct a possibly artificial elevation? (5-2)
- 12 Divers mechanical parts, one of which might be better if big. (8)
- 13 See 10 across
- 15 and 29 Made by those who fell in controlling the direction taken. (9)
- 17 One of the things a writer might dip into. (3, 6)
- 19 Tom is docked here, naturally. (4, 2, 3)
- 21 Residents of some developments complain of such a boom. (5)
- 23 Cut of a man's walk? Probably not! (5)
- 24 Traditionalists might after dinner, with a cigar and a document. (8)
- 27 Descriptive of Emma Lazarus' shore. (7)
- 28 There's a song about the last letter on the state of it. (7)
- 29 See 15 across
- 30 Called attention to the drive's date, conceivably. (10)

DOWN

- 1 and 6 across A penny, in the case of Simple Simon? One might have a little salt with it. (8)

- 2 Irritated because social standing came first? (7)
- 3 Not likely to be formed by scabs. (5)
- 4 An attractive quality, obviously. (9)
- 5 Trespasses in another version? (5)
- 7 See 26 down
- 8 Means justification? (10)
- 9 Part of a cheer and a raspberry, a little way up for those in deep water. (3, 5)
- 14 Relating to the matter of dollars and cents, perhaps. (10)
- 16 A lot of land, but it shouldn't be if I'd a horse! (8)
- 18 Ruler over wind and low creature. (4, 5)
- 20 Ten-line composition made easy. (7)
- 22 Managed to come up with arguments in the passage? (7)
- 24 Books are probably so called. (5)
- 25 Not a negative way to create character.
- 26 and 7 down Like a well-packed toboggan run, as a rule? (4, 3, 4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1263

ACROSS: 6 Stud; 10 Ease off; 11 Burrows; 12 and 27 Oil slick; 13 Elucidated; 15 Ensigns; 16 Olympia; 17 In-group; 20 Inhabit; 22 Near and far; 23 Bang; 25 Ithacan; 26 Animato; 28 Aspersions. DOWN: 1 The Bohemian Girl; 2 Insults; 3 Taos; 4 Enfold; 5 Tobacco; 7 Two-step 8 Disadvantageous; 9 and 1 across Friday the thirteenth; 14 Ignorance; 18 Graphic; 19 Pedants; 20 Imamate; 21 Bravado; 24 Dips.

PUBLICATIONS

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Marco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most acing American poetry since Mass Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

"SUMAC," a tri-quarterly, will appear in September, publishing poetry, fiction, criticism. The first issue includes work by Robert Duncan, Louis Simpson, Kenneth Koch, John Thompson, Denise Levertov and others. Edited by Dan Gerber, Jr. and Jim Harrison. $3.50—one year. Ms. and Subscriptions, Box 29, Fremont, Michigan 49412.

OVER 2,000,000 Back Date Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send needs. MID-TOWN, Box 934-N, Maywood, N.J. 07607.

IS GOD pro-Communist? Read the Link. Send 10c and a stamped self-addressed envelope to: R. Hildebrandt, 13685 Glenwood Ave., Detroit, Michigan 48205.

LITERARY SERVICES

LITERARY "handyman." Talent for humor. Will help enliven your play, speech, report. Piecework, line, paragraph, page. Box 617, c/o The Nation.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium, and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60659.

EDUCATIONAL

RECONSTRUCT THE SELF through communal, experimental education. Blake College, 200 N. Jefferson, Eugene, Oregon 97402.

PERSONALS

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write: giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (Adviser) "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (if words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10011
242-8400

FREE OFFER:

A while back we advertised the book you wanted as a free gift with your new subscription to The NATION. You meant to subscribe then BUT you left the magazine at a friend's house, or perhaps you clipped the ad and were just too busy—or too involved with political events—to follow up.

Here's a second chance. If you subscribe now, you will receive FREE any one of the following books. Pick one:

Clip & Mail

GRUENING OF ALASKA,
by Sherwood Ross ☐

THE DESTRUCTION OF CALIFORNIA,
by NATION contributor Raymond F. Dasmann ☐

BITTER GREETINGS,
by NATION contributor Jean Carper ☐

SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES,
by NATION contributor J. Bronowski ☐

RUSSIA AT WAR,
by Alexander Werth ☐

AIR WAR: VIETNAM,
by Frank Harvey ☐

THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT,
by NATION Washington correspondent Robert Sherrill ☐

LBJ LAMPOONED: Cartoon Criticism of Lyndon B. Johnson,
intro. by Jules Feiffer ☐

HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS,
by Louis H. Bean ☐

Send this coupon to:

THE NATION 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I've checked the book I want.

☐ I'll try you for 3 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N9-23

The good fight
is now in
NATION
—Why not
join now?

BURLINGAME

SEP 28 1968

LIFE INSURANCE G. SCOTT REYNOLDS

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 30, 1968 35 cents

PARIS

Rendezvous in October

JOHN FREARS

MEXICO CITY

Flags, Tanks & Students

G. M. BERGMAN

Two French Books on May

TOM HAJEN

The Hope of Jean-Paul Sartre

DICT ON HUEY NEWTON

Oversupply of Doubt Wilbur Wood

ANITIES & INHUMANITIES Louis Kampf

5-628 PL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

a delicate balance

Rio Piedras, P.R.

DEAR SIR: In the Texas Observer, where rhetoric and conviction are no such even-paced team as in The Nation, I found these two sentences shortly before the Chicago convention: "Americans conscientiously shocked and appalled by this war should not be trapped by the question, 'What will you do if it's Humphrey vs. Nixon?' . . . If the political bosses present us, who are the people, with this miserable choice, to hell with them; we will begin anew."

Well, they have presented us with the choice, and I for one am compromiser enough to hope The Nation will make it. Getting out of the war has to be a protracted and discouraging process in any event; and the nice balancers of words are already telling us that on domestic as well as foreign issues they can scarcely tell one of the two programs from the other; but the more that balances the more the scales tip. Balance for balance, I don't want to see Mr. Nixon and his States' rights friends administering our domestic policies.

Robert C. Stephenson

how to spot one

Lexington, Ky.

DEAR SIR: I was amused by this passage from an article in the September 10 Wall Street Journal: "Patrolman Lin Fowler has turned to 'uncovering Socialists, pacifists and do-gooders in the civil rights movement.' Mr. Fowler, who mingles with newsmen to take photos of demonstrators, also keeps careful note of which civil rights leaders read such 'radical publications' as The Nation and The New Republic. He says the 'tip-off that Communist influence is involved comes when someone 'talks about social change.'"

R. L. Zimmerman

choice

Cleveland, O.

DEAR SIR: I watched the political development in Czechoslovakia throughout the past six months from a vantage point inside East Germany, and had innumerable political discussions with Czech colleagues and friends. Benjamin Page's "The Voices of Prague," [The Nation, Sept. 9] seems to me a fair average of what the Czech intelligentsia thinks and wants. Thus I would recommend to every Socialist that he read Mr. Page's article together with Alexander Werth's bitter condemnation [The Censorship War: What Moscow Fears], The Nation, Sept. 16], and then decide whether Mr. Werth's evaluation can possibly be considered the result of a balanced view of the Czechoslovak situation.

G. Kuerli

the church in Greece

New York City

DEAR SIR: I enjoyed reading the review written by John Arthos on Seferis' Collected Poems [The Nation, Sept. 16]. I am, however, puzzled by the emphasis the author puts on the significance of the Greek church which "has preserved more of the ancient feeling . . . than religions of the West."

It seems to me that the very opposite is the case. Christianity and the Hellenic spirit have battled for centuries against each other; the early Christians behaved very much like Mao's Red Guards against the Greek culture; the Christian church, which called the Greeks "mysaros" (abominable), did not allow the overwhelmingly Greek Byzantine Empire to take the name of Hellenic Empire.

(Continued on page 308)

EDITORIALS

The 'Austere' Defense Budget

Editorial writers, columnists, professors, sermonizers and others, whose attention is, as usual, directed elsewhere, could employ their talents usefully by scanning the Congressional Record (House) for September 11, pp. 8505-8532. The discussion, opened by the Hon. George Mahon (D., Tex.), concerns the largest single appropriation bill ever presented to the Congress in the history of the United States. The money, of course, is to be used for our "defense," which ranges all over the globe and out into space. In what can only be described as a love feast—marred slightly by a few easily dismissed objections by Rep. John G. Dow (D., N.Y.), Rep. Sidney R. Yates (D., Ill.) and a few others—the measure was explained, praised and made ready for passage.

The budget authority requested by the President was $77 billion, the amount recommended was $72.2 billion, making it appear that a reduction of $4.8 billion had been effected. The bill was touted as an "austerity budget," and one proponent said sorrowfully that "there may be those who will say that the bill as recommended is too austere, that the committee possibly cut too deeply." Anyone who comes to this conclusion needs a course in remedial reading. The cuts are largely phony. It is simply another case of the military-industrial complex raiding the Treasury.

One item labeled a "reduction" in the amount of $755 million was an application of funds appropriated in previous years to 1969 programs. A much more sizable misrepresentation was in the amount of the appropriation for Vietnam. Rep. Melvin R. Laird (R., Wis.) pointed out that in the past three fiscal years expenditures for our adventure in Southeast Asia had been underestimated by no less than $30 billion in appropriations and $20 billion in expenditures. "This underestimation of war costs," he suggested, "is one of the major causes of the tremendous increase in the cost of living we are experiencing today." On the basis of daily expenditures being incurred, the bill before the House, Mr. Laird said, underestimated the cost of the war by at least $4.5 billion.

Nobody was much worried by such caviling. "It seems to me," Mr. Mahon said in introducing the bill, "that we should show our unanimity. While this is an election year, it still behooves us all, because we are all in the same boat—Democrats and Republicans and Independents—to show our unanimity when it comes to the matter of defending the United States and standing firm against any enemy who would challenge our efforts to promote peace." Peace comes high, with $72 billion as a down payment.

The good fellowship of the House in doling out the tidbits evoked the atmosphere at a reunion of middle-aged college alumni after the fourth drink. L. Mendel Rivers, who needs no introduction, outdid himself in paying tribute to the "incomparable" Charlie Halleck. Mr. Rivers described the retiring Mr. Halleck as "one of the most amazing, most versatile, most dependable, most colorful, most congenial, and most effective men who ever served in the Congress. . . " Rivers confessed that he did not know how to describe a "living institution," but he kept on trying for a few hundred words more.

Mr. Yates spoke to the question and called attention to the Congressional Quarterly finding, based on highly placed sources at the Pentagon, that $10.8 billion in "fat" could be cut out of the military budget (see editorial, The Nation, July 22, p. 37). He got short shrift. "This conclusion," Mr. Mahon pontificated, "is contrary to that of the Committees on Armed Services of the House and the Senate and the Committee on Appropriations of the House and the views of the President and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I do not believe the article is based on hundreds of hours of testimony and six volumes of printed hearings, and the pending bill is." Mr. Yates made one more effort and then sat down, having wasted his breath.

The electorate should realize that this budget is "the ball game." If some restraints are not imposed, there is not much use debating the other items before the Congress. Nor is there much point in talking about a re-directed foreign policy, because as long as the President has the hardware and the manpower, the danger of further involvements will persist.

During his campaign, Senator McCarthy attempted to raise this crucial issue, but none of the nominees addresses himself to it. And since it has not been made a political issue, it will receive scant critical attention in Congress. Mr. Dow, at the end of his remarks, promised that renewed efforts would be made for cuts, and Senator Proxmire has a proposal to investigate defense profits. Action of this sort would help, but it falls far short of what is needed.

More 'Austerity'

This last summer the White House worked out a cozy bipartisan understanding to insure that legislation under which agricultural subsidies are paid would be quietly, and quickly, extended for one year. Since the existing legislation does not expire for a year, a one-year renewal would maintain the subsidy payments until 1971 and tie the hands of the new administration. With the plot so well grooved and greased, on both sides of the aisle, it was thought that a debate might be avoided.

But then Rep. Paul Findley (R., Ill.)—a spoilsport if ever there was one—moved an amendment which would eliminate from the program all subsidies of $20,000 or more to any one grower, and on July 31 managed to secure its adoption by a vote of 230 to 160. Several efforts to amend the legislation in this fashion failed in the Senate. Last week, the House voted to send the legislation to conference shorn of the Findley amendment. Mr. Findley then sought to be recognized for the purpose of offering a motion to instruct the House conferees to vote for a one-year extension with the $20,000 limitation, but he was not recognized. On another motion, the House voted to send the legislation to conference with no reference to the limitation. When it is reported back, it will doubtless be passed in its original form.

All the same, Mr. Findley succeeded in bringing out

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

290

ARTICLES

- 295 Paris:
Rendezvous in October John Frears
- 297 Crisis and Hope:
A Conversation with Jean-Paul Sartre
- 298 Mexico City:
Flags, Tanks and Students G. M. Bergman
- 300 Verdict on Huey Newton:
An Oversupply of Doubt Wilbur Wood
- 304 Life Insurance:
The Immaculate Deception G. Scott Reynolds
- 306 "Dangerous Drugs":
Volstead Exhumed? Edward Joseph Shoben, Jr.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 309 The Humanities and Inhumanities Louis Kampf
- 310 Touch and Go (poem)
Elliott Coleman
- 313 Leaping Ahead of Theory
314 Delivered Without Heat
(poem) Tom Nairn
- 315 Advances and Retreats
Carolyn Stoloff
- 316 Book Marks
Louis Ruchames
- 318 Films
Jose Yglesias
- 319 Crossword Puzzle
Robert Hatch
Frank W. Lewis

Publisher: JAMES J. STORROW JR.
Editor: CAREY McWILLIAMS
Executive Editor: ROBERT HATCH
Associate Publisher: GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Associate Editor: PHIL ARNETT
Literary Editor: HELEN YGLESIAS
Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 10

the facts concerning one of the least defensible of the numerous, largely bipartisan, "subsidies" which are being pushed through the Congress before the new administration takes office. As H. J. Maidenberger reported in a recent issue of The New York Times Magazine, a lame duck can lay golden eggs. Part of Mr. Findley's achievement was to secure and place in the Congressional Record (September 9) the list, by states, of all growers who received $20,000 or more in subsidy payments for the year 1967. Had the $20,000 limitation been adopted, it would have reduced the costs of the program by $209,099,006. In twelve states no farmers received more than $20,000; in the Corn Belt states of Illinois, Iowa and Indiana, only sixty-six farmers were in this category. Of the 9,952 farmers whose payments exceeded $20,000, 8,778 were in fifteen cotton states—states many of whose Representatives think it sinful for mothers with dependent children to receive federal funds. Texas was a country mile ahead of all the others: 2,975 farmers were in the golden $20,000-or-more category, for a grand total of $99,619,326. Arizona and California also had long lists of $20,000-or-more recipients.

A measure of Congressional generosity in this moment of "austerity" is the fact that payments to cotton growers alone totaled $935 million last year, compared with an anti-poverty allocation of $1.75 billion.

Although he lost the battle, Mr. Findley may have won the war. This may be the last year of the big agricultural subsidies; in critical areas the program has not reduced surpluses nor maintained price levels. But for another year—really another two years—the fat cats of the cotton states, Arizona and California included, need not worry nor want.

Preserving Disorder

Wilhelm Vill, a 59-year-old steelworker from Valparaiso, Ind., received a letter from his runaway 16-year-old son, postmarked Chicago. He came up to hunt for him. "I looked at the TV and saw so many young people here," he told Magistrate Louis Gilberto of Chicago's Mass Arrest Court on September 10, "I thought I would be here too." At 11:30 on the morning of August 29, he asked two of Chicago's finest if they'd seen his boy in Lincoln Park. "What do you want here?" one of them responded. "Get out of here or I'll hit you."

Vill answered in his thick-toned German accent: "Hit me. I'm an old man." He was placed under arrest and charged with disorderly conduct. The police report was laced with a charge of drunkenness. "I don't even drink," Vill told Gilberto, who ordered him released.

Meanwhile, at City Hall, the thickest tongue in American politics was blaming outside agitators for the local miseries. Whatever truth there was in the Mayor's defense was riddled by his terrier-like crudeness, the odd, high giggle which freaked his responses, and his losing engagement with his native tongue. "It's the police job to preserve disorder," he tripped once.

A fine local film maker, Tom Paolozzo, is making a convention film which will compare the decline of the Roman Empire to Mayor Daley's Chicago. (The flailing billy clubs, for example, are photographed against the classical façades of Michigan Avenue.) In a time when the policeman's unhappy lot sees him here and there turning into a kind of Praetorian Guard, Paolozzo might be able to use a reminder from Gibbon's account of those bands formed by "the crafty tyrant" Augustus "to prevent or to crush the first motions of rebellion." Wrote the great historian, their "licentious fury was the first symptom and cause of the decline of the Roman Empire."

RICHARD STERN

Political Necessity: Cuban Style

The Cubans boast of the élan and moral excellence of their revolution. There is a great deal in what they say, as we have acknowledged in these pages more than once. It is the more dismaying, therefore, that Fidel Castro has seized the occasion of Russia's invasion of Czechoslovakia to deliver a ranting—one is forced to say irresponsible—speech, the official translation of which has come to us in the Granma of Havana.

Prime Minister Castro admits that there was no legal justification for the Soviet intrusion: "Not the slightest trace of legality exists. Frankly, none whatever." Justification he finds, however, in political necessity. Czechoslovakia was falling into the hands of capitalist imperialism, and that was not tolerable to the Socialist world community. Leaving aside the conspicuous absence of any persuasive evidence that Czechoslovakia was so tending, Castro's position comes to saying that strong nations may trespass on small nations when they deem it appropriate to do so. Considering his belligerence—appropriate enough—against the United States, it is an odd stance.

* He couples this with some veiled but rather cruel jibes at the Czechoslovaks, to the effect that Cubans would never allow a bully from the north to set foot on their soil: that they would never cry for outside help (here he accepts the transparent Russian myth that such a cry came from Prague) to save the purity of their socialism, since it is inconceivable that it could so far degenerate.

Castro is proud of the unified will of the Cuban people; he detects no unity in the people of Czechoslovakia but sees rather a nation worm-ridden by Yankee imperialism, succumbing to the blandishments of Latin American oligarchy and the cynicism of Yugoslav pseudo-communism. This core of his speech he embellishes with disdain for Communist endorsement of peace, relish for indications that the nuclear nonproliferation pact may be delayed or indeed abandoned after the recent Russian action, hope that an end has now been put to any commercial, cultural or political accommodation between East and West.

It would be inappropriate for an American magazine to lecture Castro on international relations or diplomatic manners, but he himself says in this speech that it is not incumbent on Cuba to interfere in the affairs of any sovereign power, including Czechoslovakia. Yet, for motives which one feels he does not divulge, he approves such interference on the part of Russia. He quotes a Latin American source as saying that the logic of Moscow's po-political "necessity" could be applied to a similar action of the United States against Cuba, and adduces from this a hint of further plotting against his country. That, we believe, is not derivable from his citation, which means to point out that international morality is not subject to national convenience. According to Castro, the world is out of step with Cuba; his nation's progress has been great against great hazards, and the disorientation of viewpoint is understandable. While it persists, however, the moral stature of the Cuban revolution remains in hazard.

Failure To Plan

In an editorial, "Magic Words," The Nation (June 10, 1968) quoted Senator Byrd on the nation's school system: "I feel strongly that the closer we can keep the schools to the people, the more effective school system we will have. . . . I want the Federal Government to keep its hands off the operation of the schools in the various localities. . . . I want decentralization of the schools."

What Byrd wants, of course, is segregation. But as for decentralization, there is no magic in the word or the idea behind it; if proof of that is needed, the present unholy mess in the New York City school system provides it. Here decentralization was applied for therapeutic reasons, by people who would not be found dead with Byrd, yet it has resulted in near chaos. The primary reasons are two: first, integration of the schools was thwarted by white resistance, resulting in a demand for a large measure of school autonomy in the Negro and Puerto Rican ghettos; second, the experiment in decentralized education was not carefully planned. Obstacles would have been encountered in any case, but they could have been surmounted if reasonable foresight had been brought to the task. As it is, racial conflict is now complicating an already difficult task.

Given the situation in New York, experimentation in the area of decentralization was no doubt necessary. But the local board was set up hastily, so that even today no one knows to what extent it really represents the community. No realistic attempt was made to work out details in advance with the teachers' union and to reassure its members on the issue of job security. This almost guaranteed that Albert Shanker, the abrasive president of the union, would find a situation ready-made for a knock-down, drag-out fight. If willingness to go to jail is a virtue, then Shanker is virtuous, but it can scarcely be said that he has a genius for creative compromise. He does excel in abuse of the Mayor of the city and anyone else who does not see the situation from his viewpoint.

Whatever the duration of the teachers' strike and its outcome, a close look should be taken at the impenetrable bureaucracy that prevails in the New York public school system. Size in itself does not necessitate bureaucratic inefficiency—the bureaucracies of some large corporations are reasonably efficient, because the people who run them have the requisite managerial skills. But there are few such people in the city's educational system, and the problem of this entrenched, insensitive, shortsighted bureaucracy has never been tackled. If the schools are to be decentralized, there must nevertheless be a central administration to handle labor relations and allocation of funds, or the districts will be fighting one another.

While carefully planned decentralization is tried, the ideal of integration must not be dropped. It should be not only an ideal but the unwavering goal. "Integration" is not a magic word either; but the fact is, as many studies have shown (the Coleman Report among others), that children cannot receive quality education in segregated schools. As New York suffers the throes of a kind of re-segregation in parts of the city, a completely integrated school system is operating in Berkeley, and another in San Mateo. The problems of these California cities are not comparable to those of New York, but neither are they totally different. Looking across the country, the contestants in the New York struggle should not feel complacent. They might, in fact, be ashamed of themselves.

Franco's Price

Last week the Spanish Foreign Minister presented Franco's price for a renewal of the five-year agreement on bases, which expires September 26. Negotiations will continue for another six months if no agreement is reached by then, but if by March 26 the agreement is not renewed we shall have to remove our equipment, close the bases, and bring home some 25,000 servicemen and their dependents. Among other items, Franco's invoice includes: $1 billion in military aid over a period of five years; an upgrading of the agreement to the status of an alliance or pact (which would commit the United States to come to Spain's defense, as it is now committed to defend its NATO allies); greater rights to try U.S. "tourist" servicemen for crimes on Spanish territory outside the bases; and pressure on Britain to give up Gibraltar.

The price, which is about what The Nation expected, constitutes a form of blackmail. But in the end it will probably be paid—not all of it but most of it. The Pentagon has a high tolerance for blackmail of this kind. In addition we now have a substantial investment in Spain, quite apart from the bases. It has been estimated that 70 per cent of foreign investments in Spain are American and that 175 of the 300 largest American corporations have branches there. And, of course, the Russians have strengthened Franco's blackmail potential by increasing their naval forces in the Mediterranean.

The basic question is not whether the price is too high but whether the agreement should be renewed in any form. There are numerous signs of unrest in Spain. In August, the Spanish Government had to place one of the four Basque provinces under a form of martial law. Many Basques, according to Newsweek (August 19) were "quietly arrested and whisked away to jail incommunicado."

And there is the increasingly urgent problem of what happens when Franco, now in his 70s, passes from the scene. Franco has been frustrating those who speculate as to his demise for so long now that he has come to be regarded as immortal. But he is not. Nor is Salazar, age 79, who now lies near death in an iron lung following a stroke. His departure may well precipitate serious disorders in Portugal. The Communists have already announced, from Algiers, that the death of Salazar must be the death of Salazarism. The prospect of trouble in Portugal should be a sufficient reason for deferring action on the bases agreement. Should serious trouble occur, incidentally, it will be instructive to see how Washington reacts. What happens in Portugal could well foreshadow what might later happen in Spain.

New Politics Among Scientists

It is hardly surprising that the American Political Science Association and the American Sociological Society are beginning to accept responsibility for bridging the gap between national politics and the disciplines in which their members possess special knowledge and insight. [See "Political Science Discovers Politics" by David K. J. Morris, The Nation, September 23.] It is surprising, rather, that it took them so long—almost like a fire company stopping for a beer while responding to a general alarm. What was less to be expected is that many of those versed in the pure and applied sciences are also awakening politically.

Purdue University, which for many years has had the largest engineering student enrollment in the country, reports "impressive success" in the fourth year of its graduate study program on the effects of science and technology on society. In some cases a man with a Ph.D. in mathematics, engineering, chemistry or physics, after ten years of research in his specialty, decides to return to Purdue to earn another Ph.D., which will enable him to work directly in the public policy area, with his scientific expertise as a background. Many undergraduates also take introductory courses in political science.

On a larger scale, the American Institute of Physics has been involved in controversy over the relation between physics and politics. It began when, in May, 1967, Charles Schwartz of the University of California wrote a letter to the institute's monthly, Physics Today, beginning "I am one of a great many Americans who believe that the present course of this country's actions in Southeast Asia is wrong, dead wrong," and arguing that with physics "firmly tied" to government and business, physicists must share the responsibility. The editors refused to print the letter, whereupon Professor Schwartz offered an amendment to the constitution of the American Physical Society, the most prominent member society of AIP, which would permit APS members to "express their opinion, will or intent on any matter of concern to the society. . . ." After months of debate, the amendment came to a vote and lost, 9,214 against, 3,553 for. But, as the editor of Physics Today wrote in the August issue, the controversy "brought to the surface considerable turbulence that apparently has been bothering many for some time," and the campaign "has strengthened our conviction that the physicist is concerned and wants to be involved"—as an individual. So Schwartz and his supporters have not labored in vain.

Traditionally, engineering has been regarded as the most conservative of the professions, yet the Engineers Joint Council bimonthly, Engineer, with a circulation of about 450,000, encourages political discussion in its pages. Its editorial policy seems to be based on the premise that since engineering plays a large part in the physical and economic functioning of the country, engineers should concern themselves on a national scale with the societal effects of technological activity.

Not to be neglected in this area is the Society for Social Responsibility in Science, an international organization which for nearly twenty years has been teaching the scientists, engineers, physicians, et al., should strive to foresee the results of their professional work, and as far as possible confine themselves to beneficial projects. Each individual draws his own line as to what is beneficial. I doubt of self-sacrificing effort on the part of its officers and members. SSRS has had a liberalizing influence on science and engineering out of all proportion to its resources.

Clean Minds

Ronald Reagan is making sure that California's kiddies will have clean minds as well as the proverbial sound bodies. The State Board of Education, dominated by Reagan appointees, has just "cleaned up" four literature books for seventh and eighth graders. These pupils of 12 and 14 will not have their minds corrupted by such corrosive phrases as "For Christ's sake," "Damn you," "What the hell!"

This is one more stirring triumph for the "Creative Society" of Governor Reagan, that model of decorum and civility. However, he faces an even bigger problem with the University of California, which is bringing Eldridge Cleaver on campus to participate (no state funds will be used) in an experimental course on the "dehumanization and regeneration of the American social order."

Cleaver, author of Soul on Ice and "Minister of Information" for the Black Panthers, is known to use earth language, as a Newsweek article on one of his speech demonstrations:

So I have to say [] the White House [] the electoral system, and [] all the pigs and [] the power structure You can take all your wallets, credit cards and cut your mother [] necks.

Max Rafferty (known affectionately in California as "the Blue Max") has been having a fit about Cleaver's recognition by the university, as one might expect. He and his followers see it as another example of the way California's state colleges and universities are undermining the excellent work being done by all the good, clean-law and order loving people of the state. They keep crying out about how these academic institutions are full of "suckers, maniacs, atheists and fanatical revolutionaries," but so far their words have fallen on strangely deaf ears.

With newspapers and radio and television programs full of Vietnam death counts and violence—not to speak of sex—and with much more open, realistic and healthy attitudes toward sex evident through all our society, I attempt to shelter teen-agers from a few swear words. It comes comic. The California education system is in crisis by wasting its time on trivia, the Board of Education making itself the laughingstock of the country.

RENDEZVOUS IN OCTOBER

JOHN FREARS

Mr. Frears teaches in the Department of Politics at Nottingham University, England. He was lecturing at Nantes University last year and so saw the events of last spring in France at first hand.

France is preparing to reopen for business after the summer vacation. In October Parliament will reassemble, students will return to faculties where the red flag and the black floated a few brief months ago; plants, schools and offices, where 9 million workers were on strike, will be back to diligent normalcy. But some Frenchmen hope, and more fear, that the "May Revolution" will keep, in the words of the militants' slogan, its "rendez-vous en octobre."

The ashes of May are still smoldering. Student leaders have not spent the summer acquiring sun tans. The second highest rate of industrial unemployment in Western Europe, rapidly rising prices, housing shortages, regional imbalance—no basic cause of industrial unrest has miraculously disappeared. The Gaullist government, in an impregnable parliamentary position after the June electoral landslide, has also spent a busy summer, preparing tactics to prevent the revival of last spring's near-insurrectionary situation. Its field of maneuver is defined by three strategic assumptions. The first is that in spite of social discontent, no political or industrial challenge need be feared for the moment. Second, that trouble, if there is any, will start, as in May, at the universities. Finally, the Gaullist electorate is, above all else, a "law and order" constituency and will require a demonstration of vigorous enforcement.

On the industrial front the government can count on at least a few months' respite. The general strike in May, which very nearly caused—and which, if better led, would have caused—the fall of the Pompidou administration, was never really an insurrection against capitalism but more an infectiously seized moment of opportunity to press wage claims. (That at any rate, was the analysis, or possibly the excuse, of the Communist party, which is supposed to be the specialist in the revolution business, and of the CGT, the big Communist-led union.) And insurrection or no, family budgets were too hard hit by the strike for there to be much immediate enthusiasm for further industrial action. For the moment, the wage increases that were won by the strike will stay ahead of rising prices, and full-time work (for those who have jobs) is assured by the backlog of strike-delayed orders and by a consumer demand that has been swollen by those same wage increases.

In addition, the unions and the left-wing political parties are badly split. In recent years, aware that without unity it could never challenge Gaullist power, the Left had been trying to build a popular front alliance between Communists and non-Communists. This unity crumbled in

May. The old Communist paranoia of being overtaken on the Left appeared once again and the party strove night and day to break up the revolution they are supposed to be in business to bring about. The moment of opportunity to overthrow the government came and went. The voice of the Left echoed hollow with the failure to incarnate a unified popular voice, and emitted the discordant note of illicit opportunism. Since it was unable to look like an alternative government, the Left's electoral massacre was inevitable, and the administration will have no worries from that quarter for a considerable time to come. The left-wing parties, like the Democrats after Chicago, no longer represent even the aspirations of progressives in the universities. The enthusiasm of the student movement for socialism is equaled only by its scorn for the old political parties who officially endorse that philosophy.

So de Gaulle's first priority is to neutralize the universities as incubators of subversion. University reform will not wait. Every faculty in France spent the strike-bound weeks evolving elaborate constitutions for self-government. At Nantes, for example, we all sat down under the chairmanship of the gentle and conservative dean to draft, down to the last detail of voting procedure, proportional representation by slate and parity of student participation, a document which would govern the future operation of the faculty. It was precise, elegant, probably unworkable and totally illegal. Yet the consigning of these documents to the wastebasket is inconceivable, and the slates returned by the elections that have already taken place show that the government will find few allies among the professors, two-thirds of whom supported the aims, if not in every case the methods, of the student movement.

The wily and experienced Edgar Faure, Minister of Education in the new Couve de Murville cabinet, read the situation and showed his hand before the vacation. The universities are to be killed with kindness. Far from trying to oppose change, to maintain the old hierarchical structure, to reassert the old ministerial control, Faure, with as many liberal advisers as he can get his hands on, intends to outreform the reformers. Local autonomy? By all means! Changes in the Napoleonic examination system? Should have been done years ago! The right of students to hold political meetings on campus? Basic democracy, mon cher! All this will be very good for the French universities, but it should have the additional advantage, from the government's point of view, of splitting the moderate students and a large number of professors from the militant student leadership. This is not certain. The professors' union SNESUP and the students' UNEF were collaborating closely throughout the strike and neither will have failed to notice the implication of the Faure strategy. The great strength of the student movement (and the weakness of its inability to define precise aims) came from the fact that its protest was not limited to demands for a few university reforms and improved conditions for students. It threw itself against the whole ethos of an industrial society (both the capitalist and the bureaucratic varieties) and refused its future role of a technocratic elite administering to a mindless army of consumers. (Industrial workers, not unnaturally, view this attitude with a certain disdain.) Student leaders, therefore, will not want even to discuss reform with Faure. Many professors will share this generous and sweeping but essentially unpractical point of view, but a majority, even of those on the Left, will probably take the view that half a loaf (of good quality) is better than no bread.

The Faure strategy therefore presents a serious problem for those who wish to keep revolutionary ardor alive. The only thing that could cement the unity of professors and student leaders, that could perpetuate the radicalization of the student majority, is police brutality directed against student demonstrators. That is precisely what the government's electoral commitment to law and order could bring about, under conditions that would destroy its own hopes for the Faure reforms. The revolutionary's best friend is therefore Minister of the Interior Marcellin who, in fighting speeches up and down the land, promises that not even the most elementary prudence will deflect him from his duty to smash sedition. General de Gaulle is the prisoner of the law and order faction. He knows that only stylish nationalism, the careful maintenance of the interests of wealth and big business and the fear of communism have kept his essentially right-wing electorate behind his highly unorthodox initiatives: Algeria, a pro-Soviet, anti-American foreign policy, economic interventionism. He also knows that, if law and order break down again, the alternative to Gaullism is more likely to be, not communism as the electorate was told, but a military coup d'état from the extreme Right of the kind by which he himself was brought to power in 1958.

The government's need to de-fuse the spirit of revolution in the universities is its most urgent priority. To do this it must sell university reform, and at the same time it must show its supporters that it is not soft on subversives. This will work very nicely if the Faure reforms gain wide acceptance, leaving only a small intransigent minority, isolated as "unreasonable," to be dealt with by M. Marcellin's police.

M. Marcellin, however, with the approval of a vociferous Right, has spent the summer rounding up the idealistic and (among students) popular leaders of Jeunesse Communiste Revolutionnaire and other proscribed organizations. The events of May proved that if there is one slogan above all others that unites all students, commands the sympathy of the teaching profession, and insures maximum participation in demonstrations, it is Free our Comrades. If Marcellin gets in with suppression before Faure gets in with reform, there will be trouble in France this fall.

Even if the government makes sufficient errors to encourage further disturbances, however, it is difficult to envisage stupidity on a scale large enough to provoke trouble on the divided and weakened industrial front (serious though worker discontent is). With dissenting journalists dismissed (including major TV personalities), television is safely in the government's hands once again. Gaullists have a further, if improbable, ally in that most conservative of organizations, the French Communist party. Its Stalinist reflexes can be depended upon to prevent any danger of united action on the Left, while providing an indispensable scarecrow to keep middle-of-the-road voters out of the beckoning fields of political change. In May and June the government was able to pin on the Communists the blame for the barricades which the party had denounced from the outset, and for the strike pickets it could not command. The least that the General, in simple gratitude, can do is to continue a foreign policy that in the past has earned one of the highest words of praise in the Communist vocabulary: the epithet "positive."

With disunity on the Left, no coordinated voice for social and industrial discontent, and the universities alienated from the political parties, all de Gaulle need do is stay the heavy hand of M. Marcellin's police long enough for those who refuse M. Faure's reforms to look isolated and unreasonable. Then he will be able to get back to his dossier marked "Grandeur de la France" and once more forget about the French.

CRISIS AND HOPE

A Conversation with Jean-Paul Sartre

Jean-Paul Sartre visited Rome in August, and while there was interviewed by Paese Sera. We print herewith a section of the conversation. The translation is by Herbert Weinstock.

In the ferment that is agitating—and which characterizes—the whole democratic area of the world, what chief duties and roles do you assign to the intellectuals?

Naturally, the intellectuals do not, as intellectuals, make politics. But to the extent that they participate in events and live in history, they have the exclusive duty to attempt analysis of events, to examine situations freely, to identify positive and negative peculiarities, to denounce, to scrutinize and to speak out—all without hypocrisy and outside any false respectful consensus. For example, it is precisely because I deeply respect the history of the Soviet Union and am anything but an anti-Communist that I feel it my duty today to condemn without reservation the invasion of Czechoslovakia.

You say that analysis is the intellectuals' function, but in what way can they become involved in the synthesis of history?

By allying themselves with the working classes. I would even say that they can be conceived of only through the functioning of such a link. We saw a significant example of the necessity for this constant, living rapport in France last May, when students and workers fought together. But it appears that the Communist parties everywhere harbor doubts as to the validity of such an alliance.

Doesn't it seem to you that the Communist parties—or, at least, many of them—have tried to carry forward a constructive, concrete organizing operation of the kind that is indispensable to every political struggle?

Yes, that has happened too. The Italian Communist party has not lagged behind, and has made its own the demands of the young; their struggles have been supported, sustained, defended. But things went differently in France. And it was precisely the Communist party that agreed to having the movement brusquely shut off. In my view, it committed an error.

Today, all the same, the French Communist party has taken positions in favor of Czechoslovakia. How do you judge its attitude of yesterday with respect to that of today?

I should say that we are dealing with two contradictory attitudes. In France 10 million people wanted revolution, but the Communist party rejected them. Also one might say that in part there is ■ close analogy in the antitheses of Czechoslovaks and Soviets, students and French Communist party.

But the France of de Gaulle is not Dubcek's Czechoslovakia. Perhaps it is not legitimate to unleash a rebellion if there is no certainty that it will prevail; perhaps a revolution in a capitalist, industrial country with an ancient historical tradition needs different, less conspicuous instrumentalities.

Certainly I am not speaking of revolution in ■ traditional sense. To be more exact, we might say that what both the French workers and the French students were demanding was revolutionary reforms. But—I repeat—the French party preferred not to make these demands its own. That is not the way to achieve the constitution and reinforcement of a New Left upon which it would truly be possible to place humanity's hopes. Nonetheless, that New Left now exists and is on the move, growing, consolidating itself. The young come to it by various roads: Catholics, atheists, Marxists, pacifists. Also Maoists and Trotskyites. How ignore them if they exist, if they make up a living, objective reality? They are diverse, but they are allied by the desire to unite against common perils: war, destruction, slavery—in short, against the fruits of the capitalist world. It is necessary to receive them, accept them, understand them, for the future of humanity is in them. In Paris, even children of 10 are now eager to join the student movement. And in May the boys who made up the basic committees in every quarter were only a little older: much less than 20 years of age.

On the basis of these considerations and, on the other hand, in view of events meant to stifle the healthiest instincts of society, what is your outlook for the world?

A hard question. Precisely because of the constant presence of such stimuli and forces, the world of today is complex, chaotic, terrible, and yet full of promise. To express overall judgments certainly is not easy—much less to hazard programs.

I have been led toward pessimism, but I hold that the only hope in the overdramatic situation through which we are living is offered by those who struggle to change things, who have the courage to imagine and propose new realities, who know how to destroy myths and stereotypes in the name of man and of his right to life—those, in short, who fight for peaceful coexistence and for democracy. Today the Soviet model is no longer valid, suffocated as it is by bureaucracy. The model that was being developed in the new Czechoslovak movement may, on the other hand, attract many men. In that sense, Prague, beyond being the highest testimony to Socialist civilization, is a hope.

FLAGS, TANKS AND STUDENTS

G. M. BERGMAN

Mr. Bergman is a West Coast businessman who has published widely in the magazines of that area.

A great student strike has been going on in Mexico City since July 26, involving well over 100,000 students of the huge National University and twenty-nine affiliated schools. The army has invaded several campuses; many students have been killed. I visited Mexico in August and saw some of the action, especially on the evening of August 27, when 300,000 students and supporters put on a great march through Mexico City ending on the Zocalo, the central square that lies before the Presidential Palace and the cathedral.

My wife and I were watching from the sidewalk by our hotel when suddenly we became inadvertent participants of this march. Our elbows were seized by a group of exuberant students and we were lifted off our feet into the line of march. We demurred, but the kids held us firm, and were so full of enthusiasm, so eager to have us, that we followed the line of least resistance and marched along. Soon we reached the Zocalo, where we all sat down on the cement to await the rest of the marchers.

What were the marchers like, what was it all about? We saw that best from the sidelines before we got drawn in. Most marchers were students, aged 15 and up, boys and girls. They came from a whole complex of schools affiliated with the university, preparatory, normal and technical, many of which would be called high schools in the states. We saw no one with long hair or far-out dress.

Besides the students, there were great numbers of teachers and professors. There were parents, both mothers and fathers, workers, small businessmen and proprietors (looking the part), farm laborers, and a general mass of adults, including one elderly blind man. Banners identified each group of supporters. Medical students and nurses were prominent in white. All cars, buses and ambulances in the march were school property.

Placards told a story. One said the real agitators were "Ignorancia, Hambre (hunger) and Miseria." Another placard contrasted the lot of a political prisoner with the high life of a government official. Many small placards called for freedom for such prisoners. Another sign accused the government of assassinating a number of students who have disappeared.

A great many placards depicted Juarez and other patriotic heroes of Mexico's past. These expressed the theme of the demonstration, which was that the student movement was carrying on the "historic forward march" of the Mexican people, while the government was thwarting that march.

Displayed prominently, too, were the six demands of the march: Removal of Police Chief Cueto Ramirez and two assistants; dissolution of the Corps of Grenadiers (riot police); repeal of article 145 of the constitution, which gives the government extraordinary powers to deal with subversion; indemnification of the families of slain students; investigation of those responsible, and freedom for all political prisoners.

When the Zocalo was filled, the march became a meeting. Speakers began addressing it from atop a school bus, the national flag beside them. The first speaker brought cry on cry of Viva Mexico! from the kids around us. The next read a list of political prisoners, eighty-six names in all, and after each name the crowd would shout Libertad!

Then a bugle sounded taps, and everyone stood in respect for the student dead. My wife had difficulty rising; many helping hands reached for her. The next speaker, an impassioned woman teacher, said her generation had had a poor education, wanted the young to have a better one. The next talked of the government's repressive policy, said that if a farm laborer asked for better wages or tried to join an effective union, his employer spoke to the police and the man was jailed.

The meeting ended at 9:40 P.M. with the singing of the national hymn. Then the crowd made torches out of newspapers and held them aloft; it was a memorable sight, with the ancient cathedral and Presidential Palace in the dark background. Some 3,500 students stayed on after the meeting to make a "permanent" demonstration, but three hours later, at 1 A.M., they were driven off by army tanks. From my hotel I heard them shouting in the night, and wondered why.

Next morning my wife and I walked down to the square. No students were there, but a cordon of police and secret service men formed a large circle around a flagpole in the center. They were there, one told me confidentially, to prevent the students from taking down a flag—a strike flag put up the night before—because they wanted to show the public "what the students were like."

The small, red and black flag hung limp on the pole. We retreated to the cathedral steps to await what would happen next. Soon hundreds of Grenadiers filed onto the square. Next, government trucks drove up and discharged hundreds of farm workers taken from their jobs, who joined the cordon around the flagpole. Great numbers of office workers came out of the Presidential Palace and other government buildings and joined the group around the pole. Then I noticed a file of thirteen army tanks coming down Moneda, a side street. A well-dressed, middle-aged man said to me: "You are about to see a small part of Mexico's history take place." (Ironically, American tourists filed in and out of the ancient cathedral, reading their guidebooks on its history, seemingly unaware of or uninterested in current history.)

At 1 P.M. a municipal bus drove up to the flagpole. On its top were cameramen who took pictures as the strike flag was hauled down and burned on top of the bus. Then, to cheering by the government supporters, the national flag was raised on the pole, looking silken and resplendent comparison with the homemade strike pennant. The cathedral bells tolled, rung by two government supporters mainly visible in the bell tower. No spectators cheered.

Suddenly, a few students dashed up and snatched their barred emblem from the top of the bus, wrapped it in newspapers and walked off. Then from another direction heard the chant of the students, the Huellum! Huellum! pronounced wayloom, holding the oom) of the university yell, as 500 of them came marching around the square, right into the midst of police, government workers and supporters, and poised tanks. Along they came, chanting slogans and that college yell, in a very orderly manner. The spectators cheered them, out of support either for their principles or for their courage. They marched to the front of the Presidential Palace, still shouting.

Then a loud-speaker ordered everyone to disperse. Spectators ran for refuge to the cathedral, but it barred its door in their faces, though many were women, some elderly. Next, the light tanks (wheel and tire vehicles) dashed from the side street directly into the students, running at them like hounds after prey. Soldiers with fixed bayonets followed. The students fled down Madero, from which rapid gunfire broke out. My wife and I ducked into a café. The proprietor closed the steel shutters, blocking out the street. All was quiet, except the high wail of ambulances. We heard later that two bystanders had been killed by gunfire, and a little girl run down by a tank. The army aid the gunfire was prompted by sniper attacks from an office building balcony. Two office buildings on Madero were pock-marked with about twenty-five bullet holes, up high, some through windows.

Emerging from the café, we found the whole area cordoned off by the army and riot police. We returned to the hotel to read the daily papers, of which there are many. The front page of every paper blew up large the flagpole incident, played down or completely ignored the great march and meeting of the night before. Photos showed the flag crowd as large, talked of "popular vindication" of the national flag and of the "delirio" and "emoción" roused by its raising.

For the next few days the papers were full of the flag incident. News articles and editorials talked of the student "profanation" of and "insult" to the flag. President Diaz Ordaz was quoted as saying that Mexico could have only one flag. A half-page ad proclaimed the formation of a coalition of organizations to vindicate the flag, and one paper dedicated the whole month of September to the flag.

However, two carpenters in a restaurant commented to me that the flag raising was "forzado" (forced), done by order of the government. That was how it appeared to me.

I found the article which questioned the flag incident in the moderate paper Excelsior. Columnist Gomez Arias said the flag furor was based on a false premise. The students hadn't insulted the national flag, for no flag normally flies on that pole in the Zocalo. The students had merely hoisted their strike flag on an empty pole.

The student banner, said Arias, "flew on high with the idea not of treason but of a strike. It was not a dirty rag, nor a cloth without history. It was not the flag of a foreign power, not the insignia of communism. Rather, it symbolized the longing for justice, the cry for vindication from the exploited, the poor. And when they nail up this flag in factories and shops, no one, with reason, may call them traitors." It would be a sad day, said Arias, if the young had desecrated the emblem of "Mexico's sorrowful history and expression of hope for the future," but such was not the case.

Columnist Arias drew attention to the student march and meeting, which he said was not forced but voluntary, and was a "memorable spectacle the significance of which it would be impossible to conceal." Who, he said, seeing that "torrent of humanity of such magnitude" could doubt the "interest of the Mexican people in political and social problems"?

I would agree with Gomez Arias. Two weeks earlier, my wife and I had observed another huge demonstration on the Zocalo. We saw 100,000 students face the Presidential Palace and call for Diaz Ordaz to come out and answer their petition; they received no response. They thereupon burned an effigy of Police Chief Cueto Ramirez, in the form of a gorilla, in the very doorway of the palace.

As best I could learn, the precipitating event of the strike was the army's invasion of a university-affiliated school to quell a fracas over girls on July 26. Several students were killed. Students in the whole university system struck to protest the deaths and the violation of university autonomy, which is written into the Mexican constitution.

The struggle has since escalated into one with wide political implications. The government has not at any time responded favorably to student demands. It claims a "Red conspiracy" and uses armed force to the point where the Defense Minister, General Garcia Barragan, denied to the press in late August that the administration contemplated a military or civil dictatorship. The students, in a printed brochure, Porqué?, scoff at the Red conspiracy charge, saying it is merely a "pretexto" to justify armed repression.

Students claim that some thirty to forty of their number have been killed, and show in addition a list of thirty-seven students who have disappeared. No casualty figures are available. The government is especially sensitive right now, for the International Olympics Committee could cancel the October games if Mexico cannot demonstrate its tranquillity. And reports of turmoil generally scare tourists—a serious matter in a country where tourism is a major industry.

In mid-August the Student Strike Council asked for a "dialogue" with the government, but arrangements broke down when the government wanted the talks private, while the students wanted them on television. With the situation becoming worse, the strike council called for wisdom and moderation, and repeated its call for dialogue, saying this time that it need not be on TV. It asked students not to taunt riot police, and shifted from a policy of immediate confrontation to one of carefully organizing itself and its supporters "district by district, block by block," throughout the city.

To me, and to many tourists, the overriding problem in Mexico is poverty, and I am certain that it is what motivates the strike. I was not surprised when a newspaper reported that "thousands of slum dwellers" supported student demonstration, and the strike council claimed many adherents among the poor.

For the first time in years the ruling PRI party (Institutional Party of the Revolution) is being seriously challenged on issues that may break its virtual monopoly in Mexico. There might come another revolution in Mexico. Many students, I heard, were reading Che Guevara.

VERDICT ON HUEY NEWTON

AN OVERSUPPLY OF DOUBT

WILBUR WOOD

Mr. Wood is news and features editor of the San Francisco Bay Guardian.

San Francisco

When I first started driving over to the Alameda County Courthouse in Oakland for the trial of Huey P. Newton, the Black Panther leader, I assumed he had done what The Man had charged him with: killed one Oakland policeman, wounded another, in an early morning shoot-out at Seventh and Willow last October 28.

I knew that, curiously, the murder weapon had not been found, and that Newton had taken a shot through the stomach. The word on the street, I'd heard, was that John Frey, the dead pig (a cop is a pig to a man on Seventh), had been caught in a cross fire.

I knew that so far the other officer, Herbert Heanes, was the only prosecution eyewitness. He said Frey had been walking Newton toward a police car—to frisk Newton, I assumed, again—when Newton pulled a gun and opened up. A cop, I figured, would say that. I wondered what had really happened.

Assistant District Attorney Lowell Jensen turned up another eyewitness. He had actually had him all along but did not reveal this fact to Newton's attorney, Charles Garry, until four days before the prosecution opened its case. (The trial, with jury selection, lasted seven weeks.)

The eyewitness was a man named Henry Grier, a Negro bus driver who lived in Hayward, a mostly white suburb of Oakland. Too good to live with his own people? I could hear myself thinking. And then double-think: but why should any man live in a slum?

Grier had been a bus driver for AC transit two years now; before that, something like twenty years in the Navy. Veteran. Workingman. A big man, too. Grier's brother shoulders are set high. His eyes widen as he acts out the positions of Newton and Frey as he, Grier, drives up in his bus.

Grier demonstrates how Newton wheeled away from Frey and opened up on Heanes; he explains how Frey and Newton struggled for the gun. Then he stands and aims his cocked index finger at the floor, showing Huey pumping shots into Frey's back.

Into Frey's back? But the first time Grier described the shooting—an hour and a half after it happened, to an Inspector McConnell—Grier said Frey fell on his back, face up. Why the discrepancy? (The fatal shot entered Frey's back, the autopsy decided.)

There are gaping contradictions in the prosecution's whole case, but Grier's are the ones to concentrate on, for his is the key prosecution testimony.

On October 28, Grier described the man who shot Frey as: "a peewee sort of a guy," under 5 feet tall, about 125 pounds; wearing a black shirt, tan jacket and black hat. On August 7 and 8, testifying before Superior Court Judge Monroe Friedman and a jury of twelve middle-class citizens of Alameda County, Grier pointed to Huey Newton and said: This is the man.

But Newton, though slender, is no "peewee," is 5 feet 10, weighs about 160. And more important, he was wearing a white shirt, black jacket, black beret (not hat). These bloodstained clothes are all in evidence.

Grier was shown pictures of Newton on the morning of October 28. He couldn't say positive, he said then, if Newton was the man. It was dark and the man had his face down, he told McConnell.

The transcript made from the tape-recording McConnell took of Grier's October 28th statement had a key error in it, and the error almost made it through to the jury, despite Garry's objections. The transcript read that Grier "did" get a clear view of Newton's face, when the context of the sentence (there are three negative verbs besides the one in question) clearly indicated it should be "didn't."

The 72-year-old Judge Friedman turned down Garry's original request to have the transcript corrected. All the evidence was in, the judge said, and the jury is out. Rules are rules. But when Friedman heard the actual recording of Grier's voice, he ordered the record changed to "didn't."

Newton was charged with first-degree murder (Frey) and assault with a deadly weapon (Heanes), as well as kidnapping, a charge which was subsequently thrown out when the kidnapping "victim," Dell Ross, refused to testify against Newton on the ground that he might incriminate himself (he took the Fifth Amendment).

Incriminate yourself of what wondered Prosecutor Jensen aloud, and then granted Ross immunity from incriminating himself. Immunity, that is, against everything but perjury. If Ross contradicted his grand jury testimony—in which he had said the wounded Newton waved a gun at him and told him to drive to Kaiser Hospital—Jensen would have Ross up for perjury plenty fast.

Ross then suddenly lost his memory. He couldn't remember anything about October 28, 1967. He couldn't remember testifying before the grand jury. Jensen read Ross's whole grand jury testimony into the record, "to refresh the witness's memory," but it didn't help.

Ross also could not remember, when Garry arose to cross-examine, going to Garry's office and taping a statement which Garry played in court—"to refresh the witness's memory."

In Garry's tape, Ross had said some interesting things.

Huey P. Newton

He had lied to the grand jury, he said, because the police had warrants out on him, some parking tickets, and he did not want to go to jail. Newton had been taken to the hospital in Ross's car all right, but he was "kinda out," doubled over his gut wound, in the back seat. Newton had no gun. The man with the gun was a darker-skinned Negro (Ross is also a Negro), and this man with the gun sat in front and issued directions.

But since Ross refused to remember anything in court, the judge had to throw out all his testimony and acquit Newton of that charge.

Who was this other man? The prosecution never seemed to want to find out. They had their case against Newton and didn't want to muddy it up. There was another person in the car Newton was driving that early morning, but the prosecution never produced him.

Officer Heanes described him: about Newton's height, white shirt and tie, maybe a mustache. So one day Garry had this man sworn in as a witness for the defense. His name is Gene McKinney. McKinney didn't have much to say, because he didn't want to incriminate himself. Yes, he was the passenger. And, no, Newton had had no gun that night and shot no one. But that's all he would say, and Jensen did not want to grant him immunity to testify. What if he testified that he shot Heanes and Frey?

The judge sent McKinney to jail for taking the Fifth Amendment in contempt of court.

The prosecution had its case against Newton, and the white power structure in Oakland badly wanted Newton's neck. Because Huey Newton has a very good head on his shoulders and knows how to organize black people.

The whites do not want the black people of Oakland organized. Black people, they fear, are going to take over the city in a few years. Already blacks number one-third of the 400,000 population. Already black kids number 50 per cent of the school population. Schools that were lily white ten years ago are now mostly black.

Even whites who are willing to integrate tend to "moralize downward," to assume that the majority culture is superior, and that the minority culture should simply dissolve into the bigger stew.

Charles Garry calls this sort of thing "subjective racism." He talked a lot about subjective racism during the jury selection. He talked about the report of the President's Commission on Civil Disorders and its conclusion that white racism was at the root of the American race problem. Had any of the prospective jurors—the white ones—heard of white racism? Not very many. Garry had to define it again and again.

To Judge Friedman all this was simply annoying. "Huey Newton is not on trial here," he said one day, "because of any ideas he may have about the social system."

I think he is, said Garry.

I believed Newton to have done the shooting, but I believed also that that was not the point. I felt that Newton probably had done it in self-defense. Frey's death, to my way of thinking, was unfortunate, but it was probably justifiable homicide.

Frey had made a lot of very bitter enemies in the ghetto; he was one of the worst of the "pigs." He'd hang around, said one of Garry's witnesses, until he could find something wrong—a cracked taillight or something—or he simply would invent an infraction, like faulty brakes. Then he'd write out a ticket.

I knew about the John Freys on Oakland's police force. They are numerous. I knew about the cops' list of Panther vehicles. The cops would hold outstanding warrants—for minor traffic violations—on these cars. Then they would bust the car at a convenient time, perhaps when the Panthers were patrolling the ghetto for signs of police harassment of black people.

That is how Newton got stopped on October 28. The Volkswagen did not belong to him; it belonged to his fiancée, Laverne Williams. Laverne had two parking tickets—both from Berkeley. Frey found that out over the radio, after he called in to ask if there were any outstanding warrants on this "known Panther vehicle" he was about to stop at Seventh and Willow. The warrants were there, but Frey couldn't serve them on Newton because he was not the registered owner.

The prosecution claims that Newton failed to identify himself properly to Frey. (As if Frey did not know who Newton was.) It claims that Newton showed Laverne Williams' auto registration to Frey, but did not show his own driver's license.

Frey started to write out a ticket, but he made the mistake of putting Laverne (he left off the "e") Williams' name down, but Huey Newton's address. How did he get Newton's address if Newton did not identify himself?

Cops used to hound the Negroes who conked their hair and dressed up in slick suits. These were the obvious pimps, dealers, criminals. The guys with the Cadillacs. Now the cops hound the blacks who leave their hair alone and wear African colors. They are the new criminal element in the ghetto, but they are political criminals: revolutionaries.

Newton is a leader of revolutionaries. He wants the white man's cops ("the occupying army"), the white man's businesses, the white man's government out of the ghetto.

He wants black self-determination, peacefully, if possible—but you get that notion only from talking to him face to face, not from reading his press.

Newton has been picked up by the cops, he says, at least fifty or sixty times in the last couple of years. Subtract the ten months spent under guard in the hospital or in jail—since October 28—and that is about once in every six days.

So I could believe that Newton finally opened up on some "pigs" who pressed too close. But Newton says he didn't have a gun that night, and the cops have never found one. What he had in his hand, he says, when Frey made him get out of the Volkswagen, was a lawbook. How do you shoot someone with a lawbook? Garry asks.

Newton says that Frey did frisk him—hard—then walked him back toward the second police car, Heanes's car. Heanes was supposed to be checking out the passenger in the Volkswagen. Instead, he watched Frey and Newton. Why, Garry wondered, cross-examining. Was Heanes afraid of what Frey might do to Huey Newton?

"Not necessarily," Heanes replied.

Not necessarily? Newton says he turned to ask Frey what the bust was about, and started to open his lawbook.

"You can shove that book up your ass," Frey said, according to Newton's testimony. And with that, Frey straight-armed Huey in the face, and Newton went down on one knee in the street. The next thing Newton remembers is seeing Frey draw his revolver. Then the sound of gunfire—like thunder. And a feeling like hot soup spilled on his stomach.

As Newton talks on the stand, you start putting things together. The trajectory of the bullet through his body? It slopes down, as if he were shot by a man standing over his kneeling body. That checks.

And other things check. The word from the street that Frey was caught in a cross fire. The fact that the lawbook is covered with blood—Newton's blood, Garry maintains, though the police failed to check that.

The next thing Newton remembers, he says, is a feeling of motion blurred and hazy. Then he is in front of Kaiser Hospital, trying to figure how to get up onto a platform and into the building for medical help.

It took the white nurse twenty-five minutes, maybe forty-five, to get Newton onto a stretcher and into the room where the doctor was. Meanwhile, the cops had already arrived—the nurse called them before she called a doctor—and the cops had handcuffed Newton's hands over his head, stretching his stomach wound painfully.

Several hours of cross-examination by Jensen reveal no cracks in Newton's story. And the prosecutor's case looks bad: there is no murder weapon. (Jensen claims Newton carried a gun, and also stole Frey's gun, which is missing.) Officer Heanes says he never saw a gun in Newton's hand. He also says he did not know where the shooting came from—although he says he was looking right at Newton and Frey.

There are so many contradictions in Heanes's testimony that it is hard to know what to believe, if anything. But for the sake of argument, say that Heanes did not know where the shots came from.

That checks with another thing Heanes said: that he wheeled—away from Newton and Frey—and spotted somebody on the sidewalk, somebody answering to the description of Gene McKinney.

McKinney, Heanes testified (not using McKinney's name, of course), put his hands in the air, "declared he was unarmed and had no intention of harming me."

Heanes, hit in the right hand, switched his gun to his left hand and blazed away in the direction of Frey and Newton.

Cross fire?

And this brings us back to Grier's testimony again. What did Grier actually see?

Probably not much. A passenger on his bus, Tommy D. Miller, testifying for the defense, placed the bus farther down the street than Grier did. Miller had just gotten on at Seventh and Willow and handed Grier a $5 bill, Miller said. Grier was driving and making change at the same time. It was 5 A.M. and dark, and a little hazy. (Grier said it was hazy, too.)

What did Grier see? He described a man in a tan jacket, and thirty minutes after the shooting the police suspect was a man in a tan jacket, identified sometimes as Lavern (no "e") Williams, sometimes as Huey Newton. Newton and Williams are both "known Black Panthers," the radio man keeps saying (on the tape played in court), and he also keeps saying: look for a man in a tan jacket.

Neither Newton nor McKinney is a "pecwce"; neither was wearing a tan jacket that night. There may have been a third individual. He could have watched the whole ten-minute process, watched Frey knock Newton down, watched Frey pull his gun, and then. . . .

But that is only speculation. Nobody knows if there was a third man. Or maybe McKinney knows—maybe Newton knows. The point is, Newton's defense is "reasonable doubt." There's an oversupply of that.

The jury's verdict? The one black man on the jury, David B. Harper, a young executive at Bank of America, handed the slip to the bailiff late Sunday evening, September 8, after four days of deliberation.

Guilty of "voluntary manslaughter." Not guilty of assault with a deadly weapon.

The judge, rereading his instructions to the jury for the second time, had emphasized: "To reduce the charge from murder . . . to manslaughter, you must find the provocation to be considerable."

Provoked into shooting Frey, but not guilty of shooting Heanes? This is real schizophrenia. As Rush Greenlee put it in the September 9 San Francisco Examiner: "If Newton did not shoot Heanes—and the jury says he did not—then who did?"

Garry has built an excellent appellate case, and even stands a chance of getting a new trial. (Judge Friedman will set Newton's sentence—from two to fifteen years—and will rule on Garry's retrial motion, as well as decide whether to set bail, on September 27.) One of Garry's grounds for retrial is that the corrected Grier statement—reading that Grier "didn't" see the face of the assailant—was handed to the jury without comment. No juror knew that there had been any problem with such a key word.

Much of this entire trial went on outside the hearing of the jury. Garry having to argue again and again to have testimony about police brutality in Oakland admitted as evidence. Once the judge refused to allow a man who had been in the hospital with Newton to testify that the police threatened Newton and aimed a gun at his head. That happened after October 28, 1967, the judge ruled, and so was irrelevant.

The judge also ignored Garry's numerous motions for mistrial on grounds of jury selection (which tends to exclude ghetto blacks), the hysteria created in the public mind by the omnipresent guards in the courthouse, the daily frisks at the courtroom doors, and the tensions raised by the statements of public figures.

While the jury was still deliberating, Oakland's Mayor John Reading said that no matter what the verdict in the Newton trial, there would be explosions in the West Oakland ghetto. Newton replied immediately from his cell, calling Reading a "rabble rouser," and saying that the Panthers planned no retaliatory action but were going to exhaust all legal possibilities.

The first post-trial "explosion," as a matter of fact, came not from black people but from two off-duty Oakland policemen. Thirty hours after the manslaughter conviction and assault acquittal, they drove by Panther headquarters and riddled the building with a dozen bullets. No one was inside at the time, but there were several witnesses. The two were apprehended, and almost immediately fired by Oakland Police Chief Charles Gain. They face felony charges. Chief Gain, over television, said he wanted to emphasize that these men acted as two individuals, that their isolated action should not reflect on the fine performance of the 600 men of the force.

I thought of the 150 or 200 off-duty New York policemen who ganged up on twelve Black Panthers recently. And I thought of Chicago.

THE IMMACULATE DECEPTION

G. SCOTT REYNOLDS

Mr. Reynolds runs his own investment counseling service in Atlanta, Ga. He is the author of The Mortality Merchants (David McKay).

Elizur Wright, the first insurance commissioner of Massachusetts, and the man generally regarded as the father of American life insurance, said in 1862 that he had "become persuaded that life insurance was the most available, convenient, and permanent breeding place for rogues that civilization had ever presented." And lest any objection be raised as to the time that has elapsed since that utterance, note that he said "permanent."

The life insurance industry occupies a unique position in our society. It owns or controls more than two-thirds of the corporate wealth of this country. It sells no product, yet its 1967 income was nearly $36 billion. This income, added to approximately $12 billion from matured and redeemed bonds, mortgage amortizations and prepayments, and sales of various holdings, gave the industry an influx of money in the area of $50 billion. Life insurance operates under a socio-religious mantle, supposedly having as its uppermost concern the welfare of widows, orphans and old people.

With such impressive credentials, what can be wrong with the institution? The answer is surprisingly simple. The industry has almost abandoned the function that justifies its existence—the providing of adequate, reasonably priced, easy-to-understand financial death protection. It has relegated this essential death protection to the status of a sideline, and in doing so has become a phantom savings media. The life insurance policy is represented as providing either for life or death, and in attempting to accommodate these opposites, it has failed in both. This failure has been to the detriment of the policyholder who has been hypnotized into thinking he is getting something for nothing, and at the same time has created monumental wealth for the industry that pretends to cherish him.

At the root of this failure is the prime offering of the industry—so-called "permanent" life insurance. Permanent insurance, as opposed to pure death protection in the form of term insurance, is misleadingly represented as providing a level amount of protection in return for the payment of a level premium. As an example, a man of 35 contracts for a $10,000 "whole" or "straight" life policy, the least expensive form of permanent life insurance. Supposedly, this contract will provide him with $10,000 worth of protection for the "whole" of life, now regarded actuarially as age 100. A typical premium for this coverage would be about $200 annually, or $20 per $1,000 of protection.

This appears simple enough, and the vast majority of policyholders accept it at face value. But it crumbles under close scrutiny, because the level premium concept of permanent life insurance calls for substantial overpayments in the earlier years in order that the premium payments in later years (assuming the policyholder reaches those years alive, or if he does, is still carrying the insurance) will not appear to be prohibitive. This overpayment, through the non-forfeiture provisions that were forced on the industry, creates what is known as the cash surrender value of the policy. This cash surrender value has come to be represented as the "savings" or "investment" element of the policy. This, as life insurance men point out, "builds" over the years. They are most reluctant, however, to point out an opposite effect: as the cash surrender value grows, the life insurance company comes off the risk at the precise same rate, for at any given time a "permanent" life insurance policy is made up of two things—the cash surrender value "savings" element, and the amount for which the company actually remains on the risk, the sum of the two being the stated face amount of the policy.

In other words, when the man who took out the $10,000 whole life policy at 35 reaches the age of 65, he will find (on an average throughout the industry) that his policy will have a cash surrender value of approximately one-half the face amount. If he dies at this point, his beneficiaries will receive his "savings" of $5,000, plus the $5,000 for which the company remains on the risk. The total, incidentally, will appear on the company's statement for the year as a death benefit paid out.

His premium, meanwhile, does not lessen as the protection element of the policy decreases. In fact, his premium actually rises, for he is not only paying a level premium for a steadily decreasing amount of protection—he is also forgoing interest on his cash surrender value "savings." At a realistic rate of 4 per cent he is forgoing $200 in a single year at the time his cash surrender value is $5,000. This plus his annual cash premium brings his payment to $400 a year, and the larger premium is buying half the protection that the original premium purchased in the beginning. He is in fact paying four times the original rate, or $80 per $1,000 of protection.

Life insurance men, in arguing against term insurance, are quick to point out that the cost of the protection rises each year. This is true not only of pure term insurance but of the conglomeration of "permanent" policies as well, the difference being that the increase is hidden from the buyer in the latter, while it can clearly be seen in the former.

Over the past century, hundreds of millions of Americans have been drawn into the trap of permanent life insurance, with the inevitable result of inadequate provision for the beneficiaries should the policyholder die a premature death, and the equally inadequate provision for the policyholder himself in retirement should he reach older age. Permanent life insurance attempts to provide for dying too soon and living too long. The failure is apparent in the number of young widows who must support their families, and in the number of older people who must rely upon their families for support.

Permanent, cash-surrender-value life insurance is at the root of a whole family of abuses. One of the most flagrant is the misleading concept of "paid up" insurance. This consists of the limited payment policies on which premiums are paid over a specified period, such as twenty-year, thirty-year, paid up at age 65, and so on. There is also a non-forfeiture provision in other permanent policies that provides for "paid up" insurance should the policyholder cease paying premiums.

This is merely an extension of the original shell game that ensnared the policyholder in the first place. Suppose our young man with the $10,000 whole life policy elects at 65 to stop paying his premiums and take a "paid up" policy. Such a policy, on the average, would be approximately one-half cash surrender value at this time. Also, on the average, at age 65 each $1,000 of cash surrender value in a policy will buy $1,320 of paid-up insurance. The key word here is buy, for that is precisely what must be done. He must take his $5,000 savings account and in a single premium, buy a paid-up policy. Thus for each $1,000 he gets $320 of actual protection.

Even after this exorbitant payment is made it is not the end of paying, even though the policyholder may never become aware of the payments he continues to make. At 4 per cent the $5,000 he has turned over to the insurance company could be earning $200 annually in a true savings medium. His single payment of $5,000 has bought him a $6,600 paid-up policy. The difference between the money he already had ($5,000) and the amount the policy will pay on his death ($6,600) is $1,600. This represents the actual protection and for this he is paying $200 a year in forgone interest at only 4 per cent. This figures to a per $1,000 cost of $125. He could buy a new permanent policy for approximately one-half this rate, assuming he had any requirement for protection beyond 65.

The advertising, sales practices, in fact everything said and done by the life insurance industry is aimed directly at promoting the sale of so-called permanent life insurance. Always overlooked is the fact that the protection element of every life insurance policy ever sold is nothing more than term insurance—there is no other kind of life insurance. All the rest is window dressing, but it is window dressing that generates the profits. Life insurance men are frank to admit (at least, when being candid with one another in their trade papers) that term insurance is a tough row to hoe. If it is insisted upon, and their arguments cannot overcome the insistence, they will sell it with reluctance. They do not, however, consider the battle lost, for there is a provision in a term policy which allows for the "privilege" of conversion to a permanent plan. It is significant that the reverse of this privilege, the conversion of permanent insurance into term, is not allowed. Once in the trap, they do not want you out.

The borrowing of cash surrender values can have an eye-opening effect upon the policyholder. Our man with the $10,000 whole life policy may find himself in need of money at the time his cash surrender value is $5,000, but he may not want to give up the remaining $5,000 of protection in his policy. In this case he may borrow from the company at a pre-stated rate of interest, usually 5 per cent. So he makes the loan, and he now finds that he continues to pay the same premium as before, $200, plus interest of $250, or a total annual payment to the life insurance company of $450.

If he dies, his beneficiaries will receive $5,000, for the outstanding loan must be deducted from the face amount of the policy. Once again it becomes apparent that life insurance is nothing more than a pseudo-savings medium. In borrowing his own "savings" the policyholder discovers he has given up that exact amount of his death protection, but continues to pay the same premium as before in addition to the fact that he must pay interest on his lost protection.

One life insurance man, in defense of this practice, said that he knew of no bank that would continue to pay interest on withdrawn savings. This statement, as is often the case in life insurance, completely inverts the situation. Certainly no bank pays interest on withdrawn savings accounts—the point is, what bank charges interest on withdrawn savings?

The industry stubbornly clings to the inefficient instrument of permanent life insurance. And because of its enormous profitability, the misrepresentation involved in its sale will probably continue unchecked. There is no effective regulation of the industry. Each state has its own insurance department and commissioner, making a total of fifty agencies charged with the impossible task of regulating and controlling the biggest interstate industry in America. The writings and utterances of many state insurance commissioners indicate strongly that their allegiance lies entirely with the industry. The policyholder then, in a very real sense, must fend for himself in his contacts with the life insurance industry. Until now this has been a grossly unfair match.

But, through knowledge, the individual can do something about his own situation, even if he cannot bring about universal reform. There has long been in the minds of many policyholders an indefinable distrust of an industry that grows so enormously wealthy in the exercise of beneficence. This feeling is becoming less indefinable, and with definition will come change.

VOLSTEAD EXHUMED?

EDWARD JOSEPH SHOEN, JR.

Mr. Shoen is a member of the American Council on Education, Washington, D.C.

Pending before the current Congress is a bill known as the Dangerous Drug Penalty Amendments of 1968 (H.R. 15355 and S. 2990). If enacted, it will impose new and heavy penalties for not only the distribution and sale but the possession for personal use of "hallucinogenic drugs (including LSD) and other depressant and stimulant drugs." From testimony so far given in hearings by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, it is clear that the proposed legislation has been at least partly engendered by an increase in the use of marijuana, already covered by the Harrison Narcotics Act; it is also clear that its comprehensive language covers a very wide range of very different pharmacological agents—the amphetamines or "pep pills," barbiturates, benzedrine, and a variety of others. It is further evident that the recommended law is directed primarily against young people, especially against college students, who are identified as the great bulk of users of psychoactive devices that affect the qualities of consciousness.

That there is a real need for federal intervention in the business of drug abuse and control is beyond doubt. Whether the Dangerous Drug Penalty Amendments of 1968 even approach the criteria of a desirable federal law is, to put it mildly, a moot question. To discuss it critically, however, is often difficult because public sentiment about the use of drugs often approaches hysteria or entails a set of powerful stereotypes derived from the problems associated with heroin and other narcotics, a very different order of chemical agents that is not at all under discussion here.

In the light of these traits of the public temper, it therefore becomes incumbent upon anyone who worries aloud about potentially ugly and self-defeating characteristics of drug legislation to make clear his own posture. I am not now nor have I ever been a user of pot, LSD or any of the other drugs at which H.R. 15355 and S. 2990 are aimed. I value the qualities of my alleged consciousness, such as they are, and I want no warping of them by the pharmacologist's art. On the other hand, I must confess to drinking an exorbitant amount of coffee, smoking a pipe to something like excess, and sometimes being guilty of a cocktail at lunch as well as one before dinner. In short, like many members of the respectable middle class, I can be described as relatively hooked on caffeine, nicotine and alcohol—all drugs with very dangerous properties.

I also assert rather than admit that I am approaching 50 and, finding the years comfortable, have little sympathy with cults of youth. Associated for the greater part of my adult life with universities and the enterprise of higher education in the United States, I bluntly repudiate any notion of their serving as a sanctuary for criminals or as a haven for special forms of self-indulgence. Finally, I regard dangerous drugs as defining a social evil of serious consequence, and I firmly believe that the establishment of appropriate controls over their administration and use is a pressing necessity.

Having indicated that I am a good-guy member of the middle class, I find it necessary to register some strong objections to the Dangerous Drug Penalty Amendments of 1968. To get on to more important matters, I shall run rather lightly over the first one. In lumping together a number of very heterogeneous drugs, the proposed law ignores a great deal of available evidence about their quite different chemical, physiological and behavioral properties and effects. In this respect, the amendments are inappropriately indiscriminate and based on needless ignorance.

Far more crucial is the observation that by adding to existing statutes new and stringent penalties for possession for personal use (in addition to manufacture, distribution and sale), the law could brand for life as criminals large numbers of young people, a majority of them college students, who have simply engaged in experiments with drugs that have wide currency in present-day American life. The problem is not one of whether these experiments are intelligent or wise; it is one of whether it is in the public interest to make them a federal offense. Recent estimates from the National Institutes of Health and other sources are that from one-fifth to one-third of college students have used, one or more times, marijuana or other drugs covered by the proposed legislation. In California alone, it is reported that something of the order of 30,000 arrests were made in 1967 for pot smoking, about two-thirds of them affecting college students. Such figures suggest that the bill under consideration is strongly analogous to the ill-starred Volstead Act, with special and ominous implications for the university campus and its most numerous constituency, those future alumni and leaders of our citizenry who are now called students.

Like the Volstead Act, as Dr. James Goddard, former director of the Food and Drug Administration and Dr. Stanley Yolles of the National Institute of Mental Health have pointed out, this legislation is virtually unenforceable in any effective or fair fashion. Directed primarily against young people, a very high proportion of whom are now in college, it invites an increase in that disrespect for law among youth that is a genuinely fundamental issue in our present time of societal troubles. It also suggests a basis for those aperiodic, sudden and concentrated crack-downs, not infrequently directed against college communities, that often terrify and enrage but that seldom serve as efficient deterrents or as decently effective ways of supporting just social rules. If the correspondence to the unhappiest features of the Volstead Act implies the horrors of the dramatic but fundamentally pointless police raid, it also raises the specter of a sharp increase in the more violent and criminal features of the traffic in non-narcotic drugs.

The central issue is that of whether the Volstead-like punitive and repressive measures of the Administration are at all likely to have socially useful effects comparable with those achieved by more vigorous programs of research and education, and a focus in enforcement on illegal manufacture and sale. It is noteworthy here that the use of LSD began to decline quickly and abruptly as persuasive evidence became available that the hallucinogen may produce serious and often irreversible psychological and genetic damage. In contrast, the widespread increase in the use of marijuana is occurring in the presence of already stiff legal penalties for its use, and is associated with the fact that there is virtually no scientific and medical evidence of any serious consequences from it. It is little wonder that our young often challenge our values when, in the light of these facts, we recall that the mandatory penalties in some states are more severe for using marijuana than are those for second degree murder!

It is frequently argued that the use of marijuana must be severely controlled because it leads to later dependence on narcotics like heroin or opium. It is quite true that one finds in the histories of narcotics addicts a high frequency of marijuana usage. One also finds, however, a high frequency of glue sniffing, excessive drinking and virtually any other activity that will obliterate consciousness. It is only a small oversimplification to say that narcotics addicts are basically "experience-deniers," people seeking escape from the impact of the world on their underdeveloped psychological apparatus. Three observations are centrally relevant here. First, young people, especially college students, who have been experimenting with marijuana and even with LSD are overwhelmingly "experience-seekers," individuals looking toward and valuing the experience of expansion in their own consciousness. This sort of personality is simply not one in which drug dependence takes root. In addition, the vast majority of cases of experimentation with pot and hallucinogens by college students have been essentially casual, limited to a single or few episodes, and closely associated with membership in social groups the life and viability of which are not long. Second, it is thoroughly illogical, as well as simply contradictory of evidence, to argue that because narcotics addicts have histories of marijuana usage, it follows that marijuana users will become addicts. Narcotics users also wear shirts, but shirt wearers rarely become narcotics addicts! And third, because the sale of narcotics is enormously lucrative, and the sale of marijuana, LSD and comparable drugs is, by comparison, a matter of almost no financial consequence, there is little crossing of the traffic lanes along which these very different chemicals move. In consequence, the youngster looking for pot is unlikely to make contact with pushers of dope; and the highly "professional" distributor of narcotics is even more unlikely to take criminal risks for small returns when big money can be had if he sticks to his special brand of viciousness.

So far, I have suggested that this latter-day Volstead Act is unenforceable, an invitation both to increased crime and ineffectual police activity, illogical, and at best highly dubious in its reading of relevant evidence. If they are persuasive, these contentions should alone be sufficient to avoid the stigmatizing for life as federal offenders the young people who are convicted under it. But there is a social consideration of even greater if slightly more subtle proportions.

It is highly probable that difficulties in the Dangerous Drug Penalty Amendments would considerably exacerbate the alienation of contemporary youth. It must be remembered that I am not in any sense arguing for making access to dangerous drugs easier. I am worrying only about the severity of penalties attached to possession for personal use, and the reason is a straightforward one. In the eyes of many of our brightest and most perceptive young, there is a vast hypocrisy in a society that characterizes kids as going to hell in a handbasket by virtue of their experiment with pot, while the most respectable members of that society are themselves heavily committed to psychoactive drugs. Aspirin, nicotine, tea and coffee and alcohol should be a sufficient list of the pharmacological agents on which almost all of us now heavily rely; but there is still that vast panoply of tranquilizers, sleeping tablets and stimulants that fill the medicine cabinets of our most stable citizens and the leaders of our civic life. Ours is a society in which the use of drugs to deaden pain, to help us achieve a night's rest, or to increase our feelings of intellectual or physical vigor is increasingly widespread. The national bills paid annually for liquor and for tranquilizers are staggeringly large and on the increase, and the number of both stimulants and depressants bought without prescription has been a fantastic boon to the proprietary drug industry. If we lose sight of this context, we lose our capacity to understand the processes that underlie the experimentation with marijuana and some other psychoactive drugs among youngsters, just as we lose our capacity to understand and to respond maturely to the bitterness of youth as they examine our attitudes and find us both hypocritical and closed-minded.

It can be argued, of course, that the alienation of youth is less important than justice or the society's larger need to regulate certain forms of behavior. I completely agree. My only point is that no society that is self-respecting, or wise about its future, risks alienating its young without taking serious thought and persuasively formulating the necessity for the measures it adopts. It seems doubtful that any persuasive case for either justice or necessity can really be built on this specific law.

There is still a further source of concern. By putting a heavily punitive emphasis on possession for personal use, the effect of the proposed Dangerous Drug Penalty Amendments could well be a kind of federalizing of the sort of episode that occurred recently at the State University of New York at Stony Brook. Those interested in the worth and potentialities of higher education can be troubled by the easing of a process whereby outside authorities may invade a campus—a process which makes college decision vulnerable to current political sentiment from outside its precincts rather than responsive to academic and humanly constructive considerations. They will also be deeply troubled by the advent of undercover agents, masquerading as students or as visitors to classrooms or campus gatherings, reporting to police and to federal bureaus a wide variety of information well beyond what is relevant to the distribution and use of drugs. The precedents established at Stony Brook and elsewhere indicate that material bearing on the political, social and moral ideas of faculty members and students become part of official dossiers. Such a state of affairs militates powerfully against the conditions that safeguard intellectual freedom and the integrity of the educational enterprise. Any presence in a college or university that would inhibit the free discussion of political, social and moral issues is a source of intense worry. In the present case, a serious threat to academic freedom interacts with another step in the erosion of privacy. To pay such prices for the control of drug usage seems high at best; when there are grounds for arguing that this sort of deterrence is unlikely to deter, it seems dreadfully exorbitant and well beyond what a genuinely healthy society would be willing to afford. Again, the lessons of the Volstead Act should be useful.

Finally, it seems odd that there should be such pressure for the passage of these bills when the National Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws is now at work, with the problem of drug laws and their enforcement well up on its scale of priorities. The preliminary report from this body is due on November 8. Is it conceivable that the rush with respect to H.R. 15355 and S. 2990 has something to do with its being an election year—that politics rather than justice or social necessity is primary here? The question becomes all the more troubling when another fact is noted: on recommendation of the President's Commission on Crime and the Administration of Justice, the National Institute of Mental Health has developed a large-scale and intensive program of research on all aspects of marijuana and the hallucinogens. Authorization for this enterprise suggests that our knowledge is too faulty at this particular moment to permit action that is wise.

At the same time, the case for effective federal intervention is one that hardly needs making. The distribution and use of dangerous drugs are menacing to our health and stability, and there is every reason for a strong national policy. If the Congress feels that the work of the National Commission on Reform of the Federal Criminal Laws and the research of the National Institute of Mental Health needs monitoring and supervision, there is a highly desirable alternative to the proposed Dangerous Drug Penalty Amendments of 1968. A Congressional Commission on Drug Abuse and Control could readily be formed to coordinate the efforts of the National Commission and the NIMH, to review and synthesize the large body of growing evidence about the drugs under scrutiny, to formulate the problems in a knowledgeable fashion, and to propose remedial legislation on an informed and constructive basis. The commission procedure has been employed with respect to a number of other large-scale social issues to good effect. Not only has it led to wiser and more intelligently developed law; it has afforded an opportunity for public education almost as valuable as the legislation it has instigated. With respect to the control of drug traffic, the commission model seems particularly germane, especially if the group appointed includes eminent biochemists, lawyers, physicians, behavioral scientists and educators. Such an arrangement almost certainly would result in legislative proposals that pay more heed to the enormous differences among psychopharmacological agents, that would attend more sensitively and positively to the profound social questions that are bound up with the drug issue, and that would reflect a broader and more sophisticated range of genuinely effective concern with highly probable and ugly inroads on personal privacy and intellectual freedom than is true of H.R. 15355 and S.2990. It seems likely that neither the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce nor the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare are interested in repeating the mistakes of the Volstead Act, and would welcome salvation through a more enlightened expression of public opinion.

LETTERS (Continued from page 290)

preferring to the very end to call it the Roman Empire; currently, the present Greek military regime, in suppressing freedom of expression and other basic liberties, does it in the name of Christianity.

In poetry, more than in any other form of art, the fact that the Greeks have never fully become more than superficially Christian, is abundantly clear. For, despite the extraordinary breadth and productivity of modern Greek literature, there is no "religious" poetry. Christian organizations in Greece that tried to produce anthologies of religious poetry, have failed abysmally for more than one century. . . .

Spyridon Granitsas

correction

The editors regret that a typographical error appeared in John Logan's poem, "The Search," in the Sept. 16th issue. The lines should have read:

Now I think I hunt with so much rage
that I will risk or lose family or friends for the ghost of my youth

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Humanities and Inhumanities

LOUIS KAMPE

Mr. Kampf teaches at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He is the author of On Modernism: The Prospects for Literature and Freedom (MIT Press).

American higher education, like any institution, lives by myths. Still feeling threatened by the seriousness of purpose shown by students during last spring's campus rebellions, the educator's myth of the moment informs us of both the practicality and the transcendent beauty of a liberal (or humanistic) education. The same noble speech is being (or has recently been) addressed to thousands of freshmen: whether at West Point, Swarthmore, the Texas College of Mines, M.I.T., or the University of Michigan hardly seems to matter. It informs them of the primacy of a liberal—rather than a specialized, or technical—education. The humanities, the speech continues, release us from irrationally held prejudices; they open our minds; they teach us to be generalists instead of specialists. In short, a liberal education transforms the narrow career-oriented youth into a free, though of course responsible, man or woman of culture.

The underlying assumption of the speech is that four years of exposure to a balanced curriculum will produce young men and women who are objective, rational, yet not without feeling; who being free of ideological blinders will be blessed with a sense of their own autonomy. Having been made intellectually independent by their study of Homer, the Renaissance, atomic particles, Wordsworth, brain waves, Pop art and total environments, they are capable of discovering the relevant past and applying it to the problems of the moment. They are prisoners neither of history nor of the imperatives of current urgencies. Consequently they are eminently capable of dealing with the insistent pressures of change. Having absorbed the best civilization has to offer, they will be able to retain their humanity though practically engulfed by inhuman events. Briefly put, they will be liberal. Certainly, they will not resort to the barbarism of riots.

I suppose there is a grain of truth at the center of this hollow rhetoric. Certainly the motives which generate such words are often decent enough. Yet I suspect that the hearts of most academics attending freshman orientation sink as they hear the noble sentiments being piled on. There is a moment when one expects the dean of freshmen either to burst into tears, to choke on his own words, or perhaps to double up with laughter. He knows that his colleagues know his words are fake; and I suspect that most of the students see us all—teachers, deans, administrators—for the frauds we are. Is it not time we forgot about the nobility of the humanities and asked what their real function is, what social purposes they, in fact, serve?

Hardly a day passes without some representative of the industrial elite letting us know that America's corporate enterprises, not to speak of its government agencies, need managers who are not only steeped in the techniques of operations research but who are equally adept at quoting John Donne or T. S. Eliot. At M.I.T., the Sloan Fellows in Industrial Management are expected to devote a fairly substantial amount of their time to the study of literature. The exposure to literature, we are to assume, makes them better—indeed, more enlightened—managers. But who are these managers? What is their task?

No one knows who will live in this cage in the future, or whether at the end of this tremendous development entirely new prophets will arise, or there will be a great rebirth of old ideas and ideals, or, if neither, mechanized petrification, embellished with a sort of convulsive self-importance. For the last stage of this cultural development, it might well be truly said: "Specialists without spirit, sensualists without hearts; this nullity imagines that it has attained a level of civilization never before achieved."

The melancholy words are Max Weber's. The occupants of his cage are the functionaries of the bureaucracy bequeathed us by the Protestant ethic and the spirit of capitalism. The culture he feared was one in which rationalization of the profit motive, rather than the simple urge to earn money, becomes its own end, and efficiency is pursued with religious—yet mechanical—zeal. To further such ends, traditional education is replaced by training programs for technicians and efficiency experts. M.I.T., the Harvard Business School, and their brothers and sisters were fathered by the needs of industrial capitalism.

But today such an analysis may seem naïve, even simple-minded. We know that our business schools give courses in social responsibility; moreover, our industrial managers conduct seminars on the needs of the Third World and the family structure of the poor. And who would doubt that this derives from anything but the best of motives? But before we congratulate ourselves on our good luck, we might take a closer look at modern capitalism. Clearly we have moved beyond that stage of rationalization which merely involves problems in engineering. Moreover, the complexities of modern finance—the mother of industrial development—involve a subtlety of human manipulation undreamed of by Weber's contemporaries. And as the complexity insinuates itself into all areas of the social system, we reach a point where our corporations and financial institutions effectively control most public—as well as private—institutions. As Kenneth Galbraith has pointed out, in this situation the main function of the American Government is not to promote the public sector but to keep the social order stable enough for business to do its business. Its second large task is to see that America's educational institutions provide the corporate machine with enough functionaries to keep it oiled.

The function of higher education, then, is to turn out those industrial cadres, rocket engineers, researchers, planners, personnel managers and development experts needed by the economy. But not only this; our colleges and universities have also been charged with the task of shaping the more ordinary functionaries: the kind who were once not subject to a four-year grind through the educational mill. Looked at in terms of real industrial need these four years of classes, laboratories, football games, hours in the library and bull sessions seem entirely superfluous. But that is not the point. For beyond immediate mechanical requirements there are the larger social imperatives. Social order must be maintained, and the whole fabric of traditions which gives a society its continuity must be kept intact. If this proves to be impossible, then at least appearances must be kept up; patches covering up the rents must be made invisible. As ordinary mechanical tasks multiply, as more of the labor force takes on white-collar jobs and finds itself pushed into the middle class, the process of acculturation becomes increasingly difficult. Formerly, those few who climbed the social ladder learned their manners—were educated to the proper social style—by their gradual exposure to the more or less culturally advanced. This was a slow and haphazard process; many fell by the wayside and never attained the style of life appropriate to their economic station. If the production of consumer goods is to expand, the goods must be consumed. To accomplish this, the new industrial cadres must be prepared for an "enriched"—that is, a cultured—style of life. Above all, the new class must never be allowed to feel that it constitutes a new industrial proletariat.

Let me return to Weber's metaphor: the animals in the bureaucratic cage must be civilized. Yet having consciousness, the task of civilizing tends to go beyond the development of conditioned reflexes. It must concern itself with the inescapable fact of human creativity and with the reality of man's historical memory. Both are, after all, basic components of what we call culture; they are integral to man as a species. The ordinary functionary, then, must be convinced that the rationalized task he performs—his ordinary, and inexplicable, job of work—is somehow connected to traditional culture—to all those monuments, both artistic and social, which represent our historical aspirations. What had formerly been the property of an elite now also belongs to the bureaucrat; for he, after all, has become a member of that elite. Or so he thinks. In any case, he knows he has his place in the traditions of the social system—and it is good. Consequently, there is no point in directing the anger of one's frustrations, of one's secret dissatisfactions, at the system itself, for one would be turning them against oneself—against that historic culture one has attained.

And therefore the future home economist, insurance salesman, even department store floorwalker must be made to believe that these tasks are—however mysteriously—connected to Homer, the Athenians, the Judeo-Christian tradition, and the rest of our cultural baggage. The connections may not be clear, but we feel a terrible guilt if we do not perceive them.

To perform this job of acculturation requires an expanding system of colleges and universities; to run them, a force of educational functionaries whose size seems to have no limit. The opportunities for administrators, professors, research executives, even writers, painters and composers are getting better every day. If nothing else, our colleges provide a marvelous haven for Cabinet members, mayors, Presidential advisers and generals, who are temporarily out of work. They, like their fellow humanities professors, are also students of the liberal arts. But, once more, this job of training and acculturation must proceed without upsetting our traditional notion of the university's function. The educational cadres must believe that they perform the humane tasks of scholarship. So they all write articles, and monographs, and books, and reviews of books and bibliographies of these reviews. At the highest level, in our important graduate schools, they train people like themselves to train people like themselves, to train people like themselves. . . .

Far from teaching young people to become aware of their capacities, a liberal education allows them—worse,

TOUCH AND GO

With us, any time, it is just touch and go.

*Even though we have begun to turn back to it,
the winter sun is so low in the south it blinds
our eyes at every moment.*

Shoulder high, it stays even with our eyes and blinds them into visions of cerise and purple blossoms on jagged stalks.

The book we try to read is stained with the red blotches of these flowers and we are blind to all the words.

Pale brightest, pale light of pure tonic of sky with the winter away down below the blueness and the mighty thinwhite jetlines.

Erotic feelers, lusts of old age, accentuate this beauty, related to the noon of shadows, for all is struck and shadowed

Blaze horizontal, struck in our eyes, so that looking up north we see the pavilions of greenness, familiar of the winter trees.

We do not have to bother with heat from overhead and can choose south-light or north-light, left or right face.

Or after the night blizzard in a grayness of whirling noon, platinum fulsome through scud, elevated lost over the cup of horizon.

Now in the fair the winter sun knowing no winter will approximate our hilarity, unaware that one crucifixion upholds it.

*All the blue emptiness north: plunk with shock to the stomach, plunk with shock to the heart:
plunk, plunk with shock to the groin.*

Every moral dilemma, every agapic need heisted up there, hello, jolt of the planting, soft snarl of the sword.

....

Touch and Go: lungs in a choking oedema, release of the bleeding: he is all curved and strained out there looking at us.

Whom shall we touch? Where shall we go?

ELLIOTT COLEMAN

forces them—to ignore themselves. As for the nagging reality of a world desperately in need of social change, the ordinary liberal education pretends either that the need does not exist, or that it can be taken care of painlessly, as a matter of ordinary academic routine. One thing is certain: change must do no violence to the traditional humanistic values embedded in the curriculum. These foundations of a liberal education are sacred. Thus the master task of the humanities becomes one of accommodating students to the social dislocations of industrial society by hiding their painful apprenticeship—their rite of admission to an appropriate office—behind the mask of a traditional culture. Confronted by the radical transformation of roles played by the educated, the liberal arts must assure us that the status quo is, after all, being maintained.

An odd development. Matthew Arnold once taught us that the object of studying the best that had been thought or said is to criticize our present mode of life, to make us see the object as it really is. Instead the study of our classics seems to provide us with ideological blinders. It mystifies—to use R. D. Laing's phrase—the very basis of our experience: our way of seeing, feeling, knowing. The humanities have been the educational system's unwitting collaborators in destroying our experience—that is, our humanity. For by blinding us to social mechanisms they have made us unconscious; they have made us the victims of a myth; they have kept us from seeing things as they really are. And, to quote Laing again, "If our experience is destroyed, our behavior will be destructive." And so it is. It is so because our culture has taught us to disguise competitive aggression as social benevolence, oppression as freedom, hate as love. These marvelous transformations have been effected not only by those who control our most powerful institutions but by our educators—our experts in acculturation. The lesson concerning the relationship of culture to aggression taught us by Civilization and Its Discontents seems not to have sunk in. Or perhaps it has sunk in all too well. As Freud observed, we desperately stand in need of our defense mechanisms.

But perhaps we are running out of defense mechanisms. Perhaps the contradictions liberal education creates for students are beginning to turn on us; perhaps the young will make us ask those questions we have so long refused to ask.

How so? The meaning of life is in action—whether the acts be physical or mental. Fulfilled action frees us; it makes us independent. When we can relate our thoughts, our yearnings, to activity; when our vague projections issue in conscious work—then we may rightly feel that we have our lives under a measure of control. Formerly the purpose of a traditional liberal education had been to train a cultured—and humane—elite. The act of ruling, of governing and giving guidance, was the activity which gave life its meaning; it fulfilled the objectives of the education. Clearly we still have the same goals in mind for the liberal arts today. Supposedly they teach us to be creative and to act humanely. And are these not the standards we set for our elite? But consciousness has made a fool of our objectives; for the young—or at least for some of them—the ideological fog has been cleared by the very contradictions of their education.

Precisely because we have been liberal in our education, our best students have come to understand that their deepest intellectual concerns—their very enthusiasms, their most intense involvements—cannot issue in any sort of activity which makes a claim to any social relevance beyond acculturation. And if there be no such social relevance, how can activity be fulfilling? Thus there is an almost inevitable split between thought and action. Thought may be free, but activity is controlled; stated educational objectives may be ethical, but actions immoral. The thoughts and feelings engendered by liberal education—the cultural enrichment we offer the young—become ideological masks for the politics of those who rule.

And the best of our students know this. They know that their studies are divorced from meaningful activity. They know that their courses are not intended to further their self-development; rather they become a part of the students' property, their capital. Their knowledge—technical or humanistic—makes them a product. As the material and cultural embodiments of this knowledge grow—and recall, these embodiments are products of man's self-formation, actualizations of his ideas—our practical activities, in a most ironic fashion, become ever more faintly related to our thoughts and feelings; their connection to the meaningful development of ideas and passions becomes more and more tenuous.

Consciousness has once more played us for the destructive fools we are. For the object of a liberal education, we tell ourselves, is the fulfillment of individual capacities, of ideas and passions. Through such fulfillment, we assume, men can become whole, sane, peaceful and free—that is, humane.

But the split we have created in the student's life has allowed him to see his education for what it is. He knows that his studies—especially those in the humanities, he is informed by our managers—make him a more valuable piece of private property. He knows that his labor in the classroom transforms him into an object; that he makes of himself a product.

Since it is the student himself who becomes the product of his own labor, he is in tension with himself; he is split. He sells those treasures which, we have taught him, best represent his humanity—that is, his civilization, his culture, his liberal education. And so he is at war with his own being, for the battle over this piece of private property is a battle over himself. For the best of our students the study of the humanities creates a more intense consciousness of this situation. Indeed, self-knowledge creates a condition which puts that very education—the act of preparing oneself for one's role—beyond endurance. What truly

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

"A political biography of immense sophistication"

—SAUL MALOFF,
Newsweek

Ho Chi Minh

By Jean Lacouture

$5.95, now
at your bookstore
 RANDOM HOUSE

liberally educated human being can bear to be a commodity with consciousness?

Such are the ends of a liberal education—or at least one of the unintended ends. In their attempt to use the traditional liberal arts to gain social consent, our managers have created a situation where students must risk their sanity in order to enact the lessons of their education; or they must turn into commodities, accommodating themselves—consciously or otherwise—to the lie on which their education is based.

In seeking alternatives, the educator's first impulse is to suggest curricular reform: jiggle the mechanism a bit, make a great-books course out of freshman composition, even have them reading Norman Mailer and Mao Tse-tung. Such reforms, we assume, will effect a fundamental change in the lives of our students. I doubt it. Changes in the curriculum—though often valuable and necessary—may have the ultimate effect of making the acculturating mechanisms more efficient. They may make the beast more cultured, but will not change its objectives. To break out of Weber's cage, to face the imperatives of fundamental change without dogma—if these are the conditions to which we hope our students will aspire, we shall need a most fundamental critique of the very social basis and function of higher education. Much academic political science will serve as an example. Aside from its more gross involvements with the CIA, the field's major object is to put government policy—unlike the more trivial matter of its execution—beyond criticism: to harden ideologies like the "national interest" into unassailable dogmas. Political science has done its job well, for it has succeeded in putting real political inquiry beyond the pale of academic respectability. This situation will not be changed by curricular reforms alone. If students are once more to ask meaningful questions about the state, and if they are to meet these questions with programs they can translate into action, the very ends we set for political science will have to be changed.

[See "Political Science Discovers Politics," The Nation, September 23.]

The objective of a liberal education, it seems to me, should be the harmonious reconciliation of philosophy (that is, our ways of thinking), action and nature (the world; what there is). This condition is possible only when we do not feel estranged from the products of our thoughts and actions, when we do not feel separated from the nature we have helped to create. Unhappily, industrial capitalism is rooted in these divisions. In our divided state philosophy (our principles of education) must not be allowed to become an integral expression of culture; it must not serve to rationalize the divisions induced by the industrial system. It can remain philosophy, rather than ideology, only as it is critical. And so for the humanities or liberal arts.

How is this criticism to be expressed? Most often, I suspect, in acts which appear irrational, if not deranged. On October 16, 1967, while watching nearly 300 students turning in their draft cards at Arlington Street Church in Boston, I understood—and was saddened by that understanding—that these young men were involved in a desperate act of rejecting a civilization. The moral outrage required for this heroic act is disfiguring; it warps one's sense of reality; it too makes one's view of the world partial. Yet this seemingly mad act of rejecting an illegitimate and immoral authority was really an attempt to relate thought to action: to assert that the products of one's actions are one's own; that freedom—or at least the struggle for it—is a human necessity. Saying "Hell, no, we won't go!" is one way for the student to expose the lie of his education. Exploiting the class privilege of one's college deferment is, after all, a moral fraud—a fraud to which higher education not only closes its eyes but which it encourages. Ironically, in their act of criticism, in their act of rejection in willfully separating themselves from society these draft resisters tried to assert their wholeness.

Yet what of the madness of this act? Recent studies of schizophrenics have shown that insanity may provide the morally sensitive with the only means of staying alive in a disordered world. The ordering principle imposed by insanity on destructive chaos keeps one from suicide. This is one way of relating thought to action; or, more simply, to act—rather than turning inward self-destructively. Yet there is an alternative to pathology. And the students who take their education seriously and resist the draft have pointed to that alternative. Our ordering principle as educators must be criticism or, going further, counter-action, resistance. This may not sound much like the detachment, the wholeness, we associate with the humanities. Indeed, we know criticism tends to induce disorder and most of its serious practitioners often act like uncivilized madmen. But consider that the only real choice may be whether to be mad (though civilized) on society's terms, or on one's own.

If resistance be madness, it is at least human madness, not the rationalized lunacy of an abstract process. If our students are to retain—or perhaps discover—their humanity, they will have to oppose the system of acculturation and spiritual servitude which our colleges encourage. And opposition to abstractions constantly tempts one into irrational confrontations; the bars of the cage are beyond rationality.

Surely, the truly humanistic educator must strive to create a world which does not demand of our students acts of madness as the price for spiritual wholeness. Our primary need then is not for a liberal education but for one which is actively committed to an end. If we are to break out of the empty rhetoric of liberal educational reform, scholarship may need to become allied with activism.

Activism on what front? Not on the campus alone. For one thing, the university is not the place where students and their teachers are most likely to liberate themselves from the shackles of ideology. For higher education's institutional nature has shaped it into an instrument of perpetuation for our most cherished—that is, humanistic—ideologies; the university and most of its faculty has a vested interest to protect. And if we are to take Richard Hofstadter's commencement address at Columbia as an index, that vested interest will be defended against campus activists in the name of free scholarly inquiry. For it is the student strikers, Professor Hofstadter would have us believe, who are the chief threat to the values of humane scholarship.

Those scholars concerned with liberating themselves from such academic dogma and effecting fundamental change in the role played by the liberal arts, might have to begin by forming political groupings (such as the New University Conference) which create alliances both within and outside the university. These groupings will have to gain a sense of identity by taking clear, strong and public stances on the most important moral issues which confront our students: Vietnam, the draft, race, poverty, the nature of higher education, the uses of scholarship. Or to go deeper: American imperialism, war itself, the function of private property, sex and aggression. What is more, analyses should be complemented by meaningful political action. Such activity may, in some cases, involve divisions within the faculty. But this surely

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 75¢ copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

must be the first step if our philosophy is to relate to our acts. Some things cannot—and must not—be smoothed over. Surely one thing our students must learn is to take their thoughts seriously.

The special urgency and occasional violence of the students' demands for university reform derive, I think, from an intuition that the liberal arts, rather than being the property of educational establishments, should embody our civilization's highest achievements. This intuition makes the integration of the liberal arts into the students' daily lives a condition toward which they (and we) desperately yearn. Yet if we are to see the object as it is, in Matthew Arnold's sense, we must look at the liberal arts within their social context. If liberal education is to perform its proper function—to help the students see things as they are, to face them humanely and freely—then that education must be placed within an appropriate social context. Creating this context becomes, consequently, the foremost task for the liberal arts.

This involves a transformation of consciousness, a transformation which must be radical—that is, it must take hold at the root. To reach this goal, the economic and social conditions which enslave our students must also be radically transformed. Is this possible inside our educational institutions? Within the imperatives of our social system? I doubt it. Yet our society is being shaken; it changes radically in spite of ourselves, and in spite of our universities. Though we have no clear answers or directives for action, we must make the attempt. For only in the attempt will our analyses unfold, our activity become consciously meaningful.

Leaping Ahead of Theory

TOM NAIRN

Mr. Nairn is the co-author of a study of the May events in France which will be published in England under the title The Beginning of the End: France, 1968, and is at present at work on a study of Marshall McLuhan. Mr. Nairn's work appears in New Society.

It will be a very long time before an acceptable history of the 1968 May revolution is written. The originality, the importance, and the continuing life of the "events" all insure this.

But what has already begun is a swelling torrent of debate about May, which is certain to have a profound effect upon political and social thought and action everywhere in the West. The first few landmarks have now appeared.

Two studies, in fact, stand out head and shoulders above the tide of more ephemeral literature, and point the way to strikingly different interpretations of May. One might label them as respectively the classical Marxist view, and the "sociological" counter-view.

The first is brilliantly conveyed in André Glucksmann's Stratégie et Révolution en France 1968 (Christian Bourgois), and the other in a collection of essays by three sociologists, Edgar Morin, Claude Lefort and Jean-Marc Coudray, called Mai 1968: la Brèche (Fayard).

Glucksmann's thesis is trenchantly re-expressed in his concluding sentences:

The May struggles demonstrate the revolt of modern productive forces against bourgeois relations of production. In the last century, no movement has come closer to what Marx had in mind in 1848.

The May revolution was the beginning of the great apocalypse foreseen in The Communist Manifesto, the violent end to man's prehistory that would occur when capitalism had reached its fullest point of development.

Obviously this argument runs directly counter to that of the French Communist party (PCF), which maintained throughout that there was no "revolutionary situation" in May, and no likelihood of one in the foreseeable future. Therefore the revolutionaries were wild

"adventurists" inhabiting a dream world, and wisdom lay in going back to work. Glucksmann's answer is that, in Marxist terms, it was the PCF which was living out the dream—exactly as, in a former era, the German Social-Democratic Party had done, until the cruel moment of truth in August, 1914. Then they were abruptly revealed (to the amazement of Lenin, among others) as staunch pillars of bourgeois society. Their revolutionary ideology had been merely the mask of an increasingly conservative practice. May, 1968, was in fact "the August 4th of the Parti Communiste Français. . . ."

It is amusing to see the PCF flayed with a hail of quotes from Marx, Engels and Lenin. But the method has its limits. However well the apparatus of Marxist scholarship is employed, the overall effect is inevitably that of suggesting that there was nothing really novel about the May events. The overwhelming impression of originality, the immense surprise of what happened, was due to our forgetfulness of the truths in The Communist Manifesto and certain other key texts. And while Glucksmann argues convincingly that May was much closer to these classic ideas of revolution than was realized at the time (and certainly very much closer than the muscle-bound PCF bureaucracy imagined), he falls down badly on the elementary point of what was different about May.

Most obvious was the new role of the students. This was certainly not envisaged in any of the great Marxist statements about revolution. Glucksmann is therefore forced to say that the student Who runs Congress?

POWER IN THE HOUSE

A History of the Leadership of the House of Representatives

by Richard Bolling

A provocative study by a veteran Congressman and member of the powerful Rules Committee, who reveals why vital legislation is so often stymied by the conservative coalition and suggests some basic reforms. Former Senator Paul H. Douglas calls this book "... a fascinating inside story... every politician and political writer should study it."

Illustrated with cartoons. $6.95.

 dutton

DELIVERED WITHOUT HEAT

*I lean on the notched stick of my spine
as the sun machine
is cranked down.
The angelus peals.
Across furrows
sown with seeds
that will not mature,
I watch my charred shadow grow
as though I were a gnomon that casts hours on stone.
This is not so.
Dripless candles leave no trace at windows,
yet my sturdy dog
will lead me home
in the dark
to dream of harvests
preserved, under glass, in a museum with an asbestos dome. They say Time,
a grim balm,
will soothe burns
delivered without heat.*

CAROLYN STOLOFF

movement "took the place of the missing revolutionary organization and theory," and did what they should have done "as far as it was able to." Hence, the student avant-garde of Nanterre and the Sorbonne was a substitute for the real thing—and presumably would have been unnecessary, had the "real thing" actually existed.

To this, one must object that there was no absence of revolutionary organizations and theories in France—on the contrary, as in many other countries, there was a plethora of them—Trotskyite, Maoist and many others. And the point is, it is simply not conceivable that any one, or any assortment of them could have done what the student explosion accomplished.

The reason is, that the student movement represented new forces, new needs, falling outside the classic Marxist framework of ideas which they all defended in so many different ways (much more intelligently than the PCF). So, it is absurd not to recognize that this framework has to be significantly developed, to take account of the facts of May. In a sense quite admissible to Marxists, practice has leapt ahead of theory, and theory must catch up. Glucksmann admits as much later, when he states that the students also crystallize most directly the contradiction between productive forces and productive relations, between the living force of labor and the dead, constricting weight of capital. Hence their ability to function as a "detonator" of the revolution. But if this is indeed true in modern society, then in certain vital respects the world has changed out of all recognition since 1848. There has been a profound mutation of social reality, which the May revolution simply manifested openly and dramatically for the first time. And it is surely the first task of any explanation to grasp the nature of the change.

This is where the sociologists come off better. Glucksmann's remains a neat, combative political analysis: it lies within that French tradition, whose essentially political character Marx both admired and sharply criticized. Morin and his colleagues, on the other hand, place their emphasis on the originality of May, and on the social changes behind the upheaval.

Morin's two long essays appeared serially in Le Monde, as the events occurred. They are among the most extraordinary journalism of recent times, commentary both vivid and reflective, enlivened by anthropological and sociological insights. Morin is also the author of a number of other studies in sociology and media, notably an extensive analysis of change in a Brittany village, Commune en France: la métamorphose de Plo-démet (Fayard).

For Morin and the others, the new leverage which rebellious students and other intellectual strata have obtained over society reflects an underlying change in the social equilibrium. The May cataclysm first showed clearly (in Morin's words):

... the drama of modern bourgeois society, or "industrial society." The old traditional values which modelled bourgeois societies in the past have been progressively eaten away by a materialistic dynamism, by the concentration of all values on private individualism—that is, by a kind of nihilism ... which leaves finally an extraordinarily soft, protoplasmic society, a society with a very feeble sense of community ... ready to crumble away at the first serious shock.

Within this decaying order, the older working class has become of less significance. However, at the same time, a process of general "proletarianization" has occurred. And this has transferred the main cutting edge of social contradiction from factory workers to those engaged in nonmaterial production: administration, media, the information and culture industries.

Thus, it may still be true that the forces of production conflict with the social relations of production; but the forces are very different, and so are the relations. So therefore is the revolution.

It may be the Western social revolution vaguely foreseen by Marxists; but it is very different from what Marx had in mind in 1848.

Forms of "mental" production become more and more important under late capitalism. And while within the apparatus of material production the worst contradictions of the bureaucratic, authoritarian system are held in check by the elemental needs of the production process itself, and by a well-worked-out institutional order (trade unions, etc.), outside it they run wild. They are felt most keenly of all in the huge modern workshops of nonmaterial production, among the "apprentice" laborers of the universities.

This then is what the students "crystallize," this is why they are no longer a secondary, marginal social grouping. As Coudray puts it, it is precisely the things which render student agitation unimportant to the Times or to orthodox CP communism that in fact make it important:

It is quite superficial to see in the "limbo" of student "irresponsibility" merely a passing condition of life, soon left behind. ... This condition is in fact ultra-typical of modern society, where everyone inhabits a "limbo" of growing "irresponsibility," under an authoritarianism that pretends to be something else, equipped with empty formal "rights" and no real power, confronting derisory jobs perceived as such ... all in a material "security" accompanied by an "objectless" anxiety.

True, the student revolt and what comes from it also looks to the past, and carries the red and black flags. But revolutionaries have always done this, as they created a new world, disguising the future in the clothes of the past. Rather than as re-creators of the classic Marxist revolution, the May revolutionaries must be seen as the harbingers, the first stage, of a new 1789 qualitatively different from the revolts of the past two centuries.

Wherever the truth lies in this debate, some people may want to recall the facts, and the atmosphere of May, rather than plunge into interpretation. There is a first-rate collection of pictures from the photographers of the excellent GAMMA agency, sympathetically presented by Philippe Labro: Les Barricades de Mai (ed. Solar). And there are two good collections of the extraordinary wall writings and poster slogans of the revolution: Les Murs ont la Parole (ed. Tchou), and L'Imagination au Pouvoir (ed. Eric Losfeld, Le Terrain Vague). [See also "Revolution on the Walls," The Nation, August 5.] These are all the things that will survive.

By the way, the under-left Situation-ist group—responsible for a lot of the best revolutionary graffiti—have also produced a first inimitable version of the May happenings. In their version, realizing that police brutality isn't paying off, the government orders in the Special Sociological Integration Brigades. Their job is to soften revolutionary fiber by getting people to read books and see movies again ("Lisez! Vous allez à la mort!"). Their special agent zips through the Latin Quarter defending "culture," buying up the latest Foucault, and dragging people to see the latest Godard. The cultural front is held, and the revolution founders. Everything reverts to normal ("Not bad, our new Prof!," "Have you read Marcuse? Really excellent!"). It's called La Contestation Aliénée by Hubert Tonka (J-J. Pauvert).

Advances and Retreats

NAACP: A History of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Vol. 1, 1909-1920. By Charles Flint Kellogg. The Johns Hopkins Press. 332 pp. $8.75.

LOUIS RUCHAMES

Mr. Ruchames is chairman of the History Department at the University of Massachusetts (Boston). He edited The Abolitionists: A Collection of Their Writings (Putnam).

This book may never be a bestseller but it is an important contribution to our understanding of Negro history and civil rights. It is the first of a two-volume history of the NAACP, by Charles Flint Kellogg, chairman of the Department of History at Dickinson College in Carlisle, Pa. Judging by the first volume, this sober study, when completed, should take its place as the most detailed history of the NAACP, and scholars will mine its information for years to come.

The America of 1909, into which the NAACP was born, was hardly conducive to the growth of a vigorous organization devoted to the protection of the Negro's civil rights or to the advancement of racial equality. The condition of the Negro was far worse than it had been forty or so years earlier during Reconstruction. Segregation and discrimination pervaded the South, while discrimination was taken for granted in the North; few voices were raised to condemn the terror, lynchings and burnings which were being used to keep the Negro in his place; and a belief in Negro racial inferiority dominated the minds of scholars as well as the man in the street. Only the sense of outrage of a few white radicals, some of whom had ancestral ties to the Abolitionist past, and a handful of Negroes whose spirits were not subdued by allegiance to the philosophy of accommodation of Booker T. Washington, provided the impetus to the formation of the new organization.

Kellogg presents, in great detail, the early tentative attempts at organization, in response to the Springfield, Ill., race riot of August, 1908; the efforts of such Socialist-oriented men and women as William English Walling, a wealthy former Southerner, Mary White Ovington, a social worker, Charles Edward Russell, Dr. Henry Moskowitz, and Oswald Garrison Villard, the fighting editor of The New York Evening Post and later The Nation, anti-imperialist, and grandson of William Lloyd Garrison. These were soon joined by such Negro leaders as Bishop Alexander Walters of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, Rev. William Henry Brooks of St. Mark's Methodist Episcopal Church, and the incomparable W.E.B. DuBois, then professor at Atlanta University. With more than fifty other prominent Americans, they called for the National Negro Conference, which convened in New York on May 31 and June 1, 1909, and which led to the permanent organization of the NAACP in 1910.

Some of the problems which faced the new organization, e.g., the choice of a name, were relatively simple; others were more complex and have yet to be solved. These included the relationship of The Crisis, the official organ of the NAACP, and its editor, DuBois, who was also an officer of the NAACP, to the organization's board of directors. The question of DuBois' right to take issue with national NAACP policy in The Crisis was frequently vexing. It was no nearer solution at the end of the first decade than at the beginning. In fact, as DuBois has reported in his Autobiography, it ultimately led to his resignation from The Crisis and from the association in 1934.

Another issue concerned the relative roles of whites and blacks in organizational leadership, policy making and day-to-day activities. From time to time, Negroes charged that the NAACP was dominated by whites, as it certainly was during its early years. DuBois, in conflicts with certain white leaders of the association, especially Oswald Garrison Villard, sometimes ascribed his differences to the "color line." Behind this accusation lay the fundamental question, which has come increasingly to the fore in our own day, whether an organization devoted to the civil and political rights of the Negro ought to have whites in its membership and leadership. The NAACP's achievements during the first ten years of existence—its growth from a minuscule group to 310 branches and 91,203 members, with more than half of them in the South; the many court cases it initiated and sometimes won; its public protests against federal, state and local discrimination against Negroes, which sometimes produced results; its efforts to mold public opinion in opposition to discrimination and segregation—provided proof of the efficacy and need for an organization which, though predominantly black, has included whites in its membership and leadership, with both races cooperating to achieve justice and rights for the Negro.

Yet one may also ask whether Negroes have not paid a price for the NAACP's success in terms of their own ultimate welfare. The aims of the NAACP were devoted to the elimination of racial discrimination, to the welfare of the Negro as an individual American. In a sense, its object was to reduce the Negro ghetto by providing for equality of opportunity and integration. It did not, to any extent, address itself to problems of the Negro ghetto per se, its economic, educational and political improvement as a segregated community within a community. The concept of Black Power, whatever else it may be, is an effort to wrestle with these very problems which for so long were overlooked.

Finally one of the most important early problems which has still to be solved is the political posture of the NAACP, its policy toward political parties and candidates, as well as its attitude toward broader social and political problems which ultimately impinge upon the welfare of the Negro and his civil rights. The failure of the NAACP to condemn the Vietnamese War had a parallel in its failure to oppose the First World War. At that time, by its demand that Negroes be permitted to participate fully in all branches of the armed forces, it directly supported the war, though some of its individual leaders were either

INTEGRATED HOUSING
AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT  MUTUAL REAL ESTATE
INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

▶ Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram, Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name

Address

Zip

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

pacifists or considered the war an imperialist one. In view of the detrimental impact of that war, and especially its aftermath, upon Negro welfare, one may argue that in the long run, despite the hazards involved, it might have been far better to condemn the war than to support it.

Unfortunately, Kellogg does not directly confront any of these issues. Indeed, here lies the essential weakness of the book. Its author presents a multitude of facts concerning the history of the NAACP, but he does not attempt to evaluate its philosophy and strategy, its failures and successes, in the perspective of history. The result is that though he provides us with a very detailed, dispassionate and scholarly study, he diminishes its importance by avoiding the historian's rightful tasks of evaluation and interpretation.

SLAVE LANGUAGE

Is it possible, for example, for a white southern gentleman to tune in on the impulses, beliefs, emotions, and thought-patterns of a black slave? This miracle of empathy entails an imaginative leap not only into history, but across cultures. It necessitates that writer divorcing himself from that vast mythic tradition about slavery, black people, and history which is so integral a part of his background. Then he has to devise a literary idiom through which to record his insights, since the gentleman and the slave lack common language or experience.

When black people were brought to America they were deprived of their language and of the underpinnings in cultural experience out of which a language comes. It is clear that they developed two languages, one for themselves and another for the white masters. The latter has been preserved ("parodied" is a better word) as the "Sambo" dialect in the works of southern dialect humorists—and even in Samuel Clemens at times—to whom it was often simply quaint and humorous. The only vestiges we can find of the real language of the slaves are in the few spirituals which have come down to us, which give a clue to its true tenor. It is a language produced by oppression, but one whose central impulse is survival and resistance. And it is undoubtedly the language in which Turner's rebellion and the countless other plots for insurrection were formulated. Anyone who has been privileged to catch the performance of a good black preacher in the rural South (or has heard Martin Luther King talking to a black audience) understands something of the range and flexibility of this language. Lacking complicated syntactical structure and vast vocabulary, it depends on what linguists call paralanguage; that is, gesture, physical expression, and modulation of cadences and intonation which serve to change the meaning—in incredibly subtle ways—of the same collection of words. It is intensely poetic and expressive, since vivid simile, creative and effective juxtaposition of images, and metaphor must serve in the absence of large vocabulary to cause the audience to see and feel. It is undoubtedly a language of action rather than a language of reflection, and thus more available to the dramatist than the novelist.

But the characterization of Nat Turner requires some literary approximation of this language. Yet Mr. Styron's Nat speaks, or rather meditates in no language at all. His creator places in his mouth a sterile and leaden prose that not even massive transfusions of Old Testament rhetoric can vitalize, a strange fusion of Latinate classicism, a kind of New England Episcopalian prissiness. At times it would seem that Mr. Styron was trying, for whatever reason, to imitate the stodgy "official" prose of the nineteenth-century lawyer who recorded the original confessions, at other times Nat sounds like nothing so much as a conscious parody of the prose voice of James Baldwin, the Negro Mr. Styron knows best, or Faulkner at his least inspired. This is not to say that the prose is not clear, even elegant in a baroque Victorian way, especially in the functionally inexplicable passages of nature writing that continuously interrupt the narrative. But, finally, it is the language of the essay, heavy and declarative.

From an essay by Mike Thelwell, in William Styron's Nat Turner: Ten Black Writers Respond, edited by John Henrik Clarke (Beacon Press), a collection of pieces of special interest to those concerned with the continuing controversy centering on the best-selling novel.

Book Marks

JOSE YGLESIAS

Mr. Yglesias is the author of In the First of the Revolution: Life in a Cuban Country Town. His current book is a novel, An Orderly Life (both Pantheon).

VENCEREMOS! The Speeches and Writings of Ernesto Che Guevara. Edited and with an introduction by John Gerassi. Macmillan. 442 pp. $7.95.

The editor, an admirer of Che, is proud of the fact that this large anthology was put together in one month. He is, no doubt, quite sincere when he states that one will find in Che's articles "clichés, misstatements, and factual errors, not to mention sheer bad writing," and in claiming Che for the Love Generation. For the first statement, his authority must be the dreadful translations he has rushed into print; for the second, God alone knows; but it is simply the reverse of that view which presents Che as cold and ruthless. Nevertheless, this book is the most comprehensive of the several now on the market. It contains thirty-five pieces, arranged chronologically. They are not only descriptive essays on the history of the Cuban revolution, Che's speeches at international conferences, but also his theoretical exhortations on the proper economic and spiritual development of socialism—those views that have made him the ideological leader of the new generation of revolutionaries. The book is fittingly climaxed by the much quoted but little understood "Message to the Tricontinental." This last is the "What Is To Be Done" of the Third World, but written with a command of rhetoric that was never Lenin's—or was he, too, badly translated?

CHE GUEVARA SPEAKS. Edited by George Lavan. Merit Publishers. 159 pp. $1.95 paper. Grove Press. 95c paper.

An unpretentious little collection that is concise and pointed in the way it slashes through Che's speeches and writings to get to those statements and analyses that challenge the orthodox contemporary Communists. The translations are no better—perhaps worse—than the Gerassi collection, and almost every piece in it can be found in the larger anthology; so it must be the price, its modesty, and the dry tone of its editor's comments that make it more appealing. Certainly, it seems less of a potpourri and is likely to be more useful to those who want a quick look at Che's views.

REMINISCENCES OF THE CUBAN REVOLUTIONARY WAR. By Ernesto

The Guevara. Translated by Victoria Ortiz. Monthly Review Press. 287 pp. $6.95. Grove Press. $1.25 paper.

EPISODES OF THE REVOLUTION-ARY WAR. By Ernesto Che Guevara. International Publishers. 144 pp. $4.95. Paper $1.65.

The problems in translating Che are exemplified in the handling of the title of this work, which also appears in the Gerassi collection as "The Revolutionary War." The original title is Pasajes de la Guerra Revolucionaria (or Passages from the Revolutionary War) which in Spanish subsumes that these are significant scenes. The official Cuban translation, used by International Publishers, comes closest with Episodes, (though that word perhaps emphasizes disconnectedness too much. It seems picky to deal this way with the several editions, but the fact is that Che was a very careful writer and this work, along with the Bolivian diary, most deserves a translation to match Che's exact sense of the meaning and affective reverberations of words, for it is his admittedly personal view of individuals and incidents encountered in the fighting in the Sierra Maestra—all of it, of course, yielding lessons he felt were valuable for future fighters.

The Monthly Review version, despite its absurd title—Che was incapable of the self-indulgence of reminiscing—is the smoothest reading (though translated from the French), and it also contains some thirteen chapters more than the others. These last are articles issued both before and after publication in Cuba of the original book. Monthly Review, which gives no byline to an editor, has apparently taken over the Maspero French edition without explaining why it is switching chapters around; it also throws in—as goodies—twenty-six letters by Che, Castro's eulogy at the Havana ceremony, and a biographical sketch taken from the Cuban newspaper Granma.

But instead of being grateful, one is tempted to decry the publisher's sloppiness, its air of doing the reader a favor when, in fact, it is simply rushing into the market place like any publisher with a campaign biography. The International Publishers' edition is more straightforward; for example, it adds four articles by Che, in which he gives a précis of the military history of the revolution, and details their source. The Monthly Review edition has transformed these articles into two chapters which appear (with no explanation and, in one case, cut) at the beginning and end of the book. None of the three versions of this simple, beautiful, politically prophetic book is satisfactory but International al Publishers, with its honest reproduction of the text, its explanatory and biographical notes, does best.

GUERRILLA WARFARE. By Che Guevara. Translated by J. P. Morray. Prefatory note by I. F. Stone. Vintage Books. 133 pp. $1.65 paper.

A reissue of the handbook on guerrilla warfare which, combined with the Episodes, is the best history, discussion and analysis of the insurrectionary phase of the Cuban Revolution yet written. Reading it anew, one is surprised to see how true Che and Castro have been to their original experiences, for in this lively little book appears in pristine form the theory of armed insurrection as the only way to achieve the revolution. It is undogmatic, tentative, wary of setting up formulas—in other words, more than aware that revolutions have to be created, not duplicated—and one wishes those journalists who have been instructing Che's corpse in maxims about the inexportability of revolutions would read it. They might learn that Che was at least as smart as they. The translation by J. P. Morray is excellent. The prefatory note, an article published in the New Statesman by I. F. Stone when Che died, is ignorant (post 1959 Cuba had become boring) and tasteless (Che was Galahad not Robespierre). The short time since Che's death has already made the article irrelevant, but it is galling, nevertheless, to find enconced in a great revolutionary's handbook for the liberation of a continent, an elitist liberal saying that "stupidity is humanity's most salient characteristic."

MY FRIEND CHE. By Ricardo Rojo. Translated by Julian Casari. The Dial Press. 220 pp. $4.95.

Like Stone, Rojo may not always grasp what Che was trying to do; he has other faults too: he speculates with insufficient evidence, makes assertions without naming sources, writes hurriedly, gets some facts wrong. All that, but he never patronizes Che, he can never be a gringo and, consequently, never tasteless. Rojo, an old friend of Che's, tells best the story of those years of their relationship before Che set off on the Granma to invade Cuba, and Rojo returned to Argentina after the fall of Perón. It's the story of a whole Latin American generation wandering throughout the continent in exile or in search of adventure, and Rojo, who put his faith in Frondizi, sounds the note so often heard from the activists of his generation: that armed struggle against puppet governments—a clean sweep—is the only way to achieve even the simplest reforms. Rojo was the attorney for the Argentine ian artist captured with Régis Debray and knows a great deal about the actions of the guerrillas in Bolivia, but the publication of Che's diary has rubbed off the novelty of these revelations. Nevertheless, his book is always interesting, always compassionate, and the portrait he achieves of Che is full-bodied and convincing. There's an especially fine sheaf of snapshots in the book, some taken by Rojo in Cuba in 1961. My favorites are those showing Che and his wife cutting cane.

THE COMPLETE BOLIVIAN DIARIES OF CHE GUEVARA. Edited and with an introduction by Daniel James. Stein & Day. 330 pp. $6.95.

THE DIARY OF CHE GUEVARA. Bantam Books. 191 pp. $1.25 paper.

The Stein & Day edition, which includes the diaries of three other Cuban members of the guerrilla group, is the best one available in English; the translation is better, the identification of the members of the group, the chronology of events—all are very helpful (though the translator is not given, nor any information as to how the diaries were obtained). But the 69-page introduction by Daniel James, former managing editor of The New Leader, is as apt as having Lenin's State and Revolution interpreted by a not too talented follower of Keresky. The Bantam-Ramparts edition is worth getting for the introduction by Castro who, though reticent about many aspects of the formation of the guerrilla band,

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

9-30-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $4

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

is eloquent and candid about its objectives.

Che's diary brings one closer to his mind and person than any of his previous writings or speeches, an experience no one living in our time should miss. Of the others, the 24-year-old Rolando's is most affecting: he'd been a boy when he acted as a messenger in Che's column when it took Santa Clara, the battle that convinced Batista to pack and leave, and he followed Che to Bolivia. To see him on sentry duty in the diary's opening pages, thinking of his family, enjoying the beautiful scenery and reading Stendhal's The Charterhouse of Parma, is to encounter the human values that have brought him and others to this difficult terrain to make the continental revolution. Che's diary, written for himself, tells all by indirection, though its surface is the detailing of facts and plans and the analyses (once each month) of the group's activities; it is hard to explain why all these should be so interesting and why, knowing the guerrillas' end, it should all have such suspense. The Archbishop in Sartre's The Devil and the Good Lord interrupts a messenger's account of a battle won with the words: "A victory described in detail is indistinguishable from a defeat." The reverse seems true: the account of the trials, sufferings, death of these men throbs with the triumphant spirit of the coming revolution in Latin America.

PERSONALS

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team." For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC., Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. For copy, write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 41 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA, 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador.

MAN cannot live by bread alone. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74¢ a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Warrendale is surely one of the most extraordinary, one of the most moving and fascinating, documentaries ever made. It was directed by Allan King for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, was shown last year at the New York Film Festival, and is now being released commercially by Grove Press.

Warrendale was a school for seriously disturbed children (not mentally deficient but psychologically distraught), organized on the house plan with a staff member for every three or four of the young, predominantly adolescent patients. The ratio of staff to children is none too great—there are moments when these young men and women look on the edge of physical and mental exhaustion. They create families, acting themselves the roles of mothers and fathers and insisting that the children see themselves as belonging and valued. These "parents" offer love, provide discipline, play games, heal bruises, exorcise fears. They are capable of descending to the kids' level, screaming back at the screams they endure. But they never hit back.

Instead, a child in physical passion is held. What this means at times is that three staff members are spread-eagled on the floor, clinging to arms and legs, cradling a head, being spit upon and cursed, avoiding teeth and nails. They hold and at last the nightmare passes.

Nothing that happens at Warrendale will seem incomprehensible to parents of "normal" children. All children have tantrums, all children are irrational, stubborn, rude and hateful in their despair. But misery this intense, violence this extreme does not strike many households. Any one of these children could destroy a normal family.

When a cook who had been close to the kids dies, the house must be told. Five minutes later, every adult in the room is wrestling to the last ounce of his strength to prevent the most excitable of the children from damaging themselves and their companions. The floor is writhing with bodies; some of the other children help with a curiously dispassionate tact. Why this tumult? Because the frantic ones fear that their own beloved staff members will die, because they are haunted by the belief that they in some way killed the woman (why else did she die?). It is all familiar enough, but on the level of a heroic combat of terror and love.

These children are also endearing; affectionate, sometimes generous, often merry. In a terrible way, they are more vivid, more alive than any normal children. The staff is superb beyond comment. And so, indeed, is the picture. I cannot imagine what ingenuity went into its filming: I am in awe of the compassion and taste with which it was done.

Should it have been done? Is there something suspect about this terrible excitement? It can be argued, but I feel myself that the beauty of what happened at Warrendale should be known. And quite seriously I think that any parent could learn from the firm grace and courage of the Warrendale staff.

The school no longer exists as it was when this film was made, but the theories of its founder, Dr. John Brown, are now being applied in several centers across Canada. These theories are still in psychiatric controversy; it is not yet certain that this incredible dedication will produce a percentage of cures high enough to justify the human expenditure. Some hope may be taken from the fact that one of the most violent and tragic girls in the small group filmed by King is now out in the world, herself engaged in social work.

Despite the far-out implications of the advertising, Duffy romps down the middle of the upper-class British heist. Two half-brothers, bullied into surly malvolence by their tycoon father (James Mason) determine to rob him of a million pounds to the end of enriching themselves and embarrassing him in a moment of financial chicanery. The scheme involves piracy aboard a vessel outward bound from Tangiers, and the strategy, Topkapi style, is based on witty complication of technical devices. The action detonates into a fusillade of double and triple crosses, ending in rueful laughter.

Onto this useful wagon is applied a psychedelic patina in the popular department-store mode. The elder son (James Fox) is a poisonous flower child, hiding an agile mind behind languishments of lace and flowing locks; the younger (John Alderton) looks like Paul McCartney with a mean streak. Available sex is supplied by Susannah York, who says "groovy" often enough to remind us of what decade we are in. On the Costa del Sol these three enlist Duffy (James Coburn), a larcenous beach bum recently retired to Zen contemplation. His contributions to the authentic lingo are "cool" and "man." It's wonderful how script writers get the hang of the argot—however the Mediterranean scenery is authentic and beautiful. And the assemblages with which Duffy has transformed his Moorish-quarters apartment into a psychotic nightmare are entertaining; they look like Marisols gone necrophiliac.

There is no deep virtue to the film, but it has a lively, grinning surface and the players go at the nonsense as though they enjoyed spending their considerable talents so frivolously.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1265

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 Patriot state? Like the clergyman rather. (8)
- 5 See 10
- 10 and 5 Australian perhaps, if sober, who might appear in Hamlet. (5, 6)
- 11 Related to a flower pot? (9)
- 12 One way of striking out. (7)
- 13 A spread put on for show, possibly. (7)
- 14 and 21 across Is a confirmed bachelor so sincere? (6-6)
- 15 The Raphael Madonna. (7)
- 18 Blocks one in the revolutionary system. (7)
- 21 See 14 across
- 24 Letters of remembrance, with nothing set ajar in return, if quick. (7)
- 26 Abundantly supplied. (7)
- 27 Shade to notice, but it might prove dangerous for the driver. (5, 4)
- 28 Not fitted in with small living quarters. (5)
- 29 It brings back the mountains with quiet display. (6)
- 30 Only a little cunning, not heavy-hearted. (8)

DOWN

- 1 Solid oak flooring might be. (6)
- 2 A comparatively small number of Romans have the know-how, but one can live with it! (9)
- 3 Falling back with Roger de Coverley? (7)

- 4 One might be put up for the office. (7)
- 6 Damages. (7)
- 7 One degree more remote in descent. (5)
- 8 This old car should have been efficient in a way. (8)
- 9 Figures of speech when one leaves 24, in a way. (6)
- 16 Rather common form of eglantine. (9)
- 17 A writer in like attributes. (8)
- 19 More delicate word for guts. (7)
- 20 Plain dance figure, by the sound of it. (6)
- 21 The grammar Italians use shows the ties of a couple. (7)
- 22 Drawing up the fuzzy ends? It might make one less fuzzy later. (7)
- 23 Ordered to go by the railway guard? (6)
- 25 Small vessel put away, by the sound of it. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1264

ACROSS: 1 Torquemada; 10 and 13 Running board; 11 Build-up; 12 Plungers; 15 and 29 Undercuts; 17 Ink bottle; 19 Isle of Man; 21 Sonic; 23 Mince; 24 Passport; 27 Teeming; 28 Arizona; 30 Advertised.
DOWN: 1 and 6 across Tartrate; 2 Rinked; 3 Union; 4 Magnetism; 5 Debts; 8 Expediency; 9 Hip boots; 14 Numismatic; 16 Rhodesia; 18 King snake; 20 Lenient; 22 Narrows; 24 Paged; 25 Print; 26 and 7 down Hard and fast.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!
Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 2430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

WORKERS WANTED

DIRECTOR—New Demonstration Economic Development Program for Rural Indians, $15,000. Also openings for Business Economists and Community Development Specialists. Area code 405-JE 6-3737

WINTER RENTAL

FURNISHED, Sherman, Conn. country house, fireplace, ideal for writer. Woods, lake, quiet. $125. Box #618. c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zelligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.10
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $1.90
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.96

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

9-30-68

The United States "finds itself in possession of enormous power and is eager to use it in brutal fashion. . . ."

Vietnam: an aberration?

Some like to think so. They like to believe that economic, political and military expansionism are new to American foreign policy. Are they?

Walter LaFeber takes a look at history in THE NEW EMPIRE: AN INTERPRETATION OF AMERICAN EXPANSIONISM 1860-1898. Here he develops the theme that the U.S. emerged as a twentieth-century power neither unwillingly—nor, for that matter, by accident. Linking expansionism with the Industrial Revolution, LaFeber demonstrates that, on the contrary, expansionism was "the natural culmination" of U.S. history.

What about the future? We're not sure. But we are sure that understanding its roots is essential to ending U.S. expansionism. So that you can have this important history, The NATION is offering THE NEW EMPIRE as a free gift to each new subscriber. Join us now.

*From a letter written in 1895 by E. L. Godkin, original editor of The NATION.

Send this coupon to:

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free THE NEW EMPIRE by Walter LaFeber.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). I enclose $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 for other foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N9-30

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

SPAIN REVISITED GABRIEL JACKSON

THE

NATION

OCTOBER 7, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
OCT 14 1968
LIBRARY

Dossier on Daley

RAYMOND R. COFFEY

TV: THE DALEY HOUR

CHARLES HORMAN

Finessing the Poor

RICHARD A. CLOWARD

FRANCES FOX PIVEN

Solzhenitsyn: Ring of Truth

DONALD FANGER

BURLINGAME CA 94010
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
5-694 PL-5337

LETTERS

speak up!

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Richard Nixon, disparaging the "demonstrators and protesters" and attempting to cash in on whatever bad publicity they have received, has decided to canonize the so-called "silent Americans" and to wangle their votes. He thus makes common cause with Eric Hoffer, Los Angeles Times columnist, apologist for the Lyndon Johnson-Hubert Humphrey brand of political razzle-dazzle and the loud, vociferous and strident voice of something known as the "Silent Center."

So here we have a Republican-Democratic axis extolling the virtues of political and democratic silence. I am thus reminded of what Rev. Martin Niemöller, the world-renowned German clergyman who spent considerable time in Hitler's concentration camps, had to say on the subject:

In Germany, the Nazis first came for the Communists, and I did not speak up because I was not a Communist. Then they came for the Jews, and I did not speak up because I was not a Jew. Then they came for the Trade Unionists and I did not speak up because I was not a Trade Unionist. Then they came for the Catholics and I was a Protestant so I did not speak up. Then they came for me . . . and by that time there was no one to speak up for anyone.

G. Kuno

studies in nonviolence

Chester, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Students may be interested in combining their academic work with studies about nonviolent action in political conflicts. Term papers, honors theses, graduate theses and dissertations can contribute significantly to the advance of knowledge about this frontier area. New knowledge and understanding may in time be useful for those considering or trying to use the technique of nonviolent action.

For a memorandum on research areas related to nonviolent action generally and to civilian defense, write to: Martin Luther King, Jr., School of Social Change, 21st and Upland Avenue, Chester, Pa. 19013.

Gene Sharp, Center for International Affairs,
Harvard University

George Lakey, M. L. King, Jr. School of Social Change

Chomsky's assumption

Saskatoon, Canada

DEAR SIR: Revolutionary as Noam Chomsky's contribution to linguistics is [see "Chomsky's Revolution in Linguistics" by Robert Sklar, The Nation, Sept. 9], it is still based upon the ethnocentric and dubious assumption that the world's 3,500-plus languages share a single basic structure, and that is the one familiar to us. In so assuming, Chomsky and his followers repeat the mistake of linguists a century ago who tried to describe every language in terms of Greek and Latin grammar. A. Koutsoudas' Writing Transformational Grammars, for instance, reduces some forty-five languages, most of them African or Asian, to tree diagrams which assume that every sentence in all these languages is basically a noun-phrase plus a verb-phrase, when that may not be the most useful description even for sentences in English, and it seems only a restatement of Aristotle's comment about Greek, that sentences have subjects and predicates—an assumption which needs examining because it is so universally taken for granted.

Another omission in Mr. Sklar's article also puzzles me: just how is Chomsky's grammar going to transform society?

Robert Ian Scott, University of Saskatchewan

EDITORIALS

The Real Danger

What with Wallace threatening to run over "anarchists" who persist in "laying down" in front of official cars, Humphrey struggling ineffectually to free himself from the Johnson incubus, and the quiet menace of the "new Nixon," a lot of people who are only a millimeter left of Center are getting nervous. Their apprehension is not unreasonable, but when they speak of a "new [Joe] McCarthyism" they are looking over the wrong shoulder. McCarthyism is not coming back, for the situation is entirely different from that of the fifties. Anticipating the wrong danger can divert attention from the real one that lies ahead, and may result in costly tactical errors.

When Joe McCarthy flourished, the public was worried about H-bombs, "secrets," infiltration of spies, "agents," etc. The Senator sensed the public mood (one of his few skills) and built his operation on it. Accordingly, he and his followers expended most of their energy in clobbering individual Reds and "subversives"; organizations were involved only secondarily. It was mainly a campaign of terror. When McCarthy reached into the high echelons of finance and government (John J. McCloy) and tackled the United States Army through one of its minor generals and a captain-dentist, his end was near.

The setting is now different in at least three respects: (1) The civil rights movement (1955-65), from which stem the new insurgent movements of one kind or another. (2) The peace drive and the Eugene McCarthy upsurge in the period from 1965 to date. (3) A much greater sophistication in politics, notwithstanding the struggle for survival of old-line politicians and obscurantists. Despite much unfocused dissent, there is broad awareness that we live amid the forms of democracy but without its essence.

McCarthy and his henchmen could run bawling after "Reds," but who today can define a "Red"? And with the Russians embroiled with China on one border and with the Czechs, Slovaks, Yugoslavs and Romanians on the other, where, oh where, is the monolithic "international Communist conspiracy"? Most of today's "troublemakers" are not identifiable by ideological tags; many, in fact, are anti-ideological. The action today is out in the open—in the streets, in the parks, on the campuses. The old-style witch hunt has lost most of its effectiveness.

But another kind of threat is clear for all to see. HUAC, hoping for rejuvenation, is scheduling hearings with Mayor Daley as a star witness. J. Edgar Hoover is sounding off as usual. Barron's runs a series of articles attacking the American Civil Liberties Union. Some university administrators are talking about a crackdown and being "combat-ready," while more enlightened presidents and deans are worried about impending Congressional action against students who resort to "force, disruption, or the seizure of property" at a college or university, the penalty being loss of federal education-aid loans and fellowships. All this, together with the big campaign build-up of "law and order," signals an approaching storm.

As a consequence of this new configuration, the big bust, when it comes, will be repressive on a wide front. It will entail a general police crackdown, with military backing, aimed at overruling dissent on crucial issues, such as the Vietnamese War, ghetto unrest, the draft, militarized think tanks, and the like.

During the coming administration, the Right will not waste time proving that someone was a Red ten or twenty years ago. Instead, it will concentrate on forcible repression. What the Left—and equally the intelligent Center—must realize is that the new forms of rightist action are much more dangerous than the old. If not thwarted, this counterrevolution, still in nascent form, can develop into an American version of fascism.

'Let's Find Out'

The long-standing disagreement between the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the successive plenipotentiaries representing the United States (and in particular President Johnson) has come to a head. U Thant took the extraordinary step of suggesting, at a news conference, a specific resolution for consideration by the General Assembly, which convened on September 24 for its twenty-third session. This precedent-making resolution deals with the Vietnamese War. Not satisfied with putting his idea forward in general form, Mr. Thant actually phrased the proposed resolution:

"The General Assembly, deeply concerned at the war in Vietnam, convinced that essential first steps should be taken to move the conflict from the battlefield to the conference table, so as to lead to meaningful and positive steps toward a peaceful settlement of the problem:

"Requests that the bombing of North Vietnam—that is, the Democratic Republic of Vietnam—should cease."

Mr. Thant added the comment that his idea was not practical because the issue of Vietnam was not on the present agenda, but of course he knows that the resolution could be added to the agenda by a simple majority, if some delegation took it on itself to put the proposal before the Assembly. In effect he was inviting such action by his forecast that, if offered, the resolution would be approved by a majority of the 124 member nations. And the wording was obviously designed to put the United States and the South Vietnamese government on the spot; "meaningful and positive" steps are to be initiated by a cessation of the bombing—an action which only the United States can take. Obviously, also, Mr. Thant does not regard the discussions in Paris as promising such a development. For further emphasis he explained that he was trying to reflect "the conscience of humanity"; from the circumstances it would follow that he is appealing to the conscience of the American people.

It would be interesting to have a photograph of Lyndon Johnson's face when he read U Thant's proposal. It would also be interesting to play back a tape of any subsequent telephone conversations (if there were any) between President Johnson and Ambassador George W. Ball. Perhaps Mr. Ball knew what was expected of him without any Presidential directive. At any rate he called on Mr. Thant a few hours after the news conference and informed him

IN THIS ISSUE

October 7, 1968

EDITORIALS

322

ARTICLES

326 The Falange Revised:
Fascism for the Future

Gabriel Jackson

328 Dossier on Daley

Raymond R. Coffey

332 Finessing the Poor

Richard A. Cloward
and Frances Fox Piven

334 Harry Golden

335 Mission to Paris:
Talks with the Vietnamese

Marilyn B. Young

338 Socialist Conference:
Search for Relevance

Marvin E. Gettleman

BOOKS & THE ARTS

341 Solzhenitsyn:
Ring of Truth

Donald Fanger

342 The Poor Specialists

Nan Pendrell

344 Private & Public Hurt

Gene Frankin

345 Letter from a
Former Optimist

Eve Merriam

346 Book Marks

Sara Blackburn

346 Films

Harold Clurman

348 TV: Daley's Hour

Charles Horman

351 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL MERTZ

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN;
Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music,
BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising
Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERKILL; Paris, ALEXANDER
WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY;
Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York,
N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049.
Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is Indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and
the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 207

No. 11

that the United States did not regard his discussion of the problem of Vietnam as in any way helpful in furthering the negotiations in progress in Paris.

An interesting commentary related to this diplomatic ruckus came from Arthur Goldberg, Mr. Ball's predecessor at the UN. "I am convinced," Mr. Goldberg said to Michael J. Berlin of the New York Post, "that the time has come to halt all American bombing of North Vietnam, in order to move forward to obtain an honorable political settlement of the war." He suggested that there was no need to rely on Hanoi's word. Asked whether it didn't really matter whether or not we can believe what Hanoi says, he replied: "Exactly. We'll soon find out, and on the ground, where it counts."

It has been proved over and over again that Hanoi's infiltration of South Vietnam is not affected by bombing. When the President announced a bombing "limitation" at the end of March, it turned out that he meant a concentration in the North Vietnam panhandle, with a step-up in that narrow passageway from a total of about 3,000 sorties a month to about 10,000 now. But the infiltration has not dropped off. (See article p. 335.) About all that the bombing accomplishes is to save face for Mr. Johnson, and to enable him to plead that he is "saving the lives of American boys"—while feeding them into the maelstrom.

Mr. Goldberg's "let's find out" proposal is not the least instructive aspect of these events. It is marvelous to behold the clarifying effect of dissociation from the Johnson influence. Retirement from office, however delayed, can almost make a new man out of one who takes the walk.

Sabotaging Nonproliferation

One of the few genuine accomplishments of the Johnson Administration in international relations is the negotiation and signing of the treaty limiting the spread of nuclear weapons. And now this success is being dissipated, through no fault of the Administration, but by obstruction in the Senate and an electoral campaign reminiscent of the defeat of the League of Nations after World War I.

The treaty has become a hot campaign issue, in a manner damaging to the interests of the United States and in fact of all countries, except those that may be itching to join the nuclear club. It took terrific effort to get the treaty to a point where the U.S. and the USSR could agree on it. It cleared the Foreign Relations Committee by a vote of 13 to 3. Those voting against were Senators Lausche, Dodd and Mundt—hardly a brilliant galaxy—and there were three abstentions.

But Richard Nixon saw a chance to cadge votes, not by a forthright rejection of the treaty (which could have had the opposite effect), but by counseling delay because of Soviet malevolence in Czechoslovakia. He was by no means alone. Many Senators are afraid of the soft-on-the-Soviets accusation in the election year, and the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia gave them an out.

There will always be political differences with the Soviets. There will also be possible political agreements which are to the advantage of both the superpowers. These are separate areas and one should not be superimposed on the other. Some Senators understand this. Stephen Young of Ohio, for instance, deplors the fact that the exhilaration which accompanied President Johnson's signing of the treaty on July 1 is being allowed to ebb. The treaty is not a gift or reward, Mr. Young points out; it is not even a Soviet-American arrangement. It is a step toward putting an end to the international anarchy in which we live.

A more surprising proponent of the treaty is Sen. Harry F. Byrd of Virginia, who can surely not be accused of dovish tendencies, much less of being soft on the Soviets. He voted against the consular treaty with the Soviet Union and would again, he says, as long as it continues to supply North Vietnam with arms. He has opposed all efforts to "appease" the Russians, but he rejects the argument that because of the wrong done Czechoslovakia we should do a wrong of another kind to ourselves and other nations.

Hubert H. Humphrey is in favor of the treaty, but that does it little good. The fortunes of politics being what they are, his support may even hurt its chances. Because so many concerned Democrats are rightly aggrieved at Humphrey, they are not putting their backs into the fight for the treaty. But Humphrey's errors and misdemeanors have no more to do with the treaty than have those of the Russians. He can be right on occasion—and on this one, he is.

The Fantasy World of HHH

In desperation, Vice President Humphrey has apparently decided that the only way he can win in November is to stage another "Give 'Em Hell!" campaign in the manner of Harry S. Truman in 1948. In this belief, the Vice President is the victim of multiple illusions.

(1) He is not Harry S. Truman. President Truman had no "image" problem; he was exactly the person that everyone knew him to be. He came on strong and clear.

(2) President Truman did not have to contend with an incumbent President of his own party who gave every sign of actually preferring a Republican victory. The Texas situation could quickly be straightened out for the Vice President by President Johnson and Governor Connally, were it not for the fact that they have a feeling he may yet "betray" them on Vietnam.

(3) There was an entirely different social atmosphere in 1948. In the view of many observers, President Truman won the 1948 election when he vetoed the Taft-Hartley legislation. Today a significant part of labor's rank and file is going to vote for George C. Wallace who, in so many respects, resembles George Meany. On the civil rights issue, which Humphrey had set up for Truman in 1948, the Democrats were odds-on favorites with Negro voters. Today Negroes are divided—moderates against militants, militants against militants, nationalists against nationalists. If many Negroes decide not to vote, it will be difficult to chide them. Would ghetto Negroes really suffer more under Nixon than under Humphrey?

(4) The Gideon's Army of Henry Wallace was much less numerous than the following of Senators McCarthy-McGovern-Kennedy. The voters who in 1948 were disaffected by Truman's cold-war policies were a fraction of those who are today disenchanted with the results of twenty years' adherence to these same policies.

(5) In 1948 there was no significant "new politics" or "youth movement." The Kennedy Mystique was yet to be.

(6) There was no such issue as Vietnam in 1948.

(7) In 1948 Truman could stage a "whistle stop" campaign; with the spread of TV that is no longer possible.

(8) George C. Wallace is not Strom Thurmond. Thurmond and Henry Wallace each received 2.4 per cent of the vote in 1948; George Wallace may well receive four times their combined vote; he may get 15 million votes, which would be about what Al Smith received in 1928. Wallace's name has been certified for a place on the ballot in forty-three states—an accomplishment no third-party candidate has ever equaled—and may yet get on the ballot in all fifty. Strom Thurmond took votes from Truman in the South; Wallace will take votes from Humphrey in every major region. While he will also take votes from Nixon, on balance the damage to Humphrey is likely to be the greater.

There are other differences between the situation now and then, but these should be enough to indicate that the Vice President had better re-examine his strategy. It may work, but if it does it will be because in politics there is still room for miracles, not because 1968 is like 1948.

Victims All

The morale of the South Vietnamese army continues to trouble the Pentagon's Saigon office. Desertions are rising again, up now to about 8 per cent. Reassuring "explanations" are given for this evidence that the local troops are reluctant to hunt their countrymen: there has been a recent very large mobilization of unseasoned personnel, the Tet offensive struck when many soldiers were home on leave and they prudently chose to stay there. However, a Defense Department official has characterized the situation as "an open wound."

It should not be assumed from this solicitude, however, that American troop morale is high. Richard West, writing in The Listener after a recent trip to Vietnam, calls our Marines "a brutal rabble." He says that Americans "shoot at civilians out of hand" and torture prisoners in full view of outside observers. Tanks, he says, carry Confederate flags on their turrets, a vigilante symbol that any American recognizes; at the same time, he saw GIs with McCarthy buttons on their helmet liners.

One may want to dismiss West as a European outraged by the war and venting his indignation on the troops who fight it, but there is still the American press. A recent C.B.S. newcast reported on six American soldiers charged with murdering Vietnamese civilians, none of whom was alleged to be a VC. The method used was to toss the victims into a canal and throw hand grenades after them.

An AP dispatch of September 23 reported the sentencing of Marine Lance Corp. John D. Belknap to two years' hard labor for his part in murdering an unarmed Vietcong prisoner, one of five so dispatched by Belknap and his buddies. This man was bound, placed on a chair, a noose flung over his neck and then the chair kicked out from under him. The hanging failed, and the man was then kicked, beaten and stabbed to death. Asked by the court if he had known what he was doing, Belknap replied: "Yes, sir, but I didn't give it a thought."

If one does give it a thought, one asks oneself under what circumstances do soldiers behave in this way? The answer is when they feel betrayed by their superiors (West reports that on some operations no officers are to be seen), frightened for their lives, have lost faith in the virtue of their mission, and despair of victory.

From that viewpoint, these blood-lusting men are not villains; they are—like the Vietnamese regulars, the napalmed villagers, the corralled refugees, the call girls of Saigon, the corrupt officeholders of the Thieu-Ky puppet government—victims of a foreign policy that made war without reason and therefore can find no reason for making peace. And these are victims on what is called our side; we do not even speak of the Vietcong or the North.

The Liberation of William Clark

Shortly after the Battle of Chicago, Mayor Richard J. Daley showed up at a fund-raising dinner for William Clark, Attorney General of Illinois, who is running this year for the Senate in Democratic opposition to Everett Dirksen. Daley was there as much to counter the main speaker, Senator McGovern, as to rally support for Clark. However, the dinner raised $150,000, which Clark badly needs. In 1966 the unions backed Paul Douglas with $250,000 or more; they have given Clark $5,000. A good lawyer, Clark does not make accusations but he suspects that the union bag has been tied at the very top.

Clark has seen the leader of his party only once, a couple of months before the Back-to-the-Texas-Plow speech. "I know and respect your friendship with Dirksen," he told the President, "but as head of the party I hope you're supporting me." He was assured by the President of his total support: "We need you down here." "Will you call in the press to announce it?" Clark asked. LBJ replied that this would not be convenient, nor would he be able to speak at the fund-raising dinner. Said the amused Clark: "He didn't look at his engagement book."

Last week Clark accused President Johnson of using "wheel and deal" methods in an effort to secure confirmation of Justice Abe Fortas as Chief Justice. Last June, according to Clark, Senator Dirksen was summoned to the White House and given the task of delivering the Republican minority for a Fortas confirmation. It was, he says, a "backdoor assignment," from which Dirksen now wants to "cop out." Donald Janson of The New York Times, says this was "the first time in memory that a Democratic candidate for office in Illinois had attacked a Democratic President." Obviously Clark, Gilligan and a few others are looking beyond the smog of 1968. Even if some of them do not survive this year's enfilade of Populist bafflement and rage, they have the self-confidence of thoughtful men whose actions stem from analysis and right feelings. "Next time I nominate George McGovern for President in the Illinois caucus," says Clark, "he's going to get a good many more than three votes."

FASCISM FOR THE FUTURE

GABRIEL JACKSON

Mr. Jackson, author of The Spanish Republic and the Civil War (Princeton University Press), is a professor of history at the University of California, San Diego.

What follows here is based upon my reading, observation and travel between March and early August, 1968. I had known Spain intimately in two previous periods—1950-52 and 1960-62—and on those earlier occasions my researches on the history of the Second Republic and the Civil War had brought me into contact with Spaniards of all political views and economic standings. In 1968 my professional concern was with medieval Spain, but I saw many of the same persons and places I had known earlier. In addition, on trips to archaeological sites in the mountains I often passed dams, electric power stations, children's camps and reforestation projects. And on visits to small diocesan museums I sometimes struck up illuminating conversations with local priests and municipal officials.

Almost everywhere I went I found evidence of substantial, if unstable, economic progress, coupled with extreme anxiety concerning the future. My friends, who took the subway to work in 1960, drive small cars today. Their wives, who cooked on coal stoves and kept the butter on a shady corner of the balcony, now have electric or gas stoves and refrigerators. The younger members of white-collar families manage to marry in their early 20s and to take summer vacations, which their later marrying parents could never afford. In the villages, peasants who went barefoot or wore rope-soled sandals, now wear shoes. The blind lottery salesmen in the cities, and the shepherds on the hillsides, carry transistor radios. In Aragon, Catalonia, parts of Andalusia and much of Castile, the grain farmers have tractors and mechanical reapers, sometimes owned individually, more frequently rented from a rural cooperative under Falange or Catholic social management. Chemical fertilizers and sprays are increasingly available, and trucks deliver excellent fruit and vegetables to the markets of modest urban districts where one rarely saw fresh produce eight years ago. In western Castile and Leon the farmers still winnow the grain on mule-drawn sledges, and in traditionally overpopulated Galicia one still sees three or four able-bodied men guarding two or three cows. But even in these more backward areas the men have motor bikes, the younger women wear dresses that could have come from J. C. Penney's, electricity has reached all but the most isolated villages, and inside adobe houses, still without plumbing, are television sets and butane stoves. In both country towns and cities one constantly sees new elementary schools, infirmaries and swimming pools, all built since the mid-1950s, and while elementary education is neither universal nor of high intellectual quality, absolute illiteracy has been almost eliminated.

At the same time that there has been an undeniable rise in the standard of living there is much that is unstable, and even partly fictitious, about the overall economic development. Most worrisome is the excessive dependence on tourism and on foreign capital. Thus a 1967 trade deficit of more than $2 billion was covered in most part by receipts from 18 million tourists, and large sections of the gorgeous Mediterranean coast are becoming the unrestricted private property of European real estate developers. Almost all industries except construction and food processing depend upon American or West European capital. Automobiles, machine tools and sophisticated chemical and electronic equipment can be produced only under foreign patents and with the help of foreign personnel. Tens of thousands of workers have found well-paid jobs only by emigrating to the Common Market countries, and the combination of inflation, competition for the tourist trade, and dependence on British markets obliged Spain to devalue hastily last November, when England did. The studies of Spain's ablest economists, such as Ramón Tamames and Jesús Prados Arate, and such collective publications as the UNESCO-sponsored L'Espagne à l'heure du développement (1967) and Ruedo Ibérico's two-volume study, Horizonte Español (1966) all tend to agree that there are excessive dependence on foreign capital, poor planning with regard to potential consumer markets, higher unemployment rates than in the rest of Western Europe, fantastic bank profits (of the order of 18 to 20 per cent per annum), and a concentration of interlocking industrial directorships in the hands of Spain's "100 families."

Behrendt, Algemeen Handelsblad (Amsterdam)

I think, however, that the pessimistic conclusions of these studies may be somewhat exaggerated. Spain is so beautiful and fascinating a country, and its people so attractive and fundamentally honest, that tourism may well be a long-term economic resource as stable and as income producing as are other well-managed forms of enterprise. A century ago, Germany and the United States depended heavily on foreign capital during the "take-off" decades of their industrialization. But if a nation simultaneously raises its educational standards and its labor productivity it need not become permanently dependent upon foreign technique and investment. The Spaniards, who in the past ten years have built excellent roads, hotels, low-cost housing units and hydroelectric plants, and who are rapidly modernizing their agriculture, have proved that they are capable of hard work and high technical performance. There is no practical reason why in future decades they should not be able to accumulate the capital and the skills to free themselves from excessive dependence on foreign industry. In any case, despite technical errors and social injustices, Spain has made immense economic progress in the past decade, and while the rate of progress has slowed down notably since 1966, I am sure the country will never again experience the stagnation and misery which I knew in 1950.

It is much more difficult, at least for a democrat, to be optimistic about Spain's political future. The present regime dates from the military rebellion of July, 1936. The thirty-two-month dogged resistance of the majority of the Spanish people rapidly converted the military junta into a cruelly repressive dictatorship. After 1945, the regime scaled down the number of prisoners, and the use of torture and executions. In place of crude repression it has, over the past twenty years, developed more sophisticated ways to maintain control. For example, the law states that a worker may be fired if he is absent from his job for seventy-two hours for reasons other than illness. Nothing simpler, with politically activist workers, than for the police to hold them incommunicado for seventy-two hours, and then to release them, usually without physical maltreatment, perhaps without even intensive questioning—but deprived of their jobs, their seniority rights, their social security.

Intellectuals and businessmen who step out of line can be controlled even more gently. The slightest sign of opposition may easily result in the refusal of a passport, or of an import license. Thus the student who has won a foreign scholarship, or the businessman who wishes to establish a new industry, will pay the price for his independence of mind. And in a regime where the citizen has no effective recourse to law, and where such indirect punishments have been handed out for two decades, the threat of harassment alone is sufficient to intimidate most people. In fairness to thousands of decent Spaniards, it should also be realized that personal gestures frequently lighten the fate of political opponents. The employer will often not fire the dissident worker despite the seventy-two-hour law. A highly placed friend may intervene effectively to see that the brilliant student or the enterprising businessman does get the necessary passport or license. Many "ex-Reds" hold responsible jobs, and are protected from occasional witch hunts by rightist employers who value their abilities, and who may also feel some remorse for the terrible oppressions of the decade following 1936.

Thus the de facto conduct of the regime has been humanized, but in ways which are completely arbitrary, which depend on the good will of individuals, and which do not in the slightest supersede those laws and precedents upon which the earlier murderous dictatorship was based. In early August the assassination of a hated secret police chief produced an immediate wave of arbitrary arrests and subsequent tortures in the Basque country, and Spanish lawyers are still frequently fined for the "crime" of defending militant workers and priests.

Two hopeful factors contribute to any assessment of the future. First, improved living standards and the vivid memory of the Civil War make a violent revolutionary attempt most unlikely. Second, the marked effort of the younger clergy to associate themselves with the spirit of John XXIII, and to back the economic and social demands of the workers, makes it improbable that anticlerical outbreaks like those of 1936 will occur again. But against these hopeful signs must be placed the total lack of political liberty and democratic political experience over a period of more than thirty years. By way of contrast: in 1931, when the Second Republic was inaugurated, Spaniards had for several decades known freedom of the press, freedom of parliamentary debate, and in the cities at least, increasingly honest elections. There were well-organized Republican and Socialist parties, and free trade union associations, both Socialist and Catholic. It is true that the Republic was immediately preceded by seven years of erratic, relatively mild military rule, but in the perspective of the times that dictatorship had been considered a temporary interruption of the country's steady progress toward Western European political norms.

Spaniards today have absolutely no such experience of liberty. Political parties and free trade unions are forbidden. In the eyes of the regime they represent the specific evils which in 1936 led Spain to anarchy and disaster. There is a parliament, but its members are not chosen by any form of democratic competition, and its agenda is prepared strictly by the government. Last year press censorship as such was ended, but editors know very well that they must not "abuse" their new liberty. To cite only the most recent and celebrated incident: when on May 30 Madrid published an editorial suggesting that General de Gaulle ought to resign, and suggesting it in terms clearly applicable to another General, the paper was heavily fined; it has not yet resumed publication.

Some of my acquaintances among lawyers and possible political leaders, while recognizing the truth of the situation as I have just described it, nevertheless hope that a restored monarchy may offer the institutional framework of a gradual, orderly return to political liberty. I see no firm basis for such hopes. The 19th-century monarchy always depended upon privileged minorities, and the last king, Alfonso XIII, could keep his throne only while the army supported him. There is no strong monarchist sentiment in Spain, and neither Don Juan nor his son Juan Carlos has shown such distinguished personal qualities as might overcome the heavy heritage of the Bourbon monarchy. If one of them should mount the throne a few years hence, and should (an unlikely hypothesis in my view) seek political support from the Left, the entrenched military and Falangist officials would rapidly call him to order. Any king who may follow General Franco will be the closely guarded prisoner of the army and of the Right, which will have made his accession possible.

The painful truth is that democrats throughout the world have underestimated the skill and the adaptability of the Franco dictatorship. It has been thought of simply as a vestige of pre-World War II fascism, or as a patchwork of old-fashioned nationalist and militarist ideologies. But it may well be the prototype of a more sophisticated military dictatorship than we have seen before, in Spain or elsewhere, based upon the following ingredients:

(1) A more agreeable material life for all, coupled with continuing financial privileges for the ruling bourgeoisie.

(2) Control of dissident intellectuals and youth by harassments usually short of imprisonment and physical torture.

(3) A façade of political "freedom" in the permitted antics of rival monarchist, Carlist and Falangist factions.

(4) Maintenance of spiritual order through the continued dominant position of the Catholic Church and of government-controlled television.

(5) Maintenance of the secular order by the army and the several forms of police, acting with a minimum of publicity and with carefully adjusted doses of brutality or leniency as the specific situation may demand.

In the past ten to fifteen years, the Franco regime has had marked success in establishing this kind of government. There is a long tradition in Spain of civil administration by soldiers, and of military supremacy in any major conflict between military and civilian interests. Indeed the military instinctively hated the Republic of 1931 because the Republic proclaimed its intention to establish a tradition of civilian supremacy in government. Considering its success during the past decade, and its roots in Spanish tradition, it is certainly very possible that the kind of sophisticated military dictatorship I have sketched above will remain the fundamental reality in Spanish political life for decades to come, whether or not a "king" is displayed in the front window.

Another major reason why the regime may in fact last for decades is that the classic circumstances for a revolution do not exist. Every revolution in the Western world since the mid-18th century has been based upon an alliance, however temporary or unstable, between revolutionary intellectuals and a mass of peasants and workers who really felt themselves to be both materially and spiritually oppressed. Enough economic progress has been made, with more in the offing, so that the Spanish masses do not feel materially oppressed. The day may very well come when more than a small minority of university students, Basque and Catalan nationalists, leftist priests and young industrial workers will actively resent the spiritual oppression of an official religion, a conformist press and the absence of any freedom of association. It is also quite possible that there might one day be a massive reaction of injured pride over dependence on the tourist trade and on foreign capital. The current challenge to British sovereignty at Gibraltar is in some measure an effort to channel such feelings of national pride. And this example suggests also that a continuing dictatorship of the present sort might be able to harness such feelings to its own ends. But the main reflection induced by my travels in Spain in recent months is that, given the rising standard of living and the substitution of milder sanctions for the earlier heavy-handed oppressions, a Franquist type of dictatorship may continue for decades in Spain and by so doing may provide a "model" for other nations that achieve a minimum of economic prosperity in the absence of strong traditions of political liberty. This is a problem for democrats to ponder.

DOSSIER ON DALEY

RAYMOND R. COFFEY

Mr. Coffey, who until recently was reporting from Vietnam for the Chicago Daily News, is now that paper's national correspondent.

Chicago

As long ago as 1957 Fortune, regarded in some precincts as the official assay office for measuring success, anointed Chicago's Richard J. Daley as one of the nine outstanding mayors in the United States. That was only two years after he had moved into City Hall and it was, also, only the beginning of the Daley worship. Over the years, Fortune was followed by a seeming nonstop parade of other journals (and by itself a second time around), all contributing to a litany of praise for Daley. The worst thing anyone seemed able to discover about the Chicago wonder worker was that he was jowly, looked like an overweight Buddha and mangled the English language with "dis's" and "dat's."

Then came the Democratic National Convention in Chicago with its barbed wire and MACE and tear gas and red-baiting and club swinging and gallery packing, and Daley suddenly found himself listed as public enemy number one by some of the same sort of people who were very much responsible for his heretofore exalted reputation.

Daley, determined to play host to the convention come hell, high water, crippling bus-taxi-telephone strikes and invasion by young dissidents, now became notorious as the Fascist proprietor of a police state rechristened "Prague West," "Stalag '68" and other names less soothing than Sandburg's "Hog butcher to the world" or even Nelson Algren's "City on the Make."

What happened? What happened is that that decade of publicity for Daley had confused regular garbage pickups—twice a week in selected neighborhoods—with greatness.

Administrative efficiency and reasonable honesty—reasonable for Chicago anyhow—were all that counted in the making of a mayor, his admirers suggested.

There always were people in Chicago, a lot of them, who knew better, but somehow they never got heard in all the dazzle over all the new skyscrapers and airports and ever-greater pluralities Daley was building from election to election.

It may be true, as the Mayor's supporters still ruefully say, that Daley is the best mayor Chicago ever had. But given the competition, that, as Chicago Daily News columnist Mike Royko has observed, is like singling out the best player on the New York Mets. It is also true that Daley is personally honest (though he tolerates graft among his political underlings, as long as it doesn't become embarrassing) and that he really loves this city.

But Daley has lost touch with the times. Lyndon Johnson caught on that it wasn't his kind of country any more, but Johnson is still Daley's kind of guy and for Daley the world is still—or by God better be—the kind of place it was when he was working his way up.

The Mayor has never been what is called these days an issue-oriented politician. For him it's still purely a business of patronage, "clout," ringing more doorbells than the other guy, and getting the most votes. To this day his automobile license number is not 1 or anything similarly distinctive; it is 708,222—the number of votes that first put him into City Hall in 1955.

For anyone who was surprised by Daley's performance during the Democratic convention and his reaction to the demonstrations, here are some aspects of the Daley record that the glowing publicity overlooked during those good old years before Jerry Rubin, Tom Hayden, Dave Dellinger and company hit town. To begin, Daley's stance as a straight and strong "law-and-order" man, to use the current political idiom, is downright laughable to a lot of people here.

"The thing that really scalds me" about the whole controversy over Daley and the police's handling of the convention, says state Rep. Anthony Scariano, a distinguished, tough-minded Reform Democrat who has been doing battle with the seamier side of the Daley machine for more than ten years, "is that Daley has suddenly become in the popular mind a symbol of law and order."

Daley is not only mayor but also chairman of the Cook County Democratic Committee and thus has practically unlimited power in the party. Yet, Scariano notes, he still allows the crime syndicate to run the city's First Ward, which embraces the rich Loop area. John D'Arco, a longtime associate of Mafia gangsters, is still First Ward Democratic committeeman, while in other wards men whose only sin was an occasional hesitation in carrying out Daley orders have been pushed into oblivion.

Until a few years ago D'Arco was also First Ward alderman and when he "retired," says Scariano, it was not Daley but the crime syndicate that "tapped him on the shoulder and told him to move over." The syndicate first chose as his successor a relative by marriage of crime boss Sam Giancana. When the press exploded at that, they tried to foist off a suburbanite who didn't even live in the city. Through all the unsavory maneuvering Daley sat back, playing the innocent and pretending it was all a matter for the people of the First Ward to decide.

Scariano, chief sponsor of a law that created a state crime investigating commission, says "the only time Daley lets anything like the crime commission bill get through is when the heat is so bad that he can't help it." Scariano adds, "He has never supported one piece of good government legislation in all the time I've been in the legislature."

But Daley's greatest failing by far—at least until he turned the police loose at the convention—is that he has never understood the race problem. He still lives in the working-class neighborhood, Bridgeport, near the stockyards, where he grew up and where Negroes to this day dare not live. And he lives by the old feeling, still strong in many Chicago neighborhoods, that people should stay with their own kind. As long as the garbage is picked up, the street lights work, and the Negro Democratic committeemen get a cut of the patronage, things are supposed to be all right.

Thus in 1966 Daley could tell a convention of Negro beauty-shop operators that under his administration 368,000 rooms had been inspected for roaches, 153,000 rat holes had been closed, and more than 300,000 citizens had benefited. Daley had found that statistics always impressed visiting magazine writers and the businessmen—mostly Republicans who voted in the suburbs and came into Chicago only to make their money. The Negro beauty-shop operators, however, may have been thinking about a different kind of statistics—such as the fact that one of every nine whites on the Police Department is a sergeant but only one of every twenty-one is a Negro.

The first big crack in Daley's reputation came last spring when much of the city's sprawling West Side black ghetto went up in smoke and violence after the assassination of Martin Luther King.

Daley was outraged and promptly blew his cool, issuing orders that henceforth police were to "shoot to kill" arsonists and "shoot to maim" looters. What happened at the convention, therefore, should hardly have come as a surprise.

Daley was also astonished and deeply wounded that such a thing as the West Side ghetto riots could happen in the city he loves, the city blessed with his administration. Others were less surprised. The Democratic committeemen in the West Side wards—stalwarts of the Daley organization (and remember he is supposed to be a political genius)—have names like Vito Marzullo, Bernie Neistein, Tony Girolami, John Touhy, Matt Biesczat, John D'Arco and George Collins. Only Collins is a Negro. The aldermen have names like Stanley Zydlo, Harry Sain, Joe Jambrone, Marzullo, Collins and Robert Biggs. Only Collins and Biggs are Negroes and Biggs is a flunky for Neistein, the boss of the all-black 29th Ward. (Neistein, by the way, is another of the people with crime-syndicate connections whom Daley continues to tolerate in the party hierarchy.)

Anti-Vietnamese War sentiment is another issue of the sort Daley cannot understand. The son of a poor Irish family, he worked his way through college and law school at a time and in a place where the only excuse for going to college was to make the kind of success Fortune exalts.

For the Mayor success is practically synonymous with morality. Intellectualism that wastes time on issues, morality that goes beyond marital fidelity and honest gain are suspect. (His only advice to Robert F. Kennedy when the New York Senator decided to go after the Presidential nomination was, reportedly, "get a haircut.")

Thus weeks before the convention the Mayor told a throng of precinct captains celebrating Democratic Day at the State Fair that he had no use for the "intellectual and university professor" critics of Mr. Johnson's Vietnamese policy. "Our Democrats are solidly behind Lyndon B. Johnson all the way," Daley said, demonstrating well in advance of the convention just how far out of touch he was.

Similarly, during the convention Frank Sullivan, public relations man for the police department, sneeringly referred to "the intellectuals" of C.B.S. and N.B.C. as largely responsible for the city's black eye.

And Daley went Sullivan one better in emulation of the late Joseph McCarthy. Sullivan had referred also to "Communists" as being responsible for violence at the convention. Daley was asked about this in a television interview with Walter Cronkite after the police had done their handiwork on Michigan Avenue the night Hubert Humphrey got his nomination. The Mayor said promptly, "There isn't any doubt about it. You know who they are." He then mentioned the names of Hayden, Dellinger and a couple of others.

"Well, I don't know that they're Communists," said a puzzled Cronkite. "Well certainly neither do I," said the Mayor, establishing what must be a track record for throwing mud and then ducking.

One of the reasons why Daley no longer understands his city or even his times is that he is extremely sensitive to criticism—or to any questioning. And over the years his power has grown to the point where he almost never encounters either of them. "Maybe the tragedy is that he's never had to learn to take it," says Alderman Seymour Simon, a sometime Daley ally who is now one of the more cerebral critics of the way things are done at City Hall.

In the days when it was fashionable to describe Daley as the Chicago paragon, it was often said that big cities were becoming ungovernable and that only Daley seemed to retain the secret. What was ignored was that Daley doubles in brass as party chairman, which gives him practically life-or-death authority over the city's political life.

John Lindsay in New York, for example, might find life less frustrating if he, like Daley, had 60,000 patronage jobs at his command—and the votes and livelihoods of the wives, mothers-in-law, aunts, uncles and star boards that go with them. As columnist Royko has put it, "In the East some families register a newborn son at Harvard or Yale. In (Daley's neighborhood) they sign him on with the city water department."

Daley has never been one to lead in new directions or break new political ground. He has been, rather, a steady consolidator of power, until today he owns all but a half-dozen or so of the city's fifty aldermen. One of the council robots, Alderman Joseph Krska, is renowned locally for an oratorical repertory consisting entirely of the sentence, "God bless Mayor Daley," which he uses to answer yea or nay or handle any other crisis that comes up.

The Mayor's power reaches far beyond the City Council. The much admired former U.S. Sen. Paul H. Douglas, for just one example, led a noisy conservationist fight to save the Dunes in neighboring Indiana. But when conservationists in Douglas' own neighborhood fought a Daley plan to cut down 2,000 trees to make room for a wider road through a park, there was not a peep from Douglas. When the Democrats are in power at the state capital at Springfield, Daley is also, in effect, the House, the Senate and the Governor.

In the post-convention bitterness here, state Sen. James P. Loukas, a long-time maverick Democrat, was finally moved to announce his support for the Republican candidate for governor this year. If the Democrat is elected, Loukas declared, the powers of the governor "would be turned over to Daley. . . . If Daley wants to legislate he should run for the legislature; if he wants to run the state he should run for governor."

That is not the kind of sentiment Daley admires. What he prefers are practical young men like state Rep. Paul Elward, who started out ten years ago as a rampaging, anti-machine reformer—and got nowhere. He then joined the team and is now so staunch a Daley man that he could weep at the convention tribute to Robert Kennedy until he was wet up to the ankles—and then without catching breath pronounce the convention a great success since no one had been killed or wounded. The new Elward, Elward in Daley's pocket, has now moved up to the position of unofficial whip for the statehouse Democrats. Elward multiplied is the kind of thing that really warms the Mayor's heart.

And so it should have been no surprise when Daley packed the convention galleries with sewer workers waving "We Love Mayor Daley" signs. Nor should it have been a surprise when—with no one else able to do it—Daley chopped off the emotional tribute to Robert Kennedy by having his sewer workers drown it out with chants of "We Want Daley."

Nor should anyone have been astonished, knowing how Daley likes having his own way and has grown accustomed to having it, that the Mayor ran the whole convention from his seat in front of the podium. Convention chairman Carl Albert had to do little more than watch Daley for cues—a throat-slitting motion to adjourn for the night, arms waving to strike up the band and drown out the dissidents, etc.

In the aftermath, Daley made much of the vulgar provocative language that had been directed at his police. He was horrified. But this same concern for propriety did not deter him and the Illinois delegation from shouting epithets at Abraham Ribicoff when the Senator dared to speak of Gestapo tactics.

Daley's constant complaints about the language the police had to endure—along with all his other statements about "outsiders" causing trouble (as if only Chicagoans belonged in town for a national convention), about leftist agitators who have been to Hanoi, about the demonstrators' determination to force a confrontation with police—illustrate again that he just doesn't understand what it's all about. As Alderman William Cousins, an anti-Daley Negro, put it:

The city is attempting to cloud the real issues, which have nothing to do with whether someone had been to Cuba or was a revolutionary or whether someone had violated a city ordinance.

The real question is whether or not the police have the authority to physically harm someone in a situation such as that which developed. Even when a person is guilty of some wrongdoing, we cannot justify a summary punishment of that person by a policeman on the street.

One of the people in Chicago who has had Daley in perspective right along—who was not at all surprised by the way things went during the convention—is Alderman Leon M. Despres, the liberal independent from the 5th Ward around the University of Chicago, and one of the few voices raised regularly over the years against the way Daley was running roughshod through the city. Now, suggests Despres, things may be catching up with him.

Daley, says Despres, "has created a chasm between himself and the black community and also has moved away from the liberals"—two major elements of Democratic strength, which in Chicago means Daley strength. Having used his power over the years to immunize himself from criticism and questioning, "repression now is the only way [Daley] knows how to deal with any kind of dissent."

Ironically, Despres added, Daley now finds that the most enthusiastic support for his handling of the convention comes from "the Wallace and Nixon people—the people who would like to bury all his [Democratic] candidates." Daley, said Despres, is "moving to the right . . . he's lost his touch on this issue . . . he's really in bad trouble."

Daley and the men around him do not, of course, admit any such thing. They are trying to smile through, publicly taking comfort in the letters and phone calls of support that have been pouring into City Hall. But the fact seems to be that Daley has indeed been hurt. "What went on in the streets of Chicago is the tragedy and shame of our city," says Abner J. Mikva, the liberal reformer who is the Democratic candidate for Congress in the 2d District. "Chicago has suffered a distressing blow to its reputation. . . . The loss in business, the loss in prestige, the ridicule to which we have been and will be put have hurt a great deal."

An even harsher indictment came from State Treasurer Adlai E. Stevenson III, the party's biggest vote getter in recent elections and a man who was denied the U.S. Senate nomination for refusing to pledge allegiance to LBJ on Vietnam. "Illinois Democrats are restless within the confines of a feudal structure that exists by rewarding homage with jobs and favors," Stevenson said in a 2,500-word post-convention blast at the Daley way of doing things.

The surest sign that Daley has been hurt—and that he knows it—is the great length to which he has gone to tell and retell and tell again his "side" of the story in special reports, in the press and on television. The whole thing, he suggests, was the fault of the papers and broadcasters. He sounds a lot like the Goldwater Republicans of 1964 who blamed their fate on the press. And Hubert Humphrey and Daley's Democratic state ticket candidates surely cannot have forgotten what happened to Goldwater.

FINESSING THE POOR

RICHARD A. CLOWARD
and FRANCES FOX PIVEN

Mr. Cloward and Mrs. Piven are members of the faculty of the Columbia University School of Social Work.

Welfare officials are trying to finesse New York City's 875,000 welfare poor by calling a major economy measure a major reform. More important, this "reform" is intended to deal a lethal blow to the most extensive organization of New York's poor in recent memory—the welfare rights movement. And it has an odds-on chance of succeeding.

The reform is quite easily described. Until now, a recipient, once certified as eligible, was entitled to two kinds of payment. The first was a semi-monthly check for food, rent and miscellaneous items. But in addition, the law prescribed that every recipient be maintained at a "minimum standard of decency" in heavy clothing and household furnishings. Each child, for example, was supposed to have an overcoat, hat and galoshes. A child was also supposed to have his own bed, a family was entitled to enough chairs so that they could all sit together to eat, and so forth. So the second kind of payment—"special grants" of money to enable recipients to purchase these items—was to be made on an "as needed" basis. The trouble was that before the welfare client movement began, such grants were rare. Clients got an average of only $40 in 1965. The department—like welfare departments everywhere—economized by violating its own regulations.

Nor would that situation have changed without organized action by masses of recipients. Under the leadership of the City-Wide Coordinating Committee of Welfare Groups, which formed early in 1966, hundreds of thousands of copies of the official schedules of items for which people are supposed to get money were mimeographed and distributed throughout the city's ghettos. Recipients were instructed to check off the items they did not have, and told to meet at an appointed time at the local welfare office. There, client leaders turned in huge stacks of applications and demanded payment, while large numbers of clients demonstrated in the waiting rooms, refusing to move until their checks were processed.

The results, from the beginning, were spectacular. Under impact of successive campaigns, the aggregate costs of special grants zoomed from about $20 million in 1965 to an estimated $90 million in the present fiscal year. A small part of this increase is accounted for by the increase in the number of people on welfare (up about 325,000 since 1965); had the department continued to give this enlarged population an average of $40 per year, aggregate disbursements would have risen from $20 million to about $35 million in 1968. But costs have now reached $90 million, and it is the welfare movement which is responsible for the difference. Stated another way, the movement forced an increase in the level of special grants from an average of $40 per person in 1965 to an estimated average of $100 in 1968. The city's "reform" freezes the average disbursement at this level. Beginning immediately, each recipient will get a "flat grant" of $100 per year, payable in four installments of $25.

Although at first glance it appears that the "flat-grant" plan will not reduce the level of disbursements to the poor, it is in fact an economy measure. The organizing drives which forced costs up to their present level involved hundreds of thousands of recipients, but still more hundreds of thousands have not yet been reached. Organized recipients have been getting far more than $100 per person, while the unorganized have, as always, been getting far less, or getting nothing at all. This vast reservoir, with its potential of hundreds of millions of dollars in legitimate claims, posed what The New York Times called editorially a "threat to [New York City's] treasury." The movement was growing so rapidly that it would soon have organized many thousands more people to make claims. Without the new "reform," the movement might have driven costs to the $200-million mark within another year.

By an introverted bit of logic, City Hall says that the new payment method will not only be more economical but also more "equitable." By that it means that no one, organized or unorganized, will get more than $100. The city's concern for "equity" would be rather more convincing, however, had it also announced retroactive grants to those hundreds of thousands of unorganized people who never got their legal benefits in the first place. This was precisely what the spread of the movement threatened to do. To insure that it would not, the flat grant was instituted, as the Times approvingly said, in order to "stem a fiscal threat."

